CASTANIE et al. v. BOULERIES et al. (No. 1,400.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. July Term, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

PROOF OF MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE OF LEGITIMACY—RIGHTS OF REVENDICATION.

1. The proof allowed to be introduced in the absence of documentary evidence and direct oral testimony establishing a marriage must be clear and unmistakable to raise a presumption of marriage, as is settled by the jurisprudence on the subject, which is affirmed. Children born from the intercourse of persons living publicly as man and wife, and introduced by them as their offspring, must establish clearly their legitimate filiation in order to recover in a petitory action from one in actual possession as owner, and who claims and establishes a title to the real estate revendicated.

2. Natural children, even when duly acknowledged in the form prescribed by law, do not enjoy the rights and privileges of revendication, with which the law vests forced heirs whenever their légitime has been trenched upon.

3. In a petitory action the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberia.

L. T. Dulany, for appellants.

(1) It is a general rule of law that plaintiff must make his case not only probable, but certain. Hennen's Dig. tit. "Evidence," XIII, A. No. 1.

(2) A case involving the question of legitimacy is no exception to the rule. 15 La. Ann. 410.

(3) The proof of legitimacy or legitimate filiation involves the proof of the marriage of the parents, and the identity of the child as the issue of that marriage. It differs essentially from the proof of the filiation of legitimate children, wherein the marriage of the parents is admitted or is established. Duranton, vol. 2, tit. 7, § 1; 20 La. Ann. 98; 15 La. Ann. 410.

(4) Under the laws of Louisiana marriage is a contract that must be established by legal evidence. In the absence of the best evidence, secondary and parol will be admitted, but the absence of the best evidence must be first accounted for. 15 La. Ann. 410.

(5) The court will take judicial notice of the fact that a record of marriages is kept in the public records of the parishes of this state, and also of the universal custom in all Catholic churches that the register of marriages and baptism is kept with great care. The failure of plaintiff to procure such evidence will make proof against him. 40 La. Ann. 81, 3 South. Rep. 489.

(6) When, in a case involving the question of marriage, no direct evidence of the marriage is adduced, or its absence accounted for, all the presumptions will be against the marriage. 15 La. Ann. 410.

(7) "Although our jurisprudence has recognized the rule that marriage will be presumed from long cohabitation and general reputation and conduct, it is still a fact that under our laws marriage is a contract, the best evidence of which is some act, as prescribed by the Civil Code, showing the consent or agreement of the parties to contract marriage." 35 La. Ann. 632.

(8) Long cohabitation and general reputation and conduct will not raise a presumption that the parties were married, unless the facts show that the relations between the parties were characterized in the beginning by a free consent to contract the obligation of marriage, and it must exclude the idea that the union began and the parties were drawn together merely through the promptings of sensuality. 35 La. Ann. 633.

(9) "Agreeing to live together as man and wife does not make marriage. The law does not sanction voluntary cohabitation, nor elevate concubinage, of whatever duration, to the dignity of marriage." Bish. Mar. & Div. 30 La. Ann. 1398.

(10) Facts from which to draw the presumption of marriage must be concise, consistent, and weighty, and these known facts should draw with them the unknown fact as an almost necessary consequence. 3 La. Ann. 103; 20 La. Ann. 98.

(11) If courts have somewhat relaxed the rigor of the law, to allow proof of marriage by long cohabitation and reputation, etc., it was only in the interest of persons who were the issue of marriages of which no direct proof could be adduced, and where the circumstantial evidence was conclusive in favor of the marriage, and excluded the idea of an illicit union. 35 La. Ann. 633.

(12) Testimony as to the visits and introduction of the woman as a wife should be considered with relation to the standing and respectability of the parties and visitors. 20 La. Ann. 495; 15 La. Ann. 410; 20 La. Ann. 97.

(13) Verbal declarations of the parties, though deceased, are legal evidence to show that their intercourse was illicit, and that they were not married. 15 La. Ann. 46, 410; 20 La. Ann. 97.

(14) Evidence offered and admitted for a special purpose, and especially restricted to that purpose by the party offering it, must be considered for that purpose alone.

(15) When the husband was a party to the act of purchase of property in the name of the wife, reciting that the purchase is made with her paraphernal funds, and that neither he nor his heirs will ever claim the property as belonging to the community, he cannot contradict the recitals of the deed. The question is one of estoppel. Creditors and forced heirs alone could do so, but the latter only to the extent of their légitime upon averments of fraud or error and injury. 35 La. Ann. 35; 41 La. Ann. 493, 6 South. Rep. 505.

Foster & Broussard, for appellees.

(1) Where the question of legitimacy is not raised by the pleadings, but merely the question of heirship, it is sufficient to prove descent.

(2) Where a man introduces a woman to his friends as his wife, calls her his wife, and he and she live together publicly as man and wife until her death, and their children, born while they are thus living together, are reared and cared for as their legal offspring, at the common domicile, and bear the name of their father, the law will presume that they have been lawfully married, and that their children are legitimate, until it is shown that no marriage between them ever took place, or that it was void on account of some nullity established by law. 30 La. Ann. 1388.

(3) Marriage may be proved by every species of evidence not prohibited by law, which does not presuppose a higher species of evidence within the power of the party. 20 La. Ann. 97; 32 La. Ann. 308.

(4) The fact of marriage may be proved by circumstantial testimony, and by general reputation, cohabitation, and long residence together. 3 La. 33; 35 La. Ann. 630.

(5) It is not to be presumed that those who hold themselves out in society as man and wife, are rearing a family of children at their domestic board, to whom the father gives his name, over whom he exercises a parent's authority and administration, a parent's protection and support, are living in open disregard of public morals and common decency, and that their offspring are bastards. 6 La. 470; 30 La. Ann. 1397; 2 La. Ann. 945.

(6) It will be presumed that the community of acquets and gains exist between the husband and wife, until the contrary is shown. 30 La. Ann. 1106.

(7) Where, after the marriage and under the régime of the community, a business which had formerly belonged to and been conducted by the wife is conducted in the name of the husband, it becomes the business of the community. 36 La. Ann. 390.

(8) Lands purchased in the name of the wife, and partly with her paraphernal funds, under the administration of the husband, and partly with the funds of the community, fall into the community. 39 La. Ann. 377, 1 South. Rep. 913.

(9) The presumption of law is that property purchased during the marriage, whether in the name of both or either spouse, is community property. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2402. The wife may rebut this presumption, in doing which the burden of proof of three crucial facts is upon her, to-wit: First, paraphernality of the funds; second, administration thereof separately and apart from her husband; third, investment by her, (39 La. Ann. 632, 2 South. Rep. 98;) in the absence of which proof the property will be presumed to be community.

(10) Legal heirs, up to the amount of their légitime, are not estopped by the declaration in the act of sale from proving that property bought in the wife's name, declared to be bought with her funds, is community property. 30 La. Ann. 1036; 33 La. Ann. 609, 819; 35 La. Ann. 33, 570.

(11) Legal heirs are not estopped by the declaration in the act of sale from proving that property bought in the wife's name, declared to be bought with her funds in community property, when these funds are purely speculative, and evidence appears in the declaration itself affording full proof of the fact that the wife had no funds whatever with which to meet the obligation contracted in the act of sale.

(12) The court may, ex proprio motu, where it does not appear affirmatively that the amount involved exceeds $2,000, dismiss the appeal. 34 La. Ann. 406; 38 La. Ann. 395; 36 La. Ann. 419.

(13) The object of pleading is to place the opposite party on his guard, and to give him full notice of the grounds of defense. See Hennen's Dig. p. 1156, No. 1, and authorities.

(14) Some pleas are special, and, when so, they must be specially pleaded, and must be full and complete, so as not to surprise the opposite party. See 1 La. 283; 24 La. Ann. 288.

(15) The general allegation that plaintiffs are not heirs does not justify the rejection of evidence on grounds urged for the first time in a bill of exception, when said grounds are special pleas, and should have been specially pleaded.

(16) Courts will not decide that evidence was offered and admitted for a purpose brought to its knowledge only by a bill of exception, when the record is silent as to the purpose for which it was offered. The presumption under such circumstances is that it is offered for whatever it will prove, and full weight will be given to it as such. 30 La. Ann. 397.

(17) The court a qua was correct in overruling the objection and admitting the evidence.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a petitory action against parties in possession. Originally it was brought by William Castanie and Mary Bouleries, against Ed. Laughlin and Therese Bouleries. Mary Bouleries having died, William Castanie, her brother, had himself appointed administrator of her estate, and in that capacity continued the prosecution of the suit.

The action was for the recovery of the undivided half of four pieces of real estate,—two in the possession of Laughlin, and two in that of Therese Bouleries.

The plaintiffs claimed as the legitimate grandchildren of J. B. Bouleries,—the first named, through his mother, Delphine; the second, through her father, Levy,—representing themselves as their lawful issue.

The contention is, on one side, that J. B. Bouleries had married, very long ago, Adele Chacata; that from their union several children were born, all of whom died, save Delphine and Levy; that the former married B. C. Castanie, and William being the issue of that union; that the latter also married, and that Mary Bouleries was born from that marriage; that after the death of Adele Chacata, the grandmother, J. B. Bouleries married Therese Mailles, then widow of Bernard Delord; that during that marriage four pieces of real estate were acquired for the benefit of the community; that at the death of J. B. Bouleries half of said property vested in his widow and the remaining half in his legal heirs, namely, his grandchildren, William Castanie and Mary Bouleries; that two of said pieces of real estate were sold by the widow, as though her exclusive property, to Laughlin, who could only acquire her share; that the widow is in possession of the remaining half of the other two pieces, which belongs to the grandchildren by inheritance from their grandfather, J. B. Bouleries. It is further insisted that the widow is liable for rents and revenues from the beginning of the illegal possession to the time of surrender to the rightful owners. On the other hand, Laughlin claimed an absolute title to the entirety of the two lots sold to him by the widow, as the same was her personal and exclusive property. The widow contended—First, that the plaintiffs were not the legitimate grandchildren of J. B. Bouleries; and, second, even then, that the two lots were her paraphernal property, acquired with her individual funds, under her separate administration, and invested by her in the purchase. Eventually, under the averment that she had in good faith constructed buildings and placed improvements on the lots, the widow, reconvening, claimed the value thereof. A good deal of proof was admitted, (some over objections,) consisting of documentary evidence and oral testimony. There was judgment in favor of Laughlin, from which no appeal was taken, and which must remain undisturbed. Further, there was judgment in favor of plaintiffs, recognizing them as the legitimate grandchildren of J. B. Bouleries, declaring one of the two lots to be community property, and estopping them from claiming any title to the other lot. The judgment went no further. It proved satisfactory to neither side. The plaintiffs appealed, and ask a recognition of their rights to the second lot, and to rents and revenues; and the defendant Therese Bouleries, as appellee, prays for an amendment of the judgment, by reversing it in so far as it went in favor of the plaintiff, and eventually by allowing her the value of the buildings and improvements placed by her on the lots in good faith.

It is clear that, in order to recover from one claiming title to real estate, of which he is in possession, a plaintiff can only do so on the strength of his own title. In order to succeed in the present action, the plaintiffs ought to have established the marriage of J. B. Bouleries with Adele Chacata, either by the act of celebration, or, in its default, by witnesses, or by very strong circumstances establishing a presumption of marriage, and, besides, the marriages of their respective authors; in all of which they have altogether failed. The legal propositions relied upon by the plaintiffs, touching the circumstances from which the presumption of a marriage arises, and which are to a certain extent set forth in the authorities cited from the adjudicated cases in this state, and to which no special reference would subserve any useful purpose, cannot be and are not disputed by the defendant, who, on the contrary, readily concedes them. The difficulty consists in applying them to the facts established in this controversy, which, far from leaving on the mind an impression of such presumption, rather dispel all inclination to receive the same. It does not appear from the written evidence or from the oral testimony that either J. B. Bouleries or Adele Chacata ever represented themselves as having been married, ever alluded to any circumstance about their marriage, or that any one was ever heard to say that he had attended their marriage, or had heard any one mention anything about it as an actually occurred fact. No effort is shown to have been made to discover any written evidence of it, either in the records of a church or of any public office in the vicinity of the place where they resided, and at which, if celebrated, it occurred. The very brother of J. B. Bouleries, who was on intimate terms with him all his life, was heard as a witness, and he utters not a word about the fact of the marriage, which certainly, had it ever taken place, would have been in some way—at least by hearsay—to his knowledge. The manner in which he testifies shows that he does not really believe they ever were actually married. The other witnesses heard do not state any circumstance from which the presumption of the marriage may be inferred. The mere fact that the parties lived publicly as man and wife for a length of time, and treated their issue as though they were born in lawful wedlock, under the surrounding circumstances of this case is insufficient to raise the presumption claimed. The defendant, who was heard as a witness, testified that Bouleries told her that he had never married Adele Chacata, and that their children were illegitimate. Of course, this testimony, coming from the party interested in making such statement, as emanating from one whose mouth, sealed in death, cannot be heard counter to it, is very weak; but, feeble as it is, it is entitled to some weight. It cannot be presumed that the woman has perjured herself, particularly as her character for truth and veracity remains altogether unimpeached. It is not contended in the least—on the contrary, it is conceded—that the proof clearly establishes a natural filiation of the plaintiffs way back to J. B. Bouleries and Adele Chacata; but, even if the proof had shown that the former had duly acknowledged, in the form prescribed by law, both Delphine and Levy as his children, and, besides, William and Mary as his grandchildren, this would not have conferred, upon the latter the right and privilege of revendication accorded by law to forced heirs, whenever their légitime has been trenched upon in some way or other.

The documentary evidence shows that the two lots were acquired by the defendant with the expressed statement that they were purchased out of her personal funds, and for her separate advantage and exclusive benefit, or language to that effect; the investment thus declared to have been made having been admitted by J. B. Bouleries, who has signed the deed. The plaintiffs, not having the rights of forced heirs, and not being creditors urging injury, etc., have no standing in court to contest the title of the defendant to the lots, who, we think, has even then satisfactorily proved them to be her separate estate, which has, therefore, never formed part of the community between Bouleries and her. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed, so far as it recognizes title in plaintiffs to the half of one of the two lots involved; that, so far as it is rendered in favor of defendant Therese Bouleries, it be affirmed; and it is further adjudged that it be so amended as to reject the plaintiff's demand entirely, and to quiet defendants absolutely in the ownership and possession of said lots; the costs of appeal to be paid by the plaintiffs and appellants.

BREAUX, J., recuses himself, as having been of counsel.

ON REHEARING.

Alleging themselves to be the sole surviving descendants of J. B. Bouleries, their grandfather, the plaintiffs institute this action against his surviving widow of an alleged second marriage and one of her transferees for the recovery of their said ancestor's one-half interest in certain real estate, which was acquired during said second marriage. Plaintiffs' contention is that very many years ago their grandfather was married to Adele Chacata, and that of this marriage their parents, Delphine and Levy Bouleries, were the sole surviving issue. The answer of the defendants is a general denial, coupled with the special averment that the plaintiffs are not heirs of J. B. Bouleries, and that the property in dispute was and is not community, but belongs to his widow's separate paraphernal estate. Our opinion holds with the defendants' theory on both of these propositions. It declaims substantially that there is in the record no proof of such a marriage, or even that the said parties ever declared that they were or ever had been married. No one was ever heard to say that he had witnessed the celebration of a marriage between them. That the plaintiffs appear to have made no search in the records of any church or public office of the vicinity of where said parties lived for written or record proof of such a marriage. It then announces as a proposition of law that "the mere fact that the parties lived publicly" as man and wife for a length of time, and "treated their issue as though they were born in lawful wedlock," is insufficient, under the "circumstances surrounding this case, to raise the presumption claimed." It then states as an additional fact worthy of note that the proof abundantly discloses, and that it is conceded by defendants to be a fact, that there was a filiation between said parties for many years; but it announces as a legal proposition that, even if the plaintiffs' ancestor had duly acknowledged their father and mother as his natural children in the form prescribed by law, this acknowledgment would not have conferred upon the plaintiffs as their children the rights and privileges of revendication of property which the law accords forced heirs in case their légitime had been trenched upon. Our opinion then states as a fact (and this proposition is to be taken alternatively) that it appears from the defendant's titles that she purchased the property in her own paraphernal right, with the concurrence of her husband, J. B. Bouleries, who joined his wife thereon, and that plaintiffs have no standing in court, as forced heirs or creditors would, to attack them.

The objections urged in plaintiffs' and appellees' application to our opinion are: (1) That the defendants' answer does not fairly raise the question of the legitimacy of their parentage; that the maintenance of that proposition was and is a surprise to them, and that our judgment and decree should have been one of nons uit only. (2) That the defendants' deeds contain no recital disclosing the paraphernal character of the acquisition. (3) That the proof introduced aliunde was insufficient to establish that fact, which is essential to remaintain defendants' title. (a) As plaintiffs' title was alleged to be one by inheritance, and the answer denied their heirship, definite proof was absolutely required of plaintiffs' legitimate heirship to entitle them to recover from a stranger; and in thus instituting suit they incurred this risk, and the burden of making such proof. We cannot understand in what manner they were taken by surprise; but if the interpretation placed by the district judge upon defendants' answer caused them surprise, the proper course would have been for their counsel to have then stated the grounds of surprise, demanded a continuance, and reserved a bill of exceptions to the judge's declaration, if refused. On such a showing we could have given plaintiffs relief from any error the judge below might have committed. We are of opinion that the defendants are fully entitled to the judgment pronounced. (b) Our opinion does not hold that defendant Therese Bouleries is the owner in her individual paraphernal right of the property in controversy, but that plaintiffs have no standing in court, as legitimate grandchildren of J. B. Bouleries, to have the titles interpreted, and the property declared community property. That, even if the proof had disclosed the fact that their grandfather had, duly and in proper form of law, acknowledged the issue of his filiation with Adele Chacata as his natural children, such acknowledgment could not have conferred upon such issue the rights and privileges of forced heirs of their grandfather; and hence their position would not have been improved. Now, it is worthy of note that this proposition is hypothetically stated, and not as one that is substantiated by proof. A reexamination of the record fails to satisfy our minds of the correctness of the allegations of the application. We are unable to find any proof of marriage or acknowledgment either. Really the application does not contend that there is any such evidence in the record. Reduced to a last analysis, the ingenious argument is that, as the judgment should have been one of nonsuit, therefore the legitimacy of the plaintiffs is an undetermined question, and therefore they still have the status of forced heirs, and the corresponding rights of forced heirs to revendicate the property. It does not avail the plaintiffs to invoke the ruling in Bennett v. Cignoni, 41 La. Ann. 1145, 8 South. Rep. 544, in which a nonsuit was rendered. The court did so because the plaintiffs there had failed to introduce evidence which was within his reach; but it is not pretended in the present instance that any such proof exists. It is claimed, on the contrary, that all the evidence of which the case was susceptible was introduced. The plaintiffs have no right to keep a perpetual sword hanging over defendant's head by the reserve of a right to eternal litigation. Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium. Having maintained the finality of the judgment, their argument is fully answered, and the correctness of the opinion established. Rehearing refused.

BARNARD, Sheriff and Tax Collector, v. GALL et al. (No. 1,405.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. July Term, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EXEMPTION FROM LICENSE TAX—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—LEGISLATIVE INTENT.

1. The legislature has the right to exempt any business or occupation from license tax, and no license can be exacted not imposed by the terms of the law.

2. The general license act of 1890 was designed to formulate complete and exclusive regulations for license taxation for 1891 and succeeding years, and operated the supersession and repeal of the prior act of 1886, so far as relates to common subject-matter.

3. Courts may take judicial cognizance of the official journals of the houses of the general assembly, in order to aid them in ascertaining the true legislative purpose and intent, when the same is doubtful.

4. When the legislative intent is clear, the court should enforce it, and should not resort to artful construction in order to defeat it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberia.

Edward Weeks, for appellant.

(1) Section 3 of Act No. 150 of session of 1890 imposes a license on all manufactories not expressly exempted by articles 206 and 207 of the state constitution. Saw-mills are manufactories, (35 La. Ann. 998; 38 La. Ann. 398; 41 La. Ann. 996, 6 South. Rep. 893; 42 La. Ann. 1119, 8 South. Rep. 399,) but are not exempted by the constitution. Hence they are liable to license under section 3 of Act 150 of 1890.

(2) Where an act expressly declares that it repeals only such portions of existing laws as conflict with it, this expression must govern; and such portions of existing laws as do not conflict with it continue in full force and effect. Suth. St. Const. §§ 147, 155, 288, 327; 39 La. Ann. 441, 1 South. Rep. 923; Saund. Tax'n, 246; 23 La. Ann. 140; 16 La. Ann. 379; 20 La. Ann. 140, and authorities.

(3) Courts will not take judicial cognizance of legislative journals. Lottery Mandamus Suit (State v. Mason,) 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 776; 23 La. Ann. 376; 42 La. Ann. 1006, 8 South. Rep. 530; 33 La. Ann. 963; 28 La. Ann. 415.

Walter J. Burke, for appellees.

In an act imposing a license tax for a particular year, "and for each subsequent year, upon each person, association of persons, or business firms, pursuing any trade, vocation, calling, or business, except those expressly exempt by articles 206 and 207 of the constitution," when the legislature has failed to name specifically any particular avocation, etc., among those to be subject to a license tax, the inference is that it was not intended to have been subjected to the license tax. State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 South. Rep. 727; Forman v. Board, 35 La. Ann. 825; New Orleans Cotton Exchange v. Board of Assessors, Id. 1154; Cooley, Tax'n, p. 102; Suth. St. Const. p. 457 et seq.

When necessary, the court may refer to the journal of the house of representatives, and of the senate, when seeking the intent of the law-maker. Suth. St. Const. § 300; Whart. Ev. § 296; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, (2d Ed.) 54; Gardner v. Wall, 6 Wall. 508; South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260.

The power granted to the legislature to levy a license tax is discretionary, and not mandatory. The state may abstain from imposing a license tax on any occupation, etc. City of New Orleans v. Mule, 38 La. Ann. 826; City of New Orleans v. Bank, 32 La. Ann. 82; State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 South. Rep. 727.

If two statutes relate to the same subject-matter, though not in terms repugnant or inconsistent, if the latter one is plainly intended to prescribe the only rule that shall govern, it will repeal the earlier. Sedg. St. & Const. Law, pp. 104, 154; 12 La. Ann. 432; Suth. St. Const. 104; King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 312; Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 601.

When a statute is destined to embody all the law upon any subject-matter, the provisions of anterior laws on the same subject-matter, treating it in a different manner, are repealed by the following clause in the last act: "All laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed," even though there be no apparent repugnancy in the provisions of both acts.

FENNER, J. The parties are agreed as to all the facts, and the sole question presented for our determination is one of law, to-wit, whether or not the existing law of the state subjects the business of conducting a saw-mill to license taxation. It is fully settled by prior decisions that the power granted to the legislature to levy license taxes is discretionary, and not mandatory, and that the legislature may exempt or abstain from taxing, by way of license, any particular business or occupation. City of New Orleans v. Mule, 38 La. Ann. 826; City of New Orleans v. Bank, 32 La. Ann. 82; State v. Dupre, 42 La. Ann. 561, 7 South. Rep. 727. The existing general license act was passed in 1890. The act in force prior thereto was the act of 1886. These two acts bear similar titles, cover the same general subject-matter, pursue the same order, and adopt the same subdivisions of the subjects of taxation. Indeed, it requires close study to discover the few differences between them. Under the head "Miscellaneous," the ninth section of each act provides for the licensing of a large number of businesses therein enumerated. After a very close scrutiny, we discover these sections of the two acts to be identical in every respect, with the single exception that the act of 1886 embraces the word "saw-mills" in its enumeration of the businesses taxed, whereas he act of 1890 omits it. Out of this difference arises the controversy. The tax collector, in support of his demand for license, contends that the omission of "saw-mills" from the enumeration in the act of 1890 is of no effect, because the act contains no general repealing clause, but only provides "that all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed." He contends that there is no conflict between the section of the act of 1886, which expressly taxes the business of saw-mills, and that of 1890, which simply omits to tax it; and therefore that this provision of the act of 1886 is unrepealed, and remains in force. We cannot approve this view. It seems to us perfectly clear that the act of 1890 was designed to formulate complete and exclusive regulations for the license taxes to be imposed for the year 1891 and subsequent years on all persons, associations of persons, or business firms and corporations, pursuing any trade, profession, vocation, calling, or business, as declared in its title. It is not a question of consistency or inconsistency of the two acts; it is a question of the supersession of the former by the later act. The rule is well settled, as declared by Mr. Sedgwick, that, even though the two statutes be not repugnant or inconsistent, yet if they related to the same subject-matter, and the later statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule that shall govern, it will repeal the former act. Sedg. St. & Const. Law, pp. 100, 104. Our view is expressed in the very words of the United States supreme court in an analogous case: "A careful comparison of these two sections can leave no doubt that it was the legislative intention, by the latter statute, to revise the entire matter to which they both had reference, to make such changes in the law as it stood as they thought best, and to substitute their will, in that regard, entirely, for the old law on that subject. We are of opinion that it was their intention to make a new law; and that law, embracing all that was intended to be preserved of the old, omitting what was not so intended, became complete in itself, and repealed all other laws on the subject embraced within it." Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 601; King v. Cornell, 106 U. S. 395, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 312.

We are also referred to the official journal of the house of representatives, showing that the act of 1890, as originally presented, contained the word "saw-mills," and that an express amendment to strike it out was offered and adopted. Strenuous objection is made to our considering this reference, on the ground that the journal was not offered in evidence on the trial. Authorities are quoted to the effect that private statutes will not receive judicial cognizance unless offered in evidence, but these authorities do not cover the present point. The official journals to be kept by the houses of the general assembly are prescribed and regulated by the constitution. They constitute official records, and import presumptive verity. High authorities maintain the right of courts to refer to them in order to ascertain the purpose and intent of the statute, when not clearly expressed. Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th Ed.) p. 164; Suth. St. Const. p. 300; Whart. Ev. pp. 269, 290; Sedg. St. & Const Law, 54; Gardner v. Collector, 6 Wall. 508. This court has frequently taken cognizance of such journals. Jones v. Sheriff, 35 La. Ann. 999; Planting, etc., Co. v. Green, 39 La. Ann. 461, 1 South. Rep. 873. This amendment establishes very clearly the legislative intent to exclude the business of saw-mills from license taxation. It is claimed, however, that saw-mills are covered by paragraph 1 of section 3 of the act of 1890, which imposes a license tax on "each business of manufacturing not expressly exempt by articles 206 and 207 of the constitution." This clause is copied from the prior act of 1886. It did not, in that act, embrace saw-mills, because they were expressly provided for in section 9. It would be a very strained and unreasonable construction to extend the meaning of the same clause in the act of 1890 so as to embrace saw-mills, when the legislature had just manifested its purpose to exempt saw-mills by striking them out of the enumeration in section 9. This would be to defeat, instead of enforcing, the manifest legislative intent. We think the court below did not err in rejecting the tax collector's demand. Judgment affirmed.

Succession of JAN. (No. 1,398.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. July Term, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

JUDGE—DISQUALIFICATION—INTEREST.

1. A judge is disqualified to pass on the homologation of an account when the assignee of a claim transferred by him attempts to enforce its payment by an opposition to the account.

2. Although the claim has been transferred without recourse, yet there is an implied warranty as to the existence of the debt, and the judge is interested to this extent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Martin.

In the mat er of the estate of A. M. F. Jan. Opposition of Robert Martin and others. Motion to recuse JAMES E. MOUTON, the district judge, denied. The administrator appeals. Reversed.

Felix Voorhies, for appellant.

A judge is disqualified to pass on the homologation of an executor's account, when the assignee of a claim transferred by him attempts to enforce this claim by an opposition to the account.

In such a case, a motion for his recusation should prevail. Succession of Rhea, 31 La. Ann. 324.

A judgment overruling the recusation of the regular judge of a court is not an interlocutory decree, but a final judgment, which may be appealed from. State v. Judge, 42 La. Ann. 317, 7 South. Rep. 586.

Edward Lima and Louis J. Voorhies, for appellees.

The judge of the lower court is recusable only when he is clearly interested in the alleged cause of interest.

Opponents and appellees submit the motion alleges interest. There is no error in the judgment of the court entered on the minutes, to-wit: "That Judge JAMES E. MOUTON was not recusable, because he was not interested in the oppositions to be tried." Act No. 40 of 1880, Code Prac. art. 338.

MCENERY, J. In this case a motion was made to recuse the district judge, JAMES E. MOUTON. The motion was referred to the Honorable O. C. MOUTON, judge of the twenty-fifth judicial district, who denied the motion. The judge, JAMES E. MOUTON, was a member of the law firm of Mouton & Martin before his elevation to the district bench. This firm obtained a judgment against a debtor for the decedent. Before he qualified, Judge MOUTON transferred all his fees for legal services due said firm to his former law partner, Robert Martin. This transfer was made without recourse, and he was not to return the cash amount which he received for them whether the fees were collectible or not. The administrator for the succession of Jan filed his account refusing to allow the fee for services rendered by Mouton & Martin in recovering the judgment for Jan against the debtor. For this reason Robert Martin opposed the account. Hence the motion for the recusation of the judge by the administrator of the succession of Jan.

When JAMES E. MOUTON transferred this account for fees, among others, there was an implied warranty as to its existence. The transfer without recourse went no further than to warrant against the insolvency of the debtor. To the existence of the debt there was an implied warranty. Civil Code, art. 2646. To this extent the district judge was interested. In Succession of Rhea, 31 La. Ann. 324, this court said: "The decree of a court should be not only impartial, but no pretext should, as a stepping-stone, be allowed to stand between its impartiality and even the most unreasonable suspicion; for, as well said, praise is without feet, and the wings of blame are swifter than the winds." We have no doubt that the district judge felt perfectly disinterested. There also can be no doubt that his pecuniary interest in the litigation was very remote; too remote to influence his judgment. But, nevertheless, there was an interest, however remote and distant, sufficient to incite the tongue of the disappointed to the most unreasonable suspicion. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, awarded, and reversed; and it is further ordered that this case be remanded, to be proceeded with according to the view herein expressed, and according to law; the succession to pay the costs of appeal.

DEROUEN v. DAVIDSON et al. (No. 1,407.)

SALE BY BOUNDARIES—LOCATION.

A sale of property described by boundaries, where one of them cannot be definitely fixed and ascertained, is not a sale per aversionem. Where one of the boundaries is described as by donor's lands, and no limit is fixed where the boundary is to commence, it is not a sale within fixed limits, and a sale per aversionem.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberia.

Action by Oscar Derouen, under-tutor, against W. L. Davidson and other. Preliminary injunction dissolved. Plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Walter J. Burke, for appellant.

When two descriptions of property on their face differ, parol evidence is admissible to prove that they are descriptions of one identical tract.

One who recognizes another's title to a thing is not estopped forever after from claiming that thing by a title translative of property and of subsequent date to the recognition.

Rights of parties cannot be affected by the acts or admissions of third persons.

If any one sells or alienates a piece of land from one fixed boundary to another fixed boundary, the purchaser takes all the lands between such bounds, although it gives him a greater quantity of land than is called for in his title, and although the surplus exceed the twentieth part of the quantity mentioned in his title. Civil Code, art. 850; Landry v. Tullier, 9 La. Ann. 100; 9 Rob. (La.) 250; 2 Rob. (La.) 357; 12 Mart. (La.) 425.

Full effect must be given to evidence received without objection, although the pleadings do not put the point at issue. 16 La. Ann. 278; 15 La. Ann. 389, 804; 18 La. Ann. 328; 20 La. Ann. 241.

Parol evidence is admissible to prove error in an act, in the description or quantity of land sold, etc.

If one claim more than is due him, he should nevertheless have judgment for what is actually due him. Code Prac. art. 155.

Property of the wife transferred to her by a dation en paiement cannot be seized to satisfy a judgment claim against the husband. 24 La. Ann. 138.

L. O. Hacker, for appellee.

(1) The fact that, in a sale per aversionem, the purchaser acquires all the land between the boundaries mentioned, though it exceeds by far the quantity mentioned in the act, is founded upon the presumption that such were the intentions of the parties at the time of the passage of the act, and it must so appear in the act itself.

(2) To constitute a sale per aversionem, there must be fixed boundaries, otherwise the object is not described; and therefore quantity must govern. A sale which recites, "bounded on the north by vendor and on the south by unknown," is not a sale per aversionem for want of fixed boundaries.

(3) A sale of 14 arpents of land, when the land is well known to the parties, and the exact quantity has been by them previously ascertained, cannot be extended to comprise 200 arpents, on the plea that it is a sale per aversionem.

MCENERY, J. The defendant is a judgment creditor of one Tiburce Norés. He issued a fi. fa. on his judgment, and seized and advertised for sale certain property, seized as the property of said Norés. Previous to the seizure he made a dation en paiement to his wife, who afterwards died leaving several minor children, the issue of her marriage with Norés. A description of a part of the immovable property comprising the dation is as follows: "One tract of land situated in Iberia parish, bounded north by donor; south by Stansbury; south by Gall & Hebert; east by Mitcheltree and unknown; and west by Hardy. Said tract contains 14 arpents, more or less, and all improvements." The validity of the dation en paiement is not questioned. The defendant Davidson seized under his judgment the land embraced within this description, which contains 200 acres. The minor children of the deceased Mrs. Norés, by their under-tutor, enjoined the execution of the judgment upon this property, alleging that it is the identical property given in payment to their mother by their father. If the sale was one per aversionem, there can be no doubt as to the correctness of their contention. They would be entitled to all the land contained within the designated boundaries, regardless of quantity. In a sale per aversionem the boundaries must be fixed and certain, so as to give evidence of the intention of the parties to convey the land within the designated and specified boundaries, without reference to the quantity. In the description of this property the limits are not so fixed as to show that it was the intention to convey a specified body of land. The donor owned the land to the north. There is no limit fixed to the northern boundary. As he, the donor, owned all the land from the south boundary to the extent of his ownership north, there is no means in the description of locating where the lands of the donor should mark the limits of the lands donated. In order to fix the northern boundary, it is necessary to compute the area by arpents to ascertain the northern limit of the land donated. It is evident, therefore, that only 14 arpents, the amount of land designated in the dation en paiement, were conveyed to the donee, the measurement commencing from the south boundary. Fourteen acres of this land rightfully belonged to the minors. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended, so that the order dissolving the injunction shall apply only to 186 acres of land embraced within the description of the property in the sheriff's return on the execution. In other respects it is affirmed, the appellee to pay costs of the appeal.

LAUDRY v. BROUSSARD. (No. 1,402.)

ESTOPPEL.

Where there has been a destruction of titles to property, and a party wishing to purchase goes to the original owner of the property for information, and he disclaims title to the same, and joins in a deed relinquishing all claims to the same, he is estopped from setting up title to the property against the party whom he induced to purchase the same.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Vermillion.

Action by Leo Laudry against Semar Broussard. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis L. Bourges, for appellant.

(1) A plea of estoppel cannot be maintained where it appears that the party against whom the plea is directed was ignorant of the truth relating to the matter which formed the subject of the plea. 33 La. Ann. 1194; 38 La. Ann. 100, 813.

(2) A person, who under the belief that a certain state of facts exists, and without any intention to defraud another, makes certain statements to that other person, which induces him to do an act, is not estopped by those statements which he believed to be true at the time. 34 La. Ann. 816; 10 Lea, 406.

(3) Two things are necessary to create an estoppel in pais: (1) An intent to defraud, or an assertion known by the party who made it to be false at the time he makes it; and (2) an injury caused to the person who pleads the estoppel by the assertion so made. 12 Wis. 112, 125; 105 Ill. 318; 104 Ill. 49; 150 Mass. 324, 23 N. E. Rep. 101; 80 Ala. 145.

(4) A vendee, who has recourse against his vendor for the reimbursement of his outlay, cannot plead injury, and the vendee in this case can have such recourse.

White & Broussard, for appellee.

(1) When, in describing the property conveyed, a sheriff's deed refers specially to a patent, such patent, to all intents and purposes, becomes incorporated in the deed; and the description contained in it will, in case of doubt, control in determining what property is sold. 9 Rob. (La.) 30; 18 La. Ann. 290; Henen's Dig. 1337, Nos. 6, 13; 26 La. Ann. 254.

(2) A party who has led another to believe in the existence of a certain state of facts, and to act upon the faith of such assurances, cannot afterwards deny his representations to the prejudice of the person who has thereby been misled or induced to alter his position. 30 La. Ann. 1040; 12 La. Ann. 473; 9 La. Ann. 528; 5 La. Ann. 368; 4 La. Ann. 293; 5 Rob. (La.) 523; also 1 La. Ann. 11; 6 La. Ann. 274, 349; 30 La. Ann. 50; 96 U. S. 659.

(3) The effect of an estoppel cannot be defeated by a plea of error, when the error assigned is inexcusable, and results from gross negligence, or a reckless disregard of the right of others. Sedg. & Waite, Tr. Tit. Land, §§ 845–847; 42 La. Ann. 242, 599.

(4) Where one of two parties must suffer a loss, it should be borne by the one who is in fault, rather than by the one whom he has misled or deceived. 34 La. Ann. 912.

(5) A title by prescription results when a party and his authors hold, in good faith, peaceable possession as owners, under a title translative of property, for a period of 10 years. Civil Code, arts. 3478–3487, inclusive, and Id. art. 3493.

McENERY, J. The plaintiff obtained from the United States government a patent to lots 1 and 2, section 28, and lots 1 and 2, section 34, in township 12 S., of range 4 E., in the district of lands subject to sale at Opelousas, La., containing 123.13 acres. This land the plaintiff mortgaged to one Judice. The mortgage was foreclosed many years ago, and the lots 1 and 2, section 34, were sold, according to the procès-verbal, with some town lots, also mortgaged, in the town of Abbeville. Although the lots 1 and 2, in section 28, do not appear in the procès-verbal, they were seized to satisfy the mortgage debt. The lots 1 and 2, section 34, were described as containing the amount of land patented to the plaintiff. Daniel O. Bryan became the purchaser of the property lots 1 and 2, section 34, described as containing 123.13 acres, the amount of land in the patent. He took possession of all the property which was mortgaged, including lots 1 and 2, section 28. Lots 1 and 2, section 34, were inventoried as containing the above amount of acres, and, at his succession sale, sold in the same manner. The property lots 1 and 2, described as containing 123.13 acres, went through various transfers, all the purchasers taking possession of and acting as owners of lots 1 and 2, section 28. The plaintiff during all these years lived in the neighborhood of the property, and was under the impression that lots 1 and 2, section 28, had been sold to satisfy the mortgage debt, and purchased by Bryan. He was present at the sale. He at no time, until the institution of this suit, set up any claim to the property, or asserted any rights to it. The court-house in the town of Abbeville was destroyed by fire, and valuable records destroyed. The titles to the property in controversy shared the same fate. In the transfer of property in the parish of Vermillion it was, of course, necessary to be careful in the transfer of property, and, as far as possible, to reinstate deeds. Semar Broussard, desiring to become the owner of the property in controversy, refused to purchase the same, without a renunciation of title to lots 1 and 2, section 28, by the plaintiff. Broussard, induced by the representations of the plaintiff, purchased from one Frasemond Babineaux, for the price of $994, lots 1 and 2, section 28, which had before this sale been omitted in the deeds in the several transfers; but described as to quantity. In this sale, made in May, 1887, the plaintiff joined in the act of sale, and declared on his part as follows: "And to these presents personally appeared and intervened Leo Laudry, of said parish, the original owner of said land, and from whom said land, with others, had been seized in the suit of Judice v. Leo Laudry, and purchased by the late Daniel O. Bryan at said sheriff's sale some twenty-two years ago; that since that time he laid no claim in and to the land herein conveyed; and ratifies said sheriff's deed for said land, and abandons and relinquishes all claims, rights, titles, and demands in and to the tract herein conveyed." This deed was read to the plaintiff, and a map of the land exhibited to him, and lots 1 and 2, of section 28, pointed out to him. After the execution of this deed he brought this petitory action to recover back said lots 1 and 2, section 28, on the grounds that the property had never been sold, and that the above declaration on his part was an error of fact, the existence of which he did not know when he appeared and signed said deed. There was judgment below rejecting his demand, and he has appealed.

The presence of the plaintiff at the first sale, over 22 years ago, his silence during the time of the various transfers of the property, and its occupancy by the purchasers as owners, his final abandonment of all claim or title to it, and his belief that the property had been sold to satisfy the mortgage debt, lead us to believe, although there is no evidence of this fact, in consequence of the destruction of the records and the sheriff's deed, that the property was actually offered for sale, and adjudicated to Bryan, and its omission by the description of the lots and section was an error on the part of the sheriff in the procès-verbal, as the quantity of the land stated therein corresponds with the amount in the patent to the plaintiff. Under this state of facts, we are of opinion that the plea of estoppel must prevail. The records having been destroyed, the plaintiff was the person to give the defendant, Broussard, correct information as to the title to the property. He acted on this information, and purchased the property in controversy. Broussard obtained the information in good faith, and practiced no fraud or artifice on the plaintiff to obtain it. It may be a hardship on the plaintiff to lose his property, but it is through his own fault and negligence, and he must bear it, as the defendant is innocent of any wrong, and purchased through the representations of the plaintiff. Where two innocent parties must suffer, he whose fault caused it must bear the infliction of the injury. Judgment affirmed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—OBJECTIONS TO TAKING—WAIVER.

1. Section 12 of the charter of M.'s L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. exempts it from suit outside of the city of New Orleans, except in cases of trespass.

2. Where a railroad enters upon the land of another in the course of its construction, and builds its road and road-bed, without opposition, upon the same, and the party makes no objection for several years, his act will be construed into a waiver. His claim against the road must be for compensation at the domicile of the company. He does not abandon his claim for compensation by the tacit waiver.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Landry.

Action by Jacob N. Payne and others against Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steam-Ship Company to recover land. Dismissed. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Kenneth Baillio, for appellants.

(1) * * * A variety of wrongs, having the common element of a use of force, whether direct or indirect. 33 La. Ann. 955. "Trespass" is defined to be an unlawful act committed with violence, vi et armis, on the person, property, or relative rights of another. 36 La. Ann. 187.

(2) The legislature contemplated the active violation of some right, or the doing of some illegal thing, acts of commission, which give rise to an action for damages; and that the rule does not apply to omissions, neglect, or failure to do. Wrongs of this class are excluded by the use of the words "commit" and "committed," and which necessarily imply action. 30 La. Ann. 609; 31 La. Ann. 566; 39 La. Ann. 29, 6 South. Rep. 9.

(3) It is a servitude due by the estate situated below to receive the waters which run naturally from the estate situated above, provided the industry of man has not been used to create that servitude. Civil Code, art. 660.

(4) He whose estate borders on running water may use it, as it runs, for the purpose of watering his estate, or for other purposes. He through whose estate water runs, whether it originates there or passes from lands above, may make use of it while it runs over his lands; but he cannot stop or give it another direction, and is bound to return it to its ordinary channel where it leaves his estate. Id. art. 661.

(5) The owner whose estate is inclosed, and who has no way to the public road, may claim the right of passage on the estate of his neighbors for the cultivation of his estate, but he is bound to indemnify them for the damage he may occasion. Id. art. 699.

(6) A passage must be furnished to the owner of the land surrounded by other lands, not only for himself and workmen, but for his animals, carts, instruments of agriculture, and everything which may be necessary for the use and working of his land. Id. art. 702.

(7) When the place for the passage is once fixed, he to whom this servitude has been granted cannot change it, but he who owes this servitude may change it from one to another, in order that it may be less convenient to him, provided that it afford the same facility to the owner of the servitude. Id. art. 703.

(9) Quasi contracts are the lawful and purely voluntary act of a man, from which there results any obligation whatever to a third person, and sometimes a reciprocal obligation between the parties. Id. art. 2293.

Leovy & Blair, H. L. Garland, and Laurent Dupre, for appellee.

(1) Under section 12 of its charter, Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steam-Ship Company must be sued at its domicile, except in cases of trespass, when the company may be sued in the parish where the trespass has taken place.

(2) The effect of said twelfth section of the charter of said company is to repeal, as far as said Morgan Company is concerned, all provisions in the Code of Practice inconsistent therewith.

(3) When the entry of a railroad company upon the land of the owner thereof is peaceable, and acquiesced in by him, when neither force nor violence is used in effecting said entry, and when said land is taken without any resistance or remonstrance on the part of said owner, by that peaceable entry on said land, the construction of a road-bed thereon, and the possession and operation of same, the land so taken passes irrevocably from said owner to the railroad company, and all that is left the owner is a right of action against said railroad company for compensatory damages.

MCENERY, J. The plaintiffs sue the defendant for the recovery of land now occupied by it as a railroad embankment in excess of what is necessary for railroad purposes. They also sue for the value of the strip of land occupied by the railroad embankment. They aver that, by the construction of the railroad embankment, the natural drains and ditches on this property have been obstructed, and the flow of water retarded, damaging them to the amount of $2,000. Suitable crossings, cattle-guards, culverts, etc., are demanded to be constructed for the plaintiffs by the defendant company. The defendant company filed an exception to the jurisdiction of the court, as follows: "That under section 12 of its charter suits cannot be brought against it outside of the parish of Orleans, except in cases of trespass; that the present suit is not one for trespass, and hence this honorable court [district court] is without jurisdiction to try the same." The exception was sustained and the suit dismissed. From this judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

From the face of the papers it will be perceived that the gravamen of plaintiffs' petition is (1) that the defendant company has taken possession of and holds 22.72 acres of land belonging to them, and is using same as a railroad track, on which it is running its passenger and freight trains,—the one-half of which plaintiffs' demand shall be restored to them in kind, and for the other half they claim a personal judgment for its value; (2) that the defendant company has, by its said embankment, entirely obstructed the drainage of the place, and they ask that said company be ordered to remove the said obstructions to drainage, and make the necessary openings in its track; (3) that said company has not constructed the necessary crossings and cattle-guards on its embankment, and it is asked that said company be required and ordered to make them at once.

It does not appear from the allegations in plaintiffs' petition that the defendant company committed a trespass upon that property by entering upon it unlawfully. The following averment in the petition negatives any idea of a trespass having been committed by the defendant company on the lands of the plaintiffs: Plaintiffs allege "that some time in the year 1882 Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steam-Ship Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, having its domicile in the city of New Orleans, and owning and operating railroads in other sections of the state, at that time entered upon, took possession of, and now has possession of same, certain tracts of land originally forming part of a plantation, situated on Bayou Bœuf, in St. Landry parish, about three miles above the town of Washington, known and called the 'Webb' or 'Cailigher' place, and built and constructed upon the said land so entered upon by them a railroad embankment or 'dump,' and placed on said embankment crossties and steel rails, over which said company has, ever since the year 1882, been running locomotives, and passenger and freight trains, whereon they have carried passengers and freight for hire, and have been operating same as a regular railroad ever since."

The obstruction of the drains and ditches, the failure to construct cattle-guards, and to make crossings, are merely incidental to the taking possession of plaintiffs' property, which was lawful and legal, at least was made so by plaintiffs, who permitted the railroad company to go on the property and construct its road thereon without remonstrance or complaint. The acquiescence of the plaintiffs in the construction of the road over their property, under the circumstances, which made it imperative upon them to resist or to remonstrate, will be construed into a waiver of any objections to the construction of the road-bed over their property. State v. Judge, 33 La. Ann. 955; St. Julien v. Railroad Co., 35 La. Ann. 924. The taking possession of the land of plaintiffs was not accomplished by violence, nor through the commission of a wrong, tort, or other illegal act. The plaintiffs made no resistance to the entry of the defendant, but acquiesced in it by long-continued non-action. St. Julien v. Railroad, etc., Co., 39 La. Ann. 1064, 3 South. Rep. 280. In the case of Caldwell v. Railroad Co., 40 La. Ann. 755, 5 South. Rep. 17, we said that "this court had distinctly announced the doctrine that, in case the owner of land permits its use and occupancy by a railroad company, and the construction upon it of a quasi public building, without resistance or complaint, he cannot thereafter require the demolition of the work, nor prevent its use by the company. * * * He cannot treat such entry as tortious, and sue the corporation as a trespasser at the place where the injury is alleged to have been sustained." The plaintiffs are entitled to bring their suit at the domicile of the company for compensation, damages, and land, including what is required for railroad purposes, etc., which right is reserved to them. Section 12 of the company's charter exempts it from suit out of New Orleans, except in cases of trespass. In this case no trespass was committed by the defendant company.

Judgment affirmed.

FENNER, J., recuses himself, on the ground of affinity to plaintiffs.

McWILLIAMS v. MICHEL et al. (No. 1,417.)

RIGHT TO APPEAL—TAX-SALES—VALIDITY OF ASSESSMENT.

1. When an appellant applies for and obtains an order of appeal to a court having no jurisdiction of the matter in dispute, the order is a nullity. He is not estopped from prosecuting his appeal in a court of competent jurisdiction.

2. An actual assessment of property and notice required by article 210 of the constitution are essential to a valid tax-sale of the property.

3. There is no actual assessment of property as contemplated by law when it is not assessed to the owner, and is confusedly assessed with other property.

4. Where the state sells public land, and issues a patent for it, the land-office at Baton Rouge is the proper place from which information should be obtained in order to assess it correctly. Rev. St. 2922. When the state sells public land, and the assessor places it on the assessment rolls, to a person not the owner, the state cannot take advantage of this defective assessment, and at tax-sale have the property adjudicated to her.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Martin.

Action by Jacob McWilliams against Justinien Michel and others to set aside a tax-deed and obtain an injunction. Preliminary injunction granted, but afterwards dissolved, and judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed. Perpetual injunction granted. Rehearing denied.

R. N. Sims and C. H. Mouton, for appellant.

(1) Plaintiff's title to the lands in controversy is complete and perfect. They were patented and sold by the state to Thomas Mille in 1860. After his death, his heirs went into possession, and at the partition sale made by the sheriff of Iberville, in 1877, they were acquired by the plaintiff, who has since held and possessed them.

(2) The tax-sale of these lands in 1872 with the lands adjudicated to Wilbert at the same partition sale, in 1877, in the name of Eugene Garandi, was an absolute nullity. Garandi had disappeared many years before, and had never owned a particle of interest in the property. The lands stood at the time in the registry office of the land department of the state in the name of Thomas Mille. The assessment in the name of Garandi was therefore a nullity, and could not form the basis of a valid tax-sale. Saund. Tax'n, 302; 26 La. Ann. 509, 30 La. Ann. 176; 32 La. Ann. 926; 34 La. Ann. 107; 35 La. Aun. 1086.

(3) The adjudication to Breaux and Duperier, in 1873, being a nullity, they acquired no title. They never claimed title, never acted as owners, and never desired or attempted to take or be placed in possession. The paper title evidencing the adjudication produced no effect, and could not form a basis for prescription. Breaux v. Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 502; 32 La. Ann. 237.

(4) The nullity of the adjudication to Breaux and Duperier, in 1873, involved the nullity of the assessment in their names in 1885, and, as a necessary consequence, the nullity of the adjudication to the state in their names in 1886. Besides, they were never notified to pay any taxes on the property, which notice was a condition precedent to a valid adjudication. Const. art. 210; Breaux v Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 502. The state never attempted to take possession under the adjudication of 1886, and, there being no adverse possession, prescription does not apply. Breaux v. Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 502; 32 La. Ann. 237.

(5) The lands assessed in the name of Breaux and Duperier, in 1885, had been separately assessed to their respective owners, plaintiff and the Wilberts, from 1881 to 1884, both inclusive. The assessment of both pieces of property confusedly to Breaux and Duperier constituted an additional nullity, which vitiated the adjudication based upon it. Act No 96 of 1882, § 18; Saund. Tax'n, 108; Welty, Assessm. § 112; 36 Me. 435; 63 Me. 382; 34 La. Aun. 196; Cooley, Tax'n, 295; Burroughs, Tax'n, 212-301; 51 Mo. 63; 6 Kan. 540; 32 La. Ann. 228; 42 La. Ann. 853, 8 South. Rep. 607.

(6) In Wilbert v. Michel, 42 La. Ann. 853, 8 South. Rep. 607, this court annulled and set aside the adjudication to the state in 1886, and that to the defendant in 1889. Those adjudications stand annulled for all purposes and as to all persons. They cannot be null in part and valid in part. The tax claimed was indivisible, and the adjudication in each instance was an indivisible act. Saund. Tax'n, 305; 34 La. Ann. 123; Burroughs, Tax'n, p. 301; 51 Mo. 63; 6 Kan. 540; Blackw. Tax-Titles, pp. 180, 181; 55 Miss. 26; 44 Mich. 561, 7 N. W. Rep. 160, 367; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 368.

(7) On the question of registry of titles, the advantage is with the plaintiff. The state could not ignore the title of Mille, which was extant upon her records. It was the duty of the state officers to follow up that title, and after the death of Mr. Mille to assess the property in 1871 and 1872 in the name of his estate, or of his heirs or their assigns, if known. The state officers could not by a fictitious assessment create a title for the purposes of future assessments, legally binding on the heirs of Mille or their vendees. Rev. St. 2922. The state could not plead want of registry of the Mille title in the parish of St. Martin, and the defendant is in no better position than the state would be. See cases cited under No. 9; Act No. 96 of 1882, § 18.

(8) Plaintiff had a perfect legal right to obtain a certificate of redemption from the auditor on the 2d of May, 1890. The adjudication to the state in his name in 1883 had never been filed for record or recorded in the recorder's office of St. Martin, and had not up to that day been filed or recorded in the auditor's office. The act of redemption did not and does not concern the defendant. It shows, however, in connection with the testimony of the auditor, that plaintiff does not owe the state one cent of taxes on the property in controversy. Statutes which give the right of redemption are to be regarded favorably and construed with liberality. Act No. 96 of 1882; Cooley, Tax'n, p. 363; 33 Pa. St. 94-97; 10 Wall. 464; 16 Wis. 594; 1 Rob. (La.) 421. On the other hand, the formalities which the law prescribes in the interest of the tax-payer or purchaser subsequent to the sale must be strictly complied with. Cooley, Tax'n, p. 365; Burroughs, Tax'n, p. 312; 9 Mo. 878. It is error to suppose that a certificate of redemption by the state constitutes a sale. The only effect is to replace the property in the position it was before the tax adjudication. Saund. Tax'n, p. 205. The application to redeem must be made within a year from the recordation of the adjudication to the state. Id. p. 206.

(9) The state having acquired no title under the adjudication in 1886 by reason of the antecedent radical defects in the proceedings, it is perfectly well settled that she could convey no title to the defendant under the sale made in 1889, in pursuance of Act No. 80 of 1888. 32 La. Ann. 926; 37 La. Ann. 209; 34 La. Ann. 255; 35 La. Ann. 952; 36 La. Ann. 350; 35 La. Ann. 1109; 42 La. Ann. 835, 8 South. Rep. 593.

E. Simon, for appellees.

(1) One who obtains from the auditor a redemption act for lands adjudicated to the state at tax-sales, even when this obtention is after the time for redeeming has passed, is thereby estopped from contesting the assessment and the state's title.

(2) Assessors are not bound to look beyond the recorded titles to property. See Palmer v. Board, 42 La. Ann. 1122, 8 South. Rep. 487.

(3) The assessment, being in the name of the only owners known in the records, is sufficient and legal. See Gee v. Clark, 42 La. Ann. 918, 8 South. Rep. 627.

(4) Under such an assessment, when taxes have not been paid, the title derived from tax-sale is good and valid. See Wilberts v. Michel, 42 La. Ann. 853, 8 South. Rep. 607.

(5) In this case, the state holding under two adjudications, at different periods, the titles acquired under both to the benefit of the state's adjudicatee.

(6) The claimant must be strictly limited to the causes of nullity alleged in his petition and pleadings.

(7) Notice required by article 10 of the state constitution is applicable only to tax-sales of property of delinquents, and not to a sale of property of the state made under Act No. 80 of 1888.

(8) An action to invalidate a tax-sale, made under a law of the state, is barred by the prescription of 3 years. See 9 La. Ann. 403, 1005; 7 South. Rep. 731.

(9) Parties sold out as delinquents cannot redeem their property, except within the year the deed was given.

(10) The purchaser of lands from one who has bought at tax-sales, in good faith, will be maintained in his purchase after 10 years of peaceable possession, and that possession gives an indefeasible title. See Gee v. Clark, 42 La. Ann. 918, 8 South. Rep. 627.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

McENERY, J. The defendants move to dismiss this appeal on the ground of want of jurisdiction ratione materiæ, and that the plaintiff had applied for and obtained, in open court, an order of appeal to the court of appeals for the third circuit. The amount in dispute is over $2,000. This is apparent from the admissions of defendants in their application to bond in the injunction proceedings. The order of appeal to the court of appeals was a nullity. The error of plaintiff in applying for and obtaining an order of appeal to that court cannot estop him from prosecuting his appeal, and lodging it in the court having jurisdiction of the matters involved. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

ON THE MERITS.

The plaintiff, alleging that he is the lawful owner of sections or lots Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, township 8 S., range 8 E., in the S. E. land district, brought this suit to set aside a tax-deed of said property made to the defendants under the provisions of Act 80 of 1888, on the 1st of June, 1889, for an adjudication to the state on the 1st of May, 1886, for unpaid taxes of the year 1885, assessed to Breaux and Duperier. The defendants were put into possession of the property. The plaintiff obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from committing waste on the property. There was judgment for the defendants, maintaining their title to the property under the tax-deed, and dissolving the injunction, with $400 damages. The plaintiff has appealed. In 1871 and 1872 the property in controversy was assessed to Eugene Garandi. Garandi held certain floating land scrip or warrants. He assigned the same to Thomas Mille, who located it on the property in suit. Patent No. 9,197 was issued to him for this and other lots or sections in 1860. Garandi never carried the property, and was dead when the assessment was made to him. The land-office at Baton Rouge was the proper place for the assessor to get information of the description and ownership of the property which had been sold by the state to Mille. Rev. St. 2922. The state had notice of the title of the property in Thomas Mille. She cannot ignore this fact, and assess the property to a person not the owner, sell it, and acquire title to it. Under this assessment, the property was adjudicated to Breaux & Duperier. The assessment was null and void, and could not form the basis of a valid tax-sale. Thibodaux v. Keller, 29 La. Ann. 509; Fix v. Succession of Dierker, 30 La. Ann. 176; Guidry v. Broussard, 32 La. Ann. 926; Le Blanc v. Blodgett, 34 La. Ann. 107; Hickman v. Dawson, 35 La. Ann. 1086.

Judge Breaux in his testimony states that, happening to be in St. Martinsville, he had the property adjudicated to him and Duperier, in order to pay the taxes thereon, as their wives were interested in the property. No adjudication or forfeiture of the property was ever made to the state under this assessment. The property was never assessed under this tax-deed, before 1885, to Breaux and Duperier. The plaintiff claims title on this tax-deed of 1873 made to Breaux and Duperier. As he claims through the state, he must show title in the state. Judge Breaux disclaims title to the property. If there is any ownership of the land under this tax-sale, it must be in Breaux and Duperier. They have sold their interest in the property. In the partition proceedings of the succession of Mille, they joined with their wives in a sale of the property in controversy to the present plaintiff. From 1873 to 1881 the property was not assessed. From 1881 to 1884, inclusive, it was assessed to the plaintiff. In 1885, without the knowledge of Breaux and Duperier, it was assessed to them. The lands of Wilbert & Son, which were also purchased at the same time in the partition proceedings, in the succession of Mille, were assessed and sold, confusedly with plaintiff's property, for the unpaid taxes for the year 1885, assessed to Breaux and Duperier. It was under this assessment that the adjudication was made to the state in May, 1886, which resulted in the tax-sale, June 1, 1889, under Act 90 of 1888, and the adjudication and the tax-deed to the defendant Michel.

In the case of Wilbert v. Michel, 42 La. Ann. 856, 8 South. Rep. 607, we said: "The validity of the title acquired from the state depends on the validity of the adjudication forfeiture. If that was not valid, the state acquired no title, and can transfer none." In Re Douglas, 41 La. Ann. 776, 6 South. Rep. 675, in enumerating the essentials for a valid sale of property under tax proceedings, the assessment of the property was named as one of them; and in Breaux v. Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 502, that the notice required by article 210 of the constitution should also be served on the tax debtor. It does not appear in the record, and it is not alleged in the pleadings, that there was any change in the title to the property after its assessment to the plaintiff, Jacob McWilliams, in 1884, in which year he paid the taxes for the year previous. No reason is assigned for placing the property again on the rolls in the names of Breaux and Duperier, except in that there was a recorded tax-deed to them in 1873. This adjudication being null and void because of the defective assessment, as stated above, the continuation of the property on the rolls in their names was also null and void. There was in fact no assessment of the property in 1885 upon which the adjudication to the state in May, 1886, was based. There was no notice served on the tax debtor, as required by article 210 of the constitution. The tax-deed made to the defendants, 1st June, 1889, shows that the notice was served on Breaux and Duperier. But, as a fact, it was not even served on them. The adjudication, therefore, to the state in 1886, and the proceedings in the sale of the property thereafter under Act 80 of 1888, were null and void. The state having acquired no title, she could transfer none.

For the tax of 1882, assessed to the plaintiff, the property was adjudicated to the state in 1883. She never took possession of the property, and seems to have abandoned all claim to it under this adjudication, as it was assessed to Breaux and Duperier afterwards, and again adjudicated to the state under this assessment. But the defendants cannot set up this adjudication as the basis of their title under the tax-deed to them June 1, 1889, as it was sold to them, under Act 80 of 1888, as having been adjudicated to the state for the unpaid taxes of 1885, assessed to Breaux and Duperier.

From this statement of the case it is very clear that the prescription of one, three, and ten years, pleaded by defendants, can have no application. Breaux v. Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. —, 9 South. Rep. 502. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is now ordered that there be judgment in favor of the plaintiff decreeing the adjudication of the property described in his petition to the state on 1st May, 1886, for the tax of 1885, assessed to Breaux and Duperier to be null and void and of no effect; and that the adjudication and tax-deed made to the defendant Justinien Michel of said property, on June 1, 1889, under Act 80 of 1888, be declared null and void; and it is further ordered that the plaintiff be declared the true and lawful owner of said property, that he be placed in peaceable possession of the same, and that the injunction herein be perpetuated; defendants to pay all costs.

BREAUX, J., recuses himself.

ON REHEARING.

The defendants' counsel failed to call our attention in his brief and argument to the fact which led to the error in the decree, and which is now urged as a reason for granting a rehearing. It will not be necessary to reopen the case to correct the error. There was no controversy in dispute as to the description of the property. The case was argued and submitted on the assumption that McWilliams, the plaintiff, had acquired title to lots 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 17 from the succession of Mille. These lots were assessed to McWilliams from 1881 to 1884, inclusive. Defendants now call attention to the fact that lots 10, 16, and 17 were not adjudicated to the plaintiff in the sale of the property in said succession to effect a partition. An examination of the succession proceedings shows that they are correct. Plaintiff, however, does not claim lot 16. Lot 10 was not sold to the defendants at tax-sale, June 1, 1889. Lot 17 is the only part of the description of the property about which there can be any controversy between plaintiff and defendants. Lot 10 was assessed to the plaintiff by the state, and adjudicated to her in 1883. It was never sold to the defendants. He has therefore no interest in it. The decree in this case is therefore amended so as to strike out lot 17 from the description of the property in the decree. In all other respects it is to remain undisturbed. Rehearing refused.

STATE ex rel. BOARD OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION v. COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF VOLUSIA COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Oct. 31, 1891.)

SCHOOL TAX—LEVY BY COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—POWER TO LOWER RATE — MANDAMUS — WHEN DENIED.

1. The fourteenth paragraph of section 20 of the school law of June 8, 1889, (chapter 3872 of the Laws,) which provides that the county school boards shall prepare itemized estimates of the amount of money required for the maintenance of the necessary common schools, and state the amount in mills on the dollar of the taxable property; and the tax levy act of June 9, 1891, (chapter 4012,) providing that the county commissioners shall levy other county taxes, and a tax for county school purposes, such tax to be estimated by the school board and submitted to the commissioners for their approval or disapproval, who shall have the power to increase or lower, within specified limits, the estimate so made; and the thirty-fifth section of the general revenue law of June 10, 1891, (chapter 4010,) enacting that the commissioners shall determine the amount to be raised for all county purposes, except school purposes, and enter upon their minutes the rate to be levied for each fund, respectively, and shall ascertain the aggregate rate necessary to cover all such taxes, including such rate as may have been levied by the school board, —are in pari materia, and to be construed as one act; and the thirty-fifth section of the last-named act does not deprive the commissioners of power to lower the rate of taxation on taxable property estimated by the school board, where such reduction does not affect the amount of money fixed by such board as necessary for the schools, even if it prevents any change of such amount,—a point not presented by the record.

2. A writ of mandamus will be denied, where no violation of official duty is shown.

Appeal from circuit court, Volusia county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge

Petition for writ of mandamus by State ex rel. Board of Public Instruction of Volusia county against the county commissioners of Volusia county. Judgment for defendants. Relators appeal. Affirmed.

B. M. Miller and E. K. Foster, for appellants. J. D. Broome, Jr., for appellees.

RANEY, C. J. The petition for the writ of mandamus states that the board of public instruction of Volusia county met on the last Monday in June, the 29th day of that month, of the present year, for the purpose of preparing an itemized statement showing the amount of money requisite for the maintenance of the necessary common schools of the county for the ensuing scholastic year, and for the purpose of making a levy therefor: and then, at the request of the board of county commissioners, and for the purpose of conferring with the latter board at its next meeting to be held on the 7th day of July, adjourned to that day; on which day the former board met, and prepared an estimate and levy of the amount so required for the maintenance of the schools, and presented such estimate and levy to the commissioners, and requested them to levy and assess a tax of five mills upon the dollar of the taxable property of the county for the purpose aforesaid, and to report such estimate and levy to the assessor of taxes. The transcript of the record of the proceedings of the school board on the day last named, which transcript is made a part of the petition, shows the following action:

"On motion, the following estimate for the current year's expenses was made:

For salary of teachers	$17,800
For furniture, repairs, and new buildings	2,500
For school board and mileage	250
For superintendent	1,000
For school-books and freight	1,800
For miscellaneous expenses	250
Total	$23,650

And, in accordance with the law, the above estimate was presented to the board of county commissioners, with the request that they levy a tax of five mills on the dollar for school purposes."

The complaint of the school board is that the commissioners refused to make a levy of five mills, or to report to the assessor of taxes "the amount and rate of the estimate and levy" so made by the former board, but made a levy of three and three-quarter mills, which they instructed the assessor to enter upon the assessment, which instruction the assessor has obeyed. The prayer of the petition is, in effect, for a mandamus commanding the commissioners to do what it is complained they have not done.

The petition seems to have been treated as an alternative writ, which is the declaration in such cases, and was answered by the commissioners, who state that their action was taken on the 4th day of August of this year, and pursuant to the provisions of an act approved June 9, 1891, (chapter 4012, Laws,) given below. The school board's response to this is, practically, though not in form, a demurrer, and has been so treated by the circuit judge.

The fourteenth paragraph of section 20 of the school law, approved June 8, 1889, (chapter 3872, Laws,) provides that the board of public instruction in each county shall, on or before the last Monday in June of each year, prepare an itemized estimate, showing the amount of money required for the maintenance of the necessary common schools of their county for the next ensuing scholastic year, stating the amount in mills on the dollar of the taxable property of the county, which shall not be less than three nor more than five mills, and furnish a copy of the statement to the assessor of taxes of the county, and file a copy in the office of the board of public instruction, and the assessor shall assess the amount so stated, and the collector shall collect the amount assessed, and pay over the same monthly to the county treasurer, to be used for the sole benefit of the public schools.

"An act to provide for the levy of taxes for the years 1891 and 1892," approved June 9, 1891, (chapter 4012, Laws,) and by its terms taking effect upon such approval, ordains that the board of county commissioners of every county, at a meeting for correcting and reviewing the county assessment, shall immediately thereafter determine the amount of money to be raised by tax for county purposes, including current expenses, interest on the bonded debts, bridges, and county buildings; and to meet these expenses they are authorized to levy a tax, not exceeding five mills on the dollar, on real and personal property of the county, and that every such determination and levy so made shall be entered at large upon the record of the board; and it is also provided that the commissioners "shall levy a tax not to exceed five mills, nor less than three mills, on the dollar, on real and personal property of the county, for county school purposes; such tax to be estimated by the county school board, and submitted to the board of county commissioners for their approval or disapproval, and the county commissioners shall have the power to increase or lower the estimate so made within the above limits."

The thirty-fifth section of "An act for the assessment and collection of revenue," approved June 10, 1891, (chapter 4010, Laws,) which act did not go into effect "until sixty days from the final adjournment of the session of the legislature," (section 18, art. 3, Const.,) which adjournment took place on the 5th day of the same month, provides that the county commissioners shall determine the amount to be raised for all county purposes, except for school purposes, and shall enter upon their minutes the rate to be levied for each fund, respectively, and shall ascertain the aggregate rate necessary to cover all such taxes, including such rate as may have been levied by the county board of education for school purposes, and report the same to the assessor, who shall carry out the full amount of taxes for all county purposes under one heading in the assessment roll to be provided for that purpose; and the county commissioners shall notify the clerk and auditor of the county, also the treasurer thereof, of the amount to be apportioned to the different accounts out of the total taxes levied for all purposes.

Respondents rely, as indicated above, on the act of June 9th of the present year, (chapter 4012,) and relators contend that this statute was modified by the thirty-fifth section of the general revenue law, (chapter 4010,) approved June 10th, which they say was, in effect, on the 4th day of August, when the commissioners took the action complained of. Respondents further urge that, as the legislature did not adjourn until the 5th day of June, the last-mentioned statute did not go into effect until August 5th, or the day after the levy by the commissioners.

To ascertain the real intention and meaning of the legislature of 1889, we must consider any legislation there may be of that year bearing on the same subject that the fourteenth paragraph of the twentieth section of the school law of that year relates to. In "An act to provide for the levy of taxes for the years 1889 and 1890," approved June 3, 1889, (chapter 3849,) the county commissioners are given powers, as to other taxes than those for school purposes, similar to those given by the tax levy act of 1891, (chapter 4012, supra;) and as to school taxes it was enacted that the county commissioners should "levy a tax not to exceed five mills, nor less than three mills, on the dollar on the real and personal property of the county for county school purposes, such tax to be estimated by the county school board, and submitted to the board of county commissioners for their approval or disapproval; and the county commissioners shall have power to increase or lower the estimate so made within the above limits."

The above provisions as to school taxes in the two acts of 1889 are in pari materia, and they are to be construed together, the same as if they were in one statute. See authorities infra. Considering them together, there is not only no irreconcilability between them, but no obscurity as to their meaning, or as to the purpose of the law-makers. The meaning and purpose were that the school board should, as directed by the school act, on or before the last Monday in June, prepare the itemized statement of the amount required for the maintenance of schools, stating also the amount in mills on the dollar of the taxable property; but this estimate was, by the tax levy act of the same year, rendered subject to the approval or disapproval of the commissioners, and to be increased or lowered by them. The duty devolved by the latter act upon the school board, of submitting the estimate to the county commissioners, was to be performed, as was the revising duty of the commissioners under the same act, before the school board could or should perform the other duties devolved upon it by the subsequent provisions of the given fourteenth paragraph of section 20 of the school law.

Such being the effect of the law and the purpose of the legislature, as shown by the legislation of 1889, the disposition of the case presented by this record is not difficult. Assuming that the thirty-fifth section of the general revenue law of 1891, (chapter 4010, supra,) was in force on the 4th day of August of this year, there is in it nothing inconsistent with the power of the county commissioners to reduce the rate of taxation on taxable property estimated and submitted, under the tax levy act of 1891, (chapter 4012, supra.) Even if it be that the effect of the thirty-fifth section in excepting school taxes from the direction of the commissioners to "determine the amount to be raised for all county purposes" is to limit the revisory powers which the commissioners would have if the school law of 1889 and the tax levy act of 1891 stood alone, by preventing any interference with the determination or discretion of the school board as to the amount of money requisite for the necessary common schools, it has not the effect to take from the commissioners the power to increase or lower the rate of taxation. This is clearly the effect of the latter act, notwithstanding anything in the "thirty-fifth section." The tax levy act makes it the duty of the school board to submit "the tax estimated by" it to the commissioners for their approval or disapproval, and the county commissioners have power to increase or lower the estimate so made, within specified limits. Whether, in view of the exception, by the thirty-fifth section, of school taxes from the duty of the county commissioners as to determining the amount to be raised for county purposes, the submission for approval or disapproval to be made by the school board of "the tax estimated" by them, and the power of the commissioners to increase or lower the estimate so made, include the "amount of money required for the maintenance of the common schools," we do not feel called upon to decide, but we are entirely satisfied that they do include the rate of taxation which the school board are required by the act of 1889 to state. When this thirty-fifth section says that the county commissioners shall determine the amount to be raised for all county purposes, it means it shall do so in accordance with the provisions of the tax levy act of 1891, or, in other words, shall perform the duty as to such taxes imposed by that act, and, in excepting school taxes from such duty of determining the amount to be raised for county purposes, its purpose was not more than to avoid any conflict with the provisions of the fourteenth paragraph of the twentieth section of the school law, as to the duties and powers of the school board in the matter of "preparing an itemized estimate showing the amount of money required for the maintenance of the necessary common schools for the next ensuing scholastic year;" and when it says that the commissioners shall ascertain the "aggregate rate necessary to cover all such taxes, including such rate as may have been levied by the county board of education for school purposes," the words, "including such rate as may have been levied by the county board of education for school purposes," are not used as granting power to the county school board, but as words of reference or of description of the tax, and they refer at least to the rate fixed for school purposes in accordance with law; that is, by the school board under the supervisory power of the county commissioners. In determining how the rate of taxation for county school purposes is to be fixed, we have no more right to ignore the provisions of the tax levy act of 1891, requiring that the county commissioners shall "levy" the tax, and that it shall be a tax previously estimated by the school board, and submitted to them by it for their approval or disapproval, with power in the commissioners to increase or lower the tax or estimate so made and submitted, than we have to close our eyes to the provision of the school law as to the school board preparing the itemized estimate of the amount required with the statement of the amount in mills. If it be that the thirty-fifth section of the general revenue law was not in force, and for that or other reason is not applicable to taxes of the present year, then the effect of the tax levy act of this year upon the provision of the school law discussed above is the same, at least in so far as the rate of taxation is concerned, as was the tax levy act of 1889. Of course, if the thirty-fifth section is not applicable to these proceedings, there was no law making it the duty of the county commissioners to make the "report" to the assessor of taxes, provided by such section, or interfering with the provision of the fourteenth paragraph of the twentieth section of the school law, (as modified by the tax levy act of 1891,) as to the school board furnishing a copy of the statement to the assessor.

Assuming that the power of the county commissioners extends only to altering the rate of taxation, the petition does not show that they have acted either illegally or improperly in lowering the estimate, or even that the rate of taxation fixed by them will not produce an amount of money equal to the aggregate of the itemized statement. No prima facie case is made by the petition; no omission or violation of duty shown. High, Extr. Rem. §§ 449, 450. The "meeting" of the county commissioners "for correcting and reviewing the county assessment," mentiond in the tax levy act of 1889, as well as that of 1891, (chapters 3849 and 4012, supra,) is the meeting provided for by the general revenue law; and the day fixed for its commencement by such law, as it stood in either 1889 or 1891, was no earlier than the first Monday in July, (see chapters 3849, 3861, 4010, Laws,) even if it can be said that the last of these chapters could have had any effect at that time. Of course, any estimate of the rate of taxation made by the school board on the last Monday in June must, in view of the powers of the commissioners as to altering valuations of property at their subsequent meeting, necessarily be of doubtful accuracy, even assuming that the assessor was so well up with his assessments or books as to inform the school board of the aggregate of his valuation of the taxable property in the county.

The fact that the general revenue law was approved by the governor one day after the approval of the tax levy act does not make the former statute work a repeal of any part of the latter, or prevent their being construed as one act. The former passed the senate June 4th, and the house of representatives the next day, and the latter passed both houses on the latter day. They are, by their nature, in pari materia, and should be so construed. Florida, A. & G. C. R. Co. v. Pensacola & G. R. Co., 10 Fla. 145; State v. Brown, 19 Fla. 563, 593–595; State v. The judgment is affirmed.

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL — FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT.

Where the appellant fails to file in the supreme court, within the time required by law, a transcript of the proceedings of the lower court subsequent to a decree of the former court in the cause, there being a stipulation that the transcript on the former appeal shall be used for all purposes necessary to the second, and good cause for the laches is not shown, the appeal will be dismissed on motion of the appellee, and damages be allowed as for an appeal taken merely for delay.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Volusia county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Action by Emma Herrick against H. J. Long and wife. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Motion to dismiss granted, and damages allowed.

A. M. Thrasher and Fred T. Myers, for the motion. John W. Price, opposed.

RANEY, C. J. The decree was rendered October 3, 1890, and the appeal therefrom to the January term, 1891, was entered on the 18th day of the same month, the supersedeas bond being approved and filed on the same day, but the citation was not served till the 29th day of December. No appeal transcript was filed at the January term. On May 8, 1891, the solicitors of appellants and appellee entered into an agreement in writing that certain copies of the papers and proceedings in the cause subsequent to the decree of this court, when the case was formerly here on appeal, (26 Fla. 356, 8 South. Rep. 50,) should be re-established as the record in the cause, and certified as such. On the same day they also agreed in writing that the transcript filed on the former should be used for all purposes necessary to the present appeal, stating that this agreement was made on account of the loss of the original record. On the 12th day of August, at the present term, the appellee moved to dismiss the appeal, and for damages as for a frivolous appeal, because no transcript of the record of the proceedings had been filed as required by law and the practice of the court, and because no petition of appeal had been filed, and also that the appeal is frivolous and taken for delay. Upon the presentation of the motion about the time of its entry we concluded to adjourn the consideration of it to a future day, and required notice to be given to the appellants. Notice was given that the application would be renewed on the 15th day of the present month, (October.) Counsel for appellants has filed a statement, which he seems to have intended to swear to, but did not, in which he asserts that shortly after taking the appeal he called on the clerk to make a copy of the proceedings, and was told by him that counsel for appellee had the papers, and also called subsequently several times for the same purpose, and received the same answer, and that some weeks thereafter the deputy-clerk told him that counsel for the appellee disclaimed having the papers. He then states that some weeks thereafter counsel for appellee consented to the re-establishment of the papers, as indicated above, and that the clerk was requested to certify the same to this court. That soon after the appellants called to pay the costs of such copies, and have them sent up, and was then informed "that counsel for appellee had obtained them, and paid the bill for copying," and, as we understand his meaning, that they were sent to this court. There are also statements as to the docket fee and the petition of appeal, accompanying the above statement, which need not be noticed.

It is true that counsel for appellee has during the present term filed a transcript of the proceedings taken in the cause subsequent to its disposition on the former appeal, but he did not do so in behalf of the appellants, nor to have the cause heard as if appellants had done so, (Sup. Ct. Rule 17;) but, as is apparent from his conduct, to use it as a basis for this motion, (U. S. v. Fremont, 18 How. 30.) It was the duty of appellants, after the agreement of May 8th, to procure and have filed promptly, as they might have done, during that term of this court, a transcript of the re-established proceedings, but they and their counsel failed to do so even during the present term, and not only up to the time of the entry of the motion to dismiss, but, we may remark, also up to the present time. The agreements of May were made for benefit of appellants, and the one stipulating that the transcript of the former appeal might be used should not operate to the disadvantage of the appellee, nor is it to be imagined that she would have made it, except upon the implied understanding that the transcript of the subsequent proceedings would be promptly filed here. Her purpose was to facilitate the perfection of the appeal in order that the cause might be disposed of, but the appellants' conduct shows a marked indifference to this consummation. In view of their laches as to filing the transcript of the subsequent proceedings, they are entitled to no more consideration than if the agreement as to the old transcript had not been made. No "good cause" for the laches is shown. We not only think that the appeal should be dismissed, but also, following the practice in Richards v. Nail, 8 Fla. 369; Stafford v. Anders, 10 Fla. 211; Williams v. La Penotiere, 25 Fla. 473, 6 South. Rep. 167,—that damages should be allowed the appellee because the appeal has been taken merely for delay. The agreement as to the original transcript constitutes, in view of the appellants' conduct, no exception to the rule established by these cases. The amount of money whose payment has been arrested by this appeal and supersedeas was at the time at least $450. The sum of $30 will be allowed the appellee as damages, to be collected in the same manner as the amounts decreed the appellee in the lower court.

It will be ordered accordingly.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—COMPETENCY AS WITNESSES—COMPETENCY OF PARENT — ESCROW — PAROL EVIDENCE—QUIETING TITLE.

1. In civil actions, other than divorce cases, as the law stood in this state after the legislation of January 29, 1885, (chapter 3582 of the Laws,) and before the act of June 4, 1891, (chapter 4029 of the Laws,) a husband was, on account of the marital relation, not a competent witness either for or against his wife, but the wife was a competent witness for or against her husband in a case where he was a party and could himself testify; and the disqualification of the husband, as such, to testify for or against his wife did not of itself disqualify him from testifying as to his own interest where they were both parties, nor did such relation disqualify her from testifying as to her interest in the case.

2. Neither a father nor a mother is disqualified by the parental relation as a witness for or against a son.

3. Delivery to a third party is essential to an escrow.

4. Parol evidence is admissible to prove that a deed was never delivered to the grantee, or that it came into his possession accidentally or by mistake, or contrary to the intention of the parties, or by fraud, or otherwise illegally; but it is not admissible to show that an actual delivery to the grantee of a deed absolute upon its face was made under any agreement that a condition not expressed in the deed should be performed, and that the deed should not be operative until or unless such condition should be performed. The reason of such inadmissibility of parol evidence is that its effect would be to contradict a written instrument absolute upon its face by showing, contrary to its terms, that it was not absolute, but conditional.

5. A bill in equity to remove a cloud upon title to land cannot be sustained when the evidence shows that the land was at the time the bill was filed in the possession of the party complained of and claiming to hold under the deeds constituting the cloud. The remedy is at law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Bill in equity by Eli Haworth and wife and Alphonso Haworth against Fannie M. Norris and another, to remove a cloud from title. Decree for defendants. Complainants appeal. Affirmed.

STATEMENT BY THE COURT. The bill in this cause was filed October 15, 1885. The complainants are Eli Haworth and his wife, and Alphonso Haworth, their son, and its material allegations are in substance as follows:

(1) That on October 20, 1877, Eli and his wife, at the solicitation of the defendant Emma Reed, then Emma Livingston, she having subsequently intermarried with the defendant Henry W. Reed, executed to said Emma a deed of a described five acres of land, situate in Duval county, and being a part of the Davies grant, previously owned in common by said Eli and one Keeler, and subdivided in 1875; and that in consideration of such deed to said land, if the same should be thereafter joined in and adopted by Alphonso, the said Emma covenanted and agreed to pay to complainants $500, and to teach Alphonso in the English branches until he should acquire a fair English education. That previous to making this deed to Emma the complainant Eli, on September 20, 1875, he then being the owner of said land, made a deed of the same to Alphonso, in which deed the said Ann did not join, but she retained her dower interest in the land; and that this deed was not recorded until February 19, 1878, but was shown to the said Emma, and she was fully informed of its contents at the time of the execution of the deed to her. That Emma represented to Eli and Ann that she could get the money which she had agreed to pay to them for said land from her father, whom she represented as then being in the state of Illinois, but that she wanted the deed made to her as aforesaid, to show to her father, to induce him to advance the said money, and that for that purpose alone, and before the consideration had been paid or performed, Eli and Ann delivered the deed to Emma; but she could not and did not obtain the said money from her father, and was aware that she could not at the time she made said promise and statement, and that she never has paid the consideration, or performed the part thereof to be performed in services, but utterly failed and refused so to do, although requested so to do by Eli and Ann. That the said Emma, although she promised to return said deed to complainants if the said funds were not procured from her father and paid to "your orators and oratrix" as aforesaid, yet she did not return, but refused to return, the deed "to your orators and oratrix;" and, contrary to the agreement on which it was given to her, and without ever paying or performing the consideration for the same, she had and procured the deed to be recorded in the records of said county, and undertook to claim title to the said land under the deed thus obtained by fraud, deception, and misrepresentation, although she was never in possession of said land.

(2) That on April 11, 1885, the said Emma and her husband, Henry, a defendant, in pursuance of said design to defraud your orators and oratrix, and to assert title under said fraudulent deed, made and executed, for some small insignificant sum, —the exact amount being unknown, but greatly less than the value of the land,— to the defendant Fannie M. Norris, wife of Caius S. Norris, a deed of said land, and Norris and wife took the title and deed with full knowledge of the above-mentioned fraud and misrepresentation of said Emma in procuring and recording the deed to her, and also with full knowledge of the right and title of Alphonso in the premises.

(3) That none of the defendants have ever had the possession or control of said lands, but Alphonso was in possession of the same at the time the deed was made to said Emma, and has been ever since, and is now, in possession thereof.

(4) That Alphonso was ready and willing at the time of the making of the deed by Eli and Ann to confirm and adopt said transaction, and make a deed of said land to said Emma, if she would carry out in good faith her said contract of purchase; but she has utterly and entirely failed so to do, and never intended so to do, but made said promise and covenant solely for the purpose of getting into her possession the deed as aforesaid.

(5) That your orators and oratrix frequently notified Norris and his wife of the fraudulent character of the deed held by Emma, and how she had obtained the same, before the pretended purchase by said Fannie, which pretended purchase is charged to be but a part of a common design between all of the defendants to use and claim title under said deed obtained by fraud and deception, and without consideration, as aforesaid.

(6) That the name of Fannie M. Norris is inserted in the deed from Emma, but, as your orators and oratrix are informed and believe, and so charge, the alleged purchase was made by Caius, and for his benefit, and that he has informed your orators and oratrix since the date of said deed that he claimed the right and title to said land under said deed.

(7) That Norris and his wife are going upon and trespassing upon the said land and cutting the wood and timber from the same, and are now attempting to carry off the wood and timber heretofore cut by them, and, although warned not to further trespass upon the land, or cut timber or wood from the same, still continue so to do. That the wood and timber on the land constitute a large part of its value, and such value will be greatly lessened by such cutting and removal. That defendants are asserting to the public that they claim the title to the land, and are thereby injuring complainants' title thereto, and depreciating its value, and preventing any sale of the same by "your orators and oratrix," and the said deeds upon the records cast a cloud upon the title of "your orators and oratrix."

(8) That the defendant Fannie, being a married woman, cannot be sued at law, and that no judgment obtained at law against her husband, Caius, can be made and collected by an execution issued out of a court of law against him.

(9) The prayer of the bill is for an injunction restraining defendants from claiming or asserting title to or bringing suit for the land under the said deeds, and from going on or trespassing upon the same, and from conveying or incumbering the same, and for a surrender of such deeds for cancellation by any of the defendants having the same, and for general relief and subpœna.

On the day the bill was filed a temporary injunction in accordance with the prayer of the bill was issued, the same having been served on Norris and wife on the 17th day of the same month.

On the 7th of December Reed and wife answered the bill, stating that the deed from Haworth and wife to said Emma was executed on the 27th of October, 1877, and recorded on November 19th following.

She, answering of her knowledge, and her husband on information and belief, states the facts and circumstances as to the execution of the deed to be as follows:

That several weeks before the deed was executed to her she had "refugeed" from Jacksonville, Fla., where she then temporarily resided, for the benefit of her health, to the beach below Mayport, in said county, as the yellow fever was then prevailing, or supposed to prevail, in Jacksonville. That she boarded a few weeks at the Atlantic House, on said beach, and, meeting said Eli and Ann, she was prevailed upon to leave said house, at that time especially exposed to equinoctial storms, and take board at the residence of the said Eli at the old Pablo Plantation, in said county. While there, the said Eli having been attracted by certain letters written by her from Palatka, St. Augustine, and Jacksonville, in this state, respecting Florida, its climate and other advantages, and published the preceding winter and summer in the Cairo, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., newspapers, he proposed to her to write a single article for the purpose of calling attention t · the lots of land lying along the beach below Mayport, owned and claimed by the said Eli, who in that connection referred to a newspaper correspondent, who, as the said Eli said, had previously published an article respecting the landed possessions of the said Eli, to whom, for his services aforesaid, he, the said Eli, had conveyed a lot of land on the said beach, and the said Eli offered to defendant Emma, if she would write an article in that vein, to make a conveyance to her of a lot of five acres of land of his premises, removed from the beach, as might be preferred by her. That the proposition was thereupon accepted by her, and she thereupon prepared an article, which was subsequently published in the Semi-Tropical, a periodical then published in Jacksonville, and which was satisfactory to Eli and Ann, and they thereupon cheerfully and without solicitation on her part, and in execution of said agreement, executed and delivered to her the deed of conveyance, which she accepted in full satisfaction and execution of said agreement to convey, and there was no other consideration for said land paid or performed or agreed upon.

That there was no condition whatever, expressed or implied, annexed to said deed, nor was there any provision that the said Alphonso should then or subsequently join in or otherwise assent to its execution, but the deed was delivered to her absolutely and unconditionally, and the statement in the bill as to Alphonso joining in the execution of the deed is untrue and an after-thought.

That so far from Alphonso's then asserting any claim to the lands so conveyed to said Emma, or any right or power to control a conveyance of the same, the said Eli and Ann, on the day the deed was executed to said Emma, executed, in the presence of the witnesses who attested this deed, and acknowledged before the officer who took and certified the acknowledgment of the same, a deed of conveyance to the said Alphonso, and this deed to him refers to and bounds on one side the premises so conveyed to him by the premises so conveyed to said Emma, and said deeds were duly recorded in the proper office of said county, that to Alphonso immediately following that to Emma. Certified copies of these deeds are annexed to the answer as part thereof.

That the transactions resulting in the deed to Emma were in all respects fair, free from fraud, indirection, and misrepresentation on the part of Emma, and were fully understood in all their parts by all the parties thereto at the time they were so consummated in the execution of said deed.

That shortly after the deed to Emma and the said deed to Alphonso were executed as hereinbefore shown, Alphonso went with Emma to said land, and pointed out said lands and the boundaries which separated the land of Emma from those so conveyed to Alphonso, and he was then and there exuberant in expressions of satisfaction that his father had executed the said deed to him.

That, as they are advised and believe, the lands conveyed to said Emma could not at the time of such conveyance have been sold for more than $10 per acre, and said Emma avers that she would not at the time have paid in cash $50 for the same, and she avers of her own knowledge that the consideration of $50 was inserted in said deed solely at the instance of said Eli, without any suggestion whatever from the said Emma, she supposing that the service rendered him as hereinbefore shown was valued by him at that sum.

The answer responds expressly to all allegations of the bill inconsistent with the above defense, and in effect denies or traverses all of them, and the whole case made by the bill. It also states that the respondents supposed they were in possession of said land so sold to said Emma, —the said Emma down to the time of her marriage in May, 1880, and these respondents since that time to the date of their deed to said Fannie Norris. That on the 11th day of May they sold and conveyed said land by deed duly executed and recorded to said Fannie for the sum of $150, which was duly paid, and was the fair and full value of said land. That the lands had been in market for several years before, and the highest bid was made on behalf of Mrs. Norris, to whom it was sold; and that in making such sale no thought or reference to the complainants was entertained, nor any suspicion that their deed would be assailed.

That said Emma resided to the time of her marriage, since said sale to her, in the state of Florida, and, since her marriage, in Waycross, Ga. She also affirms her solvency.

The answer of Caius S. Norris and his wife, Fannie, practically adopts upon information and behalf that of Reed and wife, stating, however, that they understood up to the institution of this suit that the consideration for the deed to Mrs. Reed was $50, as expressed therein, and that it had been paid, and that they never knew anything to the contrary until hearing the bill read, and averring that the value of the land was at the execution of said deed not more than $10 per acre. That not until October 13, 1885, upon sundry threats being made by said Eli to Caius, did they hear of any claim adverse to the title of said Emma. That some time after the execution of the deed to said Emma they heard some indefinite rumors as to the said Alphonso having a deed from the said Eli, other than that executed October 27, 1877, and thereupon Caius went to the county records, and made diligent search for the rumored deed, but was unable to find any record of a deed to Alphonso than that of the deed of October 27th, and that, excepting such indefinite rumor, respondents never heard of the alleged deed of September 17, 1885, until hearing the bill in this cause read. That, so far from suspecting that Alphonso had any claim to said land, they, upon the land being conveyed to said Fannie, went to Alphonso in person, and told him of the purchase, and asked him if he knew where the boundaries to the Livingston tract were, and Alphonso answered that he did not know exactly where the boundaries were, as they had never been run by a surveyor, but that any one who could run a line with a compass could find the boundaries. That he owned the balance of the lot of which the Livingston tract was a part, for which his father had executed to him a deed on the day the Livingston tract was deeded to said Emma; and further said that one Scull was enough of a surveyor to run the said lines, and that he, Alphonso, was too busy with spring planting to meet said Norris and Scull and run the lines, which could be run without his assistance; and that defendants had a fine piece of land in the Livingston tract.

They admit that on April 11, 1885, Reed and wife conveyed the land to said Fannie, but deny that there was any design on the part of the co-defendants, or either of them, to defraud complainants, and each and every allegation of the bill to the effect that respondents, or either of them, has been or is aware of any fraud, deception, or misrepresentation on the part of said Emma or her husband. They say the conveyance was fair in every respect, and that the consideration was $150 cash, paid to Reed and wife, and that this was the fair and full money value of the land.

There are other features of the answer, some of which, as far as they are material to the case, will be noticed in the opinion.

C. P. & J. C. Cooper, for appellants. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellees.

RANEY, C. J. The defendants objected before the master who took the testimony to the competency of Eli Haworth and his wife, two of the complainants, as witnesses in support of the case made by the bill, on the ground of their marital relation, and the circuit judge sustained the objections and excluded their evidence. The correctness of this ruling is assailed by counsel for appellants.

The statutes in force at the time of the ruling complained of are those of February 4, 1874, and March 7, 1879, and January 29, 1885. The first of these (McClel. Dig. p. 518, § 24) provides that no person offered as a witness in any court or before any officer acting judicially shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action or proceeding, or because he is a party thereto. There is a proviso, but it need not be noticed, as the case before us does not fall within any exception made by it to the general rule removing the disqualification of interest or parties. The second act (Id. p. 517, § 23) is as follows: "In the trial of civil actions in this state married women shall not be excluded as witnesses in cases where their husbands are parties and allowed to testify." The third act (Laws 1885, c. 3582, p. 24) is that in all actions for divorce or alimony in this state it shall be competent for the parties to testify, but no decree is to be granted upon the testimony of husband or wife alone. The legislation of the present year (Laws 1891, c. 4029, p. 56) cannot be considered.

In McGill v. McGill, 19 Fla. 341,—a divorce case, decided in 1882,—it was held that the common-law exclusion of a husband or wife as witnesses to affect the rights or interests of the other was not solely on grounds of property interest, but on ground of public policy, for the protection of the marriage relation, and that the statutes then in force—those of 1874 and 1879, supra—did not change the common law excluding husband and wife from testifying in a suit for divorce. It is, however, observed in the opinion—and, in our opinion, correctly—that these statutes innovate upon the rule of the common law to the extent that interest in the event of an action or merely being a party shall no longer exclude a witness from testifying, and that in civil actions married women are not excluded in cases where their husbands are competent witnesses. In Schnabel v. Betts, 23 Fla. 178, 1 South. Rep. 692, and in Storrs v. Storrs, 23 Fla. 274, 2 South. Rep. 368, the competency of the husband to testify in a civil action to which the wife was a party was before the court. The former case is one in which it was sought to charge the separate real property of Mrs. Schnabel with the value of improvements erected on it, and it was held that the statute of 1879 did not so modify the common law as to extend to the husband the right to testify for or against a wife in a civil suit against her. The Storrs Case is one in which the wife, by her next friend, filed a bill against her husband and his judgment creditor, to protect her alleged separate property from sale in satisfaction of the judgment, and it was decided, overruling the lower court, that the husband was not a competent witness to prove that the property levied on was hers.

The true principle of the common law, as disqualifying either a husband or wife as a witness where the other is a party to or interested in the event of the suit, is not the interest of the one offered as a witness in the event of the suit, but is public policy, founded on the preservation and peace of the marriage relation, (Hasbrouck v. Vandervoort, 9 N. Y. 153; Lucas v. Brooks, 18 Wall. 436; Whart. Ev. § 430;) and hence the removal of the disqualification of interest or of being a party to a suit does not affect the disqualification of husband and wife as a witness to a suit in which the other is interested or a party.

Our law-making power had seen fit to provide by the act of 1874 that neither interest in the result nor being a party to the suit should, in cases not within its proviso, disqualify any person as a witness; and hence, if a husband was a party, he was not disqualified from testifying as to his own interest, even though his wife were a party, but he could not testify as to her interest if she was a party, or interested in the result; and likewise, under this act, if a wife was a party, or interested in the result, she could testify as to her own interest, (Williams v. Railroad Co., 26 Fla. 533, 8 South. Rep. 446;) but it did not extend to her any competency in excess of that given to a husband. The act of 1879, however, did extend to her additional competency. It says that wherever the husband is a party, and allowed to testify, the wife shall not be excluded as a witness. The purpose of this act was to remove the common-law disability as wife, which at the time of its enactment remained unaffected by prior legislation; so, wherever the husband was a party to a suit, and its character was such that his interest therein or connection with the suit would, under the act of 1874, not disqualify him from testifying as to his interest, his wife ceased, by virtue of the act of 1879, to be disqualified, as wife, or on grounds of public policy, from testifying as to his interests. Of course, where the character of the case was one falling within the exceptions named in the proviso to the act of 1874, and the husband, though a party, could not testify, the public policy disqualification referred to adhered to the wife, and prevented her from testifying as to his interests. The act of 1879 does not in any manner affect the competency or incompetency of the husband as a witness. Schnabel v. Betts, supra. The act of 1885 has made a special rule for cases of divorce and alimony, and has done away with the public policy disqualification of both husband and wife to testify in those cases; and more need not be said of it here, as the cause before us is not within its scope. This was the status of the law at the time of the trial of this cause.

Proceeding to apply these principles, we see that the case before us is one in which the husband, Eli T. Haworth, has, upon the face of the bill, no interest in the land in controversy. In 1875, he, according to the bill, conveyed to his son, Alphonso, his entire interest therein, and as between himself and his son the deed by his wife and himself of October 27, 1877, to Miss Livingston, was of no effect as a conveyance, although, as to Miss Livingston, if she took it without notice of the deed to Alphonso, and as to Mrs. Norris, if either she or Miss Livingston took without such notice, it was valid and effectual. The only effect of this deed, judging from the contention of complainants' bill, is that it would constitute a relinquishment of the dower of Mrs. Haworth, and that with it the contemplated deed from Alphonso, conveying the legal title, would, when made, vest a perfect title in Miss Livingston, discharged of the dower claim. The record then showing no individual interest of the husband in the land, and he consequently being, in so far as the land is concerned, a party merely in right of his wife, any testimony his wife may have given is, as between him and her, to be regarded as concerning her own, and not his, interests. As a witness as to her right to a surrender of the deed as fraudulently obtained and affecting her dower interest, Haworth was clearly incompetent, his exclusion as husband on the grounds of public policy not having been removed by any legislation. Regarding the bill, in so far as the husband is concerned, as one for the surrender of the deed as one fraudulently obtained, Mrs. Haworth was a competent witness in his behalf, and he in behalf of himself. In so far as the ruling of the judge conflicts with these views it was erroneous. To prove the case made by the bill in favor of the complainant Alphonso both Mr. and Mrs. Haworth were admissible as witnesses, either in his behalf or against him. Any disability as witnesses in Alphonso's behalf that might have resulted from their being parties, or from Mrs. Haworth's dower interest, was removed by the act of 1874, and there is none other attaching to either of them as witnesses as to Alphonso's case.

II. We will now consider the case in so far as it may be regarded as affecting any rights of Mr. and Mrs. Haworth.

The deed of October 27, 1877, from Eli Haworth and wife to Miss Livingston, is one by the terms of which the former, "the parties of the first part," grant, bargain, sell, aliene, remise, release, convey, and confirm unto the party of the second part, Miss Livingston, her heirs and assigns forever, in consideration of $50, the receipt whereof is acknowledged, the described five acres of land, (a part of which description is that it is bounded "on the north and south by lands owned by the party of the first part,") and "the said party of the first part, for their heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant that the said party of the first part was at the sealing and delivery of these presents lawfully seised in fee-simple of a good, absolute, and indefeasible estate of inheritance" of and in the above-bargained premises, "and have good right and lawful authority to grant, bargain, sell, and convey the same; and that the party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, shall and may at all times hereafter peaceably and quietly have, hold, use, occupy, possess, and enjoy the above-granted premises, and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances, without any let, suit, trouble, molestation, restriction, or disturbance of the said party of the first part, their heirs or assigns, or of any other person or persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same; and that the same now are free, clear, discharged, and unincumbered of and from all former and other grants, titles, charges, estates, judgments, taxes, assessments, and incumbrances of what nature and kind soever." There is also a covenant of general warranty.

This deed is signed and sealed by Mr. and Mrs. Haworth, and duly witnessed. There is also a separate acknowledgment in due form, made by Mrs. Haworth before a justice of the peace, to the effect that she executed the deed for the purpose "of conveying all her right, title, and interest in and to the land in said conveyance described and granted."

It may be remarked that the evidence does not establish the assertion of the bill that Miss Livingston was aware, at the time she obtained the deed, or when she is alleged to have agreed to pay the $500 for the purposes charged, that she could not get the money from her father. The testimony falls short of proving that she made any fraudulent representations with a view to obtaining possession of the deed, or that the possession of it was obtained through fraud, accident, or mistake, or contrary to the intention of the parties. Towner v. Lucas, 13 Grat. 705.

It is sought to prove by parol evidence that Miss Livingston promised to return this deed if the funds were not procured by her from her father and paid to Mr. and Mrs. Haworth, and that such was the understanding and agreement under which the deed was delivered to and received by her, and also that the deed was not intended as an absolute conveyance of the property, but only given to her in order that she might show it to her father, and thereby induce him to let her have the money. The introduction of parol evidence for such purpose was objected to. Independent of any question of the competency of witnesses, we are satisfied that parol testimony is inadmissible for the purpose. Mr. Haworth cannot testify in his own behalf, nor Mrs. Haworth in her behalf, nor any one in behalf of either or both of them, to this end. We do not deny that it may be shown in behalf of Alphonso that Miss Livingston and Mrs. Norris bought with knowledge of his rights, whatever they might have been; nor do we mean to question or infringe upon the liberal rule as to proving a consideration not named in a deed, but, in our judgment, parol testimony is not admissible to show the alleged understanding or agreement between Mr. and Mrs. Haworth and Miss Livingston as to returning this deed. This deed is a perfect instrument, and the sole repository or evidence of the language of the contract between these parties, and their meaning is to be ascertained from its language, as applied to its subject-matter. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 272, 282. That the personal covenants therein may not be binding on Mrs. Haworth, and that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the presumption is that her interest in the land was no more than dower, still the contract is not a conditional one, even in so far as she is concerned, and parol evidence is not admissible to show that it is such. The effort here is not to show a delivery in escrow, for delivery to a stranger is essential to an escrow, (Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229; Devl. Deeds, § 314 et seq.; Trust Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359;) nor is it to prove that the deed was never delivered, or that it came into her possession without their knowledge or consent, or surreptitiously, or illegally, which, it seems, can be proved by parol. (Trust Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359; Black v. Lamb, 12 N. J. Eq. 108; Black v. Shreve, 13 N. J Eq. 455; Roberts v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 478; Devl. Deeds, § 295.) While it can be thus shown that a deed was not to be delivered until a condition was performed, and that possession of it has been obtained improperly before the performance thereof, or by fraud, accident, or mistake, yet it cannot be shown by parol that an actual delivery was made under an agreement that a condition should be performed, and the deed should not be operative unless it was performed. In the former case the purpose and effect of the evidence is to show that there was no legal delivery, but in the latter the effect of the evidence offered is to contradict an instrument, absolute on its face, by showing, contrary to the terms of such instrument, that it was not absolute, but conditional. Devl. Deeds, §§ 295, 314; Black v. Lamb, supra; Black v. Shreve, supra; Ward v. Lewis, 4 Pick. 518; High School Co. v. Iowa Evangelical Synod, 28 Iowa, 360; Railroad Co. v. Pfeuffer, 56 Tex. 66; Lawton v. Sager, 11 Barb. 349; Williams v. Higgins, 69 Ala. 517; McCann v. Atherton, 106 Ill. 31; Arnold v. Patrick, 6 Paige, 310; Plankroad Co. v. Stevens, 10 Ind. 1; Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Grat. 403; Duncan v. Pope, 47 Ga. 445; Simonton's Estate, 4 Watts, 180; Towner v. Lucas' Ex'r, 13 Grat. 705; Watson v. Hurt, 6 Grat. 633.

It is not pretended, nor is the case upon the theory, that anything has been incorporated into the instrument or omitted from it contrary to the purpose and understanding of the parties, nor that the grantee's possession of it was not given voluntarily by the grantors therein; nor, saving the unsupported allegation that Miss Livingston knew that she could not get the money from her father, is it claimed that any element of fraud entered into her getting possession of it; nor that she acquired possession through accident or mistake, or before it was intended that she should have it. It is the case where a deed as absolute in its terms as language can make it has been voluntarily delivered; and it is now sought to incorporate in or annex to it, by parol evidence, an agreement which will render the operation of its terms conditional and contradict them. In Ward v. Lewis it is said: "It could not have been delivered as an escrow, because it was delivered to the parties. An escrow can be delivered only to a third person. It could not have been delivered to the parties conditionally, to take effect upon the happening of any future contingency, because this would be inconsistent with the terms of the instrument itself. * * * To permit parties to a deed purporting to be absolute to show by parol evidence that it was conditional, and to avoid it for a non-performance of the condition, would be not only a violation of the fundamental rules of evidence, but productive of great injustice and mischief." In High School Co. v. Iowa Evangelical Synod, the opinion, delivered by DILLON, C. J., observes in effect: The deed contains no words making the raising of a $25,000 endowment a condition of the grant, and there was no mistake in the deed, nor was it intended by either party at the time of the execution of the deed that it should contain any such condition, and the case was not one of a bill to correct the deed; and that it was therefore plain that it was incompetent to ingraft such a condition upon the conveyance by parol evidence. In Railroad Co. v. Pfeuffer it was held that parol evidence is not admissible to defeat a right to land conveyed by deed, when its object is to establish a condition subsequent; and also that the absolute grant by deed of right of way is not defeated by the failure of the grantee to comply with the conditions upon which the grant was obtained, there being no charge of fraud. In Lawton v. Sager the referee admitted parol testimony to show that at the time of the delivery of a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors it was agreed between Sager, the grantor therein, and the grantee or assignee, that the latter should procure certain creditors, who had commenced proceedings against Sager as an absconding debtor, to discontinue those proceedings, and come in with other creditors under the assignment, and that, upon his failure to effect this arrangement, he was to return the assignment to Sager. It was held that the admission of this testimony was erroneous, and that, if it be intended that a deed shall not take effect until some subsequent condition shall be performed, or event happen, such condition must be inserted in the deed itself, or else it must not be delivered to the grantee; that parol evidence was admissible as to whether a deed had been delivered or not, but not to prove whether a deed when delivered shall take effect absolutely or only upon the performance of some condition not expressed therein. "To allow a deed absolute upon its face to be avoided by such evidence would be a dangerous violation of a cardinal rule of evidence. This deed, being absolute upon its face, and having been delivered to the grantee himself, took effect at once. It could not have been delivered to take effect upon the happening of a future contingency, for this would be inconsistent with the terms of the instrument itself. Without regard, therefore, to any understanding which may have existed between the parties at the time the deed was delivered, it must be held to be an absolute conveyance, operative from that time." The doctrine of Williams v. Higgins, and that of McCann v. Atherton, is of practically the same effect; and the decision in Arnold v. Patrick was that, where a person who had contracted for the purchase of land obtained a deed of the same from the vendor under an agreement that it should not be used until the balance of the purchase money, then due, was paid, the delivery of the deed was valid to pass the legal title to the land to the vendee, subject to the vendor's lien for the purchase money. In this case the vendee represented to the grantor that the money would be obtained upon showing the deed to certain men then waiting at his store who would let him have the money as soon as they could see that he was to have a deed of the premises, and that the deed should not be used or put in force until the money was paid to the grantor, and the grantor signed and delivered the deed, stating it was not to be recorded or acknowledged until the purchase money was paid, and calling on a party to take notice it was only delivered conditionally. In Towner v. Lucas' Ex'r, 13 Grat. 705, it is held that parol evidence will not be received to ingraft upon a valid written contract an incident occurring contemporaneously therewith, and inconsistent with its terms; that the fraud which will let in such evidence must be fraud in the procurement of the instrument, and going to its validity, or some breach of confidence in using a paper delivered for one purpose and fraudulently perverted it to another; and that parol evidence was not admissible to prove in behalf of one of the sureties in a bond that he was induced to sign the bond upon the express promise of the obligee that he should not be required to pay any part of it, and that the obligee would give the surety a written indemnity to save him harmless.

Parol evidence not being admissible to show that the delivery of the deed to Miss Livingston was conditional, Mr. and Mrs. Haworth are, for this reason, and that indicated in the third paragraph of this subdivision of the opinion, not entitled to any relief on this record.

III. In view of the character of the case sought to be made in behalf of Alphonso Haworth, it being really one to remove cloud upon title, the question of the possession of the land at the commencement of the suit becomes material to the equitable jurisdiction invoked.

The bill alleges that none of the defendants have ever had possession or control of the land, but that Alphonso was in possession of it at the time the deed was made to Miss Livingston, and has ever since been, and is now, in possession of it; that defendants Norris and wife are going upon and trespassing on the land, and cutting the wood and timber from the same, and attempting to carry therefrom such wood and timber, and still continue to do so, though warned not to. The answer of Mrs. Reed and her husband is, upon this point, that they supposed they were in possession of the land,—the said Emma down to the time of her marriage, May 4, 1880, and they to the date of their deed to Mrs. Norris. Norris and wife deny each and every allegation of the bill as to the possession of the land by Alphonso since the execution of the deed to Miss Livingston, and aver that at the time of the execution of the deed to Mrs. Norris, which was April 11, 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Reed were in possession of the land, and that thereupon Mrs. Norris and her husband in her right took possession of it and had it surveyed, and that one of the stakes of the survey is still standing; and that on or about the 1st day of September, 1885, they had an employe to go on the land for the purpose of clearing the same for cultivation of fruit trees, and this employe, under their direction, went upon the land, and continued to clear the same from that day up to the time they received notice of the injunction issued in this cause; and that complainants knew of the actual, notorious, and continued adverse possession taken by these respondents, and not until October 13, 1885,—two days before the filing of the bill,—did complainants or either of them let respondents know that they had any objection to such acts of possession, but on the day named Eli threatened that he would bring this suit if respondents continued in possession.

The testimony as to possession was taken between July 12 and August 15, 1886, and is as follows: Eli Haworth, who lived about three miles from the land, on the San Pablo plantation, says that his son, and himself for him, were at the time of the execution of the deed to Miss Livingston, and have always, up to the time of testifying, been, and were then, in possession, paying taxes upon it, and exercising all rights of possession; that Miss Livingston never took possession in any way; that nothing has ever been done on the land except what "we" have done; that his son was working on the land, and has been ever since occasionally. Edward Roundtree, a witness for complainants, who lives about seven miles south of Mayport, (the land being about one mile north or north-east of Mayport,) says that he knew Eli Haworth was in possession of the land; that Norris had a man on it clearing it up about October, 1885, and wanted witness to clear up an acre; would not "say for certain, it was about then though;" that Miss Livingston never had any one on it clearing it up; that this was the first time he saw Norris, or any one for him, working on the land; that he passed it every week, and Norris did not have any one there before. Alphonso, who lived with his father, except for the last year previous to testifying, says that Miss Livingston never had possession. To the question, "Who has been in possession of the land since Miss Livingston's deed was made, and what acts of ownership and possession have been exercised over the land?" he replies: "I have, myself. I have planted some orange trees on the land. Started to clear a piece some two or three years ago for the purpose of building. That is all I have done to it." He also testifies that he has never seen Miss Livingston or any one on this land; that he passes it two or three times a week, except the last year, when he has been working at Pablo beach. Mrs. Haworth says Miss Livingston never was in possession of it; that Alphonso has had possession since the deed to Miss Livingston, but has done nothing with it.

The answer of Norris and wife is responsive to the bill upon the point in question, and its statements are controlling evidence as to their possession, in the absence of sufficient testimony to overcome them. These statements show that they were in physical possession when the bill was filed, giving the acts constituting such possession, and not a mere general averment of possession. Roundtree's testimony tends to confirm them. Alphonso, according to his own statement, had been absent for a year before the time of testifying, and this year covered the period for which Norris and wife claim to have been in possession. He does not show that the orange trees were planted, or any other act of possession exercised, during this year or the period of the Norris' possession. No fact or act evidencing possession, and inconsistent with those stated as to the Norris' possession is shown; and neither Eli Haworth, nor Mrs. Haworth, nor Alphonso, testify that Norris and wife did not take possession in the manner averred by their answer; nor is it shown that these witnesses were in a position to know that it was not done. Admitting or assuming statements of the answer as coming from Norris are not evidence, they are yet so as coming from Mrs. Norris. They are made on her own knowledge as well as his; and his possession was hers in law, the legal title being in her, if not in Alphonso Haworth.

The material allegations of the bill as to possession are not sustained by the record.

In view of the above conclusion as to possession, it follows, since the claim or title of Alphonso to the land is legal in its character, that he has a sufficient remedy at law in an action of ejectment, and cannot successfully invoke the equitable jurisdiction for removal of cloud from title to land. Sloan v. Sloan, 25 Fla. 53, 5 South. Rep. 603; Byrne v. Hinds, 16 Minn. 521, (Gil. 469.) If Alphonso is entitled to an injunction against trespass pending an action at law he can apply for it. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565. If Mrs. Norris' title was acquired for a valuable consideration, and without notice of Alphonso's, it is, against him and his father, a valid legal title, and, she being in possession at the time this bill was filed, a court of law is the forum in which to try the question of title between them.

The decree dismissing the bill is affirmed.

INJUNCTION—WASTE OF ASSETS BY CHATTEL MORTGAGOR—RECEIVERS—AGREEMENT NOT TO RECORD MORTGAGE—ATTORNEY'S FEES—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

1. A court of equity will prevent, by injunction, a mortgagor from impairing the value of or destroying the property embraced in the mortgage lien, on which the mortgagee has a right, by virtue of his mortgage, to rely for the security of his debt.

2. When a merchant on the day after the execution of a mortgage on his stock of goods in favor of some of his creditors disposes of a large amount of them to other creditors in payment of their debts, a court of equity is justified in enjoining him from selling said goods otherwise than for cash, and commanding him to pay the proceeds, after deducting expenses of sale, into the registry of the court.

3. If the remedy by injunction as above proves to be ineffectual, the court may appoint a receiver to take charge of the goods and dispose of them under its direction.

4. An agreement by the mortgagee not to record a mortgage of personal property for 20 days after its execution is a valid agreement between the parties to it, but such mortgage is void as to creditors and purchasers without notice whose rights attach before it is recorded.

5. An instrument in writing, executed by a mortgagee at the time of the execution to him of a mortgage of personal property, not to record the same within 20 days, and not then, if satisfactory payments were made in the mean time, unless, in the opinion of the attorneys of the mortgagee, it was necessary to protect his interest, construed to mean that if for good cause the attorneys of the mortgagee filed the mortgage for record before the expiration of the 20 days, the mortgagor not having up to the time of recording made satisfactory payments, such action on the part of the attorneys, if necessary to protect the interest of the mortgagee, terminated the stipulation not to record the mortgage at all, if satisfactory payments were made.

6. The objection that a suit has been brought prematurely, or before the expiration of days of grace, cannot be raised primarily in an appellate court by a defendant who has both demurred to the bill and answered without interposing such defense.

7. The insufficiency of the proof upon which a chattel mortgage has been recorded cannot be urged primarily in the appellate court, where neither the demurrer nor the answer to the bill present it.

8. A stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees does not avoid a contract for the payment of money, of which it is a part; nor is a stipulation for the payment of a reasonable amount as attorney's fees illegal.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; JAMES F. MCCLELLAN, Judge.

Action by James B. Slade and others against George A. Logan to foreclose a mortgage. Decree for complainants. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

STATEMENT BY THE COURT. The complainants, James B. Slade and Charles A. Etheredge, copartners under the firm name and style of Slade & Etheredge; Joseph S. Garrett, George J. Garrett, and Robert Y. Garrett, copartners under the firm name and style of Garrett & Sons; J. Pollock and L. Lowenstein, copartners under the firm name and style of Pollock & Co.; J. M. Eatherly, A. M. Young, George I. Waddey, Thomas Ellis, Will W. Crandall, and Harry Jones, copartners as Eatherly Hardware Company,—filed their bill in the circuit court of Jackson county against the appellant for foreclosure of a mortgage on the 20th of November, A. D. 1884. The bill alleges that the defendant on the 18th day of November, 1884, being largely indebted to the complainants, made and delivered to them his written obligations for the respective sums due to them, payable one day after date. These obligations contained stipulations to the effect that if they were not paid, and judgment was obtained against the defendant upon them, that he would waive the benefit of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the constitution of the state of Florida, and all laws of said state exempting property from forced levy and sale; that if said obligations were not paid at maturity they were to bear interest at 1 per cent. a month from date, and, if collected by an attorney, 20 per cent. attorney's fees were to be added and included in the judgment on the obligations. Such were three of the obligations alluded to. The one to Slade & Etheredge was of the same import, with an additional stipulation that, if defendant should ship them some cotton, he would be entitled to one dollar per bale thereon in addition to the value of the same. The bill further alleges that the defendant, to secure the payment of said obligations, made and delivered to the complainants a mortgage on some real estate in said county, and also upon a stock of goods then in defendant's store.

The bill prays for a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or otherwise disposing of any of the personal property, and for the appointment of a receiver. Upon a hearing on the bill and exhibits thereto, and affidavits in behalf of complainants, and counter-affidavit of defendant, the chancellor granted an order restraining the defendant from selling the goods mortgaged otherwise than for cash at not less than invoice prices, and requiring him to deposit in the registry of the court all sums received by him for goods sold since the execution of the mortgage, and also commanding him to deposit as aforesaid, at the end of each week, all money arising from the further sale of goods. The chancellor subsequently modified the order by allowing the defendant to retain in his hands a sufficient sum to cover clerk's hire and other necessary expenses incurred in conducting the business. Defendant demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was overruled; but, as this action of the court is not assigned as error, it is unnecessary to notice it further.

Defendant answered the bill, alleging that his signature to the mortgage and the four obligations described supra were procured by fraud, covin, deceit, misrepresentation, and a combination between Benjamin S. Liddon, Frank B. Carter, attorneys of complainant, and R. E. Farrish, as agent of the complainants Slade & Etheredge; that at the time of the signing the said obligations and mortgage he went to the office of Liddon & Carter, in Marianna, to see why they had brought suit against him on the claim of Garrett & Sons, which defendant claimed they had agreed not to sue on; that while there Farrish came in, and he and Farrish had an interview as to the claim of Slade & Etheredge; that he agreed with Farrish to give to Slade & Etheredge a mortgage to secure their claim, provided that the mortgage should not be recorded in 20 days, and that if within that time defendant should make satisfactory payments to Slade & Etheredge the mortgage was not to be recorded at all; that Farrish and defendant were alone when this agreement was made, and after making it informed Liddon of it, and requested him to draw up the mortgage; that Liddon told him that he did not want to break him up, and that he could give him his notes for the amounts due on the other claims, and drew up all the obligations, and defendant signed them without reading them or hearing them read; that there was no agreement that the claims of Garrett & Sons, Pollock & Co., and the Eatherly Hardware Company were to be included in the mortgage to Slade & Etheredge, and no intimation of the kind; that Liddon read the mortgage to him as though it was a mortgage to Slade & Etheredge alone; the names of the other complainants in the mortgage were not read to him by Liddon; that he never knew that the mortgage was to any other person besides Slade & Etheredge until suit was commenced against him; that at the time of the giving the mortgage Farrish and defendant agreed in writing as follows:

"Having received from George A. Logan a mortgage upon certain real estate and personal property to secure a debt due said Slade & Etheredge for one thousand and nineteen and 55-100 dollars, now, as the agent of said Slade & Etheredge, and in consideration of the execution of said mortgage, I do hereby agree that if W. H. Logan, father of said George A. Logan, will give to said Slade & Etheredge a guaranty of the payment of the amount above mentioned, and will also give a sufficient acceptance or security in the opinion of the attorney of said Slade & Etheredge for the further sum of nine hundred dollars, said Slade & Etheredge will advance said amounts to said George A. Logan on sixty days' time. It is also agreed that unless, in the opinion of the attorneys of the said Slade & Etheredge, it should become necessary so to do in order to protect their interests, that the aforesaid mortgage is not to be filed for record for twenty days from this date, November 18th, 1884; and that if payments upon the same at a satisfactory rate are made within said twenty days, that said paper is not to be recorded therein.

"R. E. FARRISH, for Slade & Etheredge."

Complainants filed their replication to the answer of defendant. Afterwards the complainants filed their petition for the appointment of a receiver. The petition recited the previous proceedings in the case, the injunction and modification of the same, and alleged that during the time that the defendant had been in possession after the issuance of the injunction, up to the time of filing the petition for a receiver, the sales averaged only $6 a day; that the last week's sales by the defendant, reported by him January 19th, were only $20, of which sum he deducted $10, clerk hire, or 50 per cent. of the entire gross proceeds; that, at the rate at which defendant was depositing money in the registry of the court, it would take 11 months to raise the sum required by the order of the court; that such sales had occurred during the business season, when sales were best, and that there was reason to expect they would be much less during the dull season, which was coming on in the summer. The chancellor granted the motion.

Testimony was taken by both parties before commissioners agreed on by them.

On final hearing the chancellor decreed that a master of the court should sell so much of the property remaining in the hands of the receiver as was necessary, in addition to the amount realized by the receiver from sales by him, to pay the respective debts of the complainants, including all costs, interest, and 20 per cent. attorney's fee. From this decree, and the interlocutory decrees mentioned, the defendant entered an appeal to this court, and assigned as error: (1) Granting the order of 28th November restraining defendant from selling the merchandise, except for cash, and requiring him to deposit the same in the registry of the court; (2) granting the order of 14th of February, appointing W. H. Milton receiver, and directing him to sell said merchandise; (3) granting the final decree in the cause.

John W. Malone and John H. McKinne, for appellant. Liddon & Carter, for appellees.

RANEY, C. J. 1. This case is on rehearing. The preceding statement and the next 10 paragraphs of this opinion were prepared by Chief Justice MCWHORTER, and are adopted and approved by the court as now constituted:

"The first error assigned is the granting the order restraining the defendant from selling said merchandise except for cash, and requiring him to deposit the proceeds in the registry of the court. The mortgage, if valid,—a question which we will consider hereafter,—was meant as a security for the debts described therein and intended to be secured thereby. It is a well-settled principle that a court of equity will restrain a mortgagor from doing any act that will destroy or impair the security upon which the mortgagee, by virtue of the mortgage, has a right to rely for the payment for his debt. If there were no such right in the mortgagee to preserve intact his security, and no such jurisdiction vested in a court of equity to aid him in its preservation, mortgages would be of little value. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 914, 915.

"The evidence shows that the mortgage was executed on the 18th day of November, 1884; that on the 19th, the day after its execution, goods were sold from the store to different parties, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $305, to pay said parties debts owing them by the defendant. It is true the answer, which was filed February 20th, says that these goods were sold by defendant's clerk in his absence; but in his affidavit previously filed, to-wit, on the 22d day of November, three days after such sales, defendant swears that he 'had not sold or disposed of any goods, wares, or merchandise, except in the usual course of his business.' This denial, in the first place, when the transaction must have been known to him and fresh in his memory, and subsequent admission of it, and the attempt to avoid its force by saying it was done by his clerk in his absence, bear a suspicious appearance. If it is true that the goods were sold by the clerk in his absence, it nevertheless remains that he does not say that they were sold without his knowledge or direction. We must assume that such sales were known to and approved by him. It cannot be denied that the sales of over $300 worth of goods in one day after the mortgage was made, and no cash realized therefrom, being sold to pay his other debts, was an impairment of the mortgage, which the mortgagee had a right to prevent, and brings it within the principle mentioned above. There was no error in granting the restraining order.

"The next error assigned is the appointment of a receiver. We think the facts set forth in the petition, and which were not denied, justified the chancellor, in the exercise of a sound discretion, in appointing a receiver. The same reason that would induce the chancellor to grant an injunction to prevent the impairment or destruction of a mortgage security, when the injunction was found insufficient for the purpose intended, would justify him in appointing a receiver, when it was made apparent to him that it was necessary for the preservation of the property intended as a security. It was apparent from the amount of sales that a longer time would elapse before the complainants could realize the amounts due them than the law would require them to wait. It was also apparent that the expenses were bearing too heavy a proportion to the amount of sales, and that some quicker and less expensive method was necessary.

"It will be seen from the pleadings that the bill seeks a foreclosure and sale of the property. The answer admits the making the mortgage, and seeks to avoid it on two grounds: That its execution was procured by fraud, and that the complainants agreed not to record it in 20 days, and not then, if satisfactory payments were made. These are the only two points that are raised by the bill and answer, and all that this court would be justified in deciding.

"A very careful scrutiny of the evidence convinces us that while the defendant, who it seems was young and without experience, was very probably not aware of the full legal consequences of the papers he signed at the time he executed them, that there was no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the complainants or their agents to induce him to execute the mortgage and obligations. He did it voluntarily, and, if he made a hard bargain, he cannot complain. The answer does not deny any of the allegations of the bill. It sets up matters in avoidance, and defendant must be held to prove them. Lucas v. Bank, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 280. His proof is his own testimony and what inference might be drawn from the fact that the paper, supra, given to him by Farrish, as agent for Slade & Etheredge, and which was the only one of all of them which he was to retain, speaks of no mortgage but one to Slade & Etheredge.

"This, in connection with the fact that all the claims were embraced in one mortgage, we admit is a strong circumstance in support of his testimony. But we think it is overborne by the testimony of McKinnon and Farley, who are disinterested witnesses; by the testimony of Farrish, who is also disinterested as to the mortgage to all the complainants in the bill except Slade & Etheredge,—and there is no contention as to their mortgage except as to recording it, by the evidence of Liddon and Carter,—who all swear that the mortgage was read in full to defendant; and by his own letter to Liddon & Carter that he would come to their office, and either pay or secure the claim then in suit against him of Garrett & Sons, the other claims mentioned in the mortgage coming to their hands after he wrote the letter, and before executing the mortgage.

"The agreement not to record the mortgage within 20 days, and not then if satisfactory payments were made, is a question of some difficulty. An agreement not to record a mortgage of personal property within a limited time, not unreasonably long, would not, in our opinion, vitiate it so far as the parties to it were concerned, in the absence of a conflict with the rights of purchasers and creditors in the intervening time.

"If it was clear that by a contemporaneous written agreement the mortgagee had bound himself not to record the mortgage if satisfactory payments were made on it in the 20 days, an agreement not to do the very thing that the statute says is indispensable to its validity, we should be inclined to hold, if such payments were made, that the mortgage was rendered void by such agreement as a security for the unpaid balance after deducting the 'satisfactory payments,' so far as the personal property was concerned. The proviso that 'unless, in the opinion of Slade & Etheredge's attorneys, it should be necessary to record the mortgage in order to protect their interests,' applied only to the first clause as to the recording within the 20 days. It had no force as to the contingency of making satisfactory payments in the 20 days; that is, if the mortgage was not recorded in the 20 days, and in the mean time the mortgagor made such payments, it would have been the absolute right of the mortgagor, if the agreement was valid, that the mortgage should not be recorded.

"But the right to record the mortgage within 20 days, if the attorneys of Slade & Etheredge should think it necessary, and the exercise of it by recording the same before the lapse of that time, if for proper cause, necessarily nullified the last clause not to record it, if satisfactory payments were made, because the vitality of the agreement was dependent upon its not being recorded in the 20 days, or, if wrongfully recorded within that time, that such payments were made before the time mentioned had elapsed. After its record under the power to do so, if thought necessary to protect the interest of Slade & Etheredge, it being recorded before any satisfactory payments were made, the rights of the mortgagor, under the latter clause of the agreement, necessarily terminated.

"The facts set forth and considered heretofore, as being sufficient to justify the granting of the restraining order, were also sufficient to justify the attorneys for Slade & Etheredge in the exercise of the discretion vested in them in filing the mortgage for record."

II. It was also held in another paragraph of the opinion that certain points made in this court by the appellant could not be considered, because they had not been made in the lower court. These points were: That the suit was prematurely brought; that the mortgage was not recorded in accordance with law, or not sufficiently proven to entitle it to be admitted to record; and, third, that the obligations sued on were void because of the stipulations therein to pay attorney's fees. A rehearing was applied for on the ground that there was error in this conclusion, and, some doubts having arisen as to this conclusion, the rehearing was granted.

In Trust Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359, it was held that an appeal in equity is substantially a rehearing of the cause, and the appellate court has the right to look into the whole case as it is presented by the record, and may even consider points made primarily there if raised by the pleadings and proofs; yet care must be taken that neither the appellant nor appellee be permitted to surprise or mislead his adversary, or to make objections which if made in the court below might have been obviated. See, also, Fairchild v. Knight, 18 Fla. 770; Proctor v. Hart, 5 Fla. 465; Beekman v. Frost, 18 Johns. 544; Bank v. Smedes, 3 Cow. 684; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1488 et seq.

In the case before us there was a demurrer to the bill as being multifarious, and because a prior mortgagee of the property was not a party, and, this demurrer having been overruled, the defendant answered, but in his answer he does not raise any of these defenses.

The objection that the suit was prematurely brought is based upon the idea that the writings obligatory sued on and secured by the mortgage were entitled to grace, and that the days of grace had not expired when the bill was filed. We will not be understood as assenting to the proposition that a bill single or writing obligatory is, either by the law-merchant or the statute of this state, entitled to grace. Rand. Com. Paper, § 1056; Tied. Com. Paper, § 32; Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 31, 34, 620; Skidmore v. Little, 4 Tex. 301; Fields v. Mallett, 3 Hawks, 465; McClel. Dig. p. 832, § 86; Cotten v. Williams, 1 Fla. 37; Bellas v. Keyser, 17 Fla. 100, 106, 107. But, however this may be, our opinion is that if the defendant had wished to test the merit of such a defense he should have done so by the proper pleading in the lower court, and at an early stage of the proceedings therein. Assuming that such a defense could have been found available, considering the nature of the suit and the character of the instruments secured by the mortgage, it was a defense which went, not in bar of the cause of action, but only to the bill or in abatement of the suit, and should have been interposed promptly, and before the defendant could be said to have waived it. 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 626, 627; Palmer v. Gardiner, 77 Ill. 143. The defendant did not attempt to raise such a defense by his pleadings, and to permit it to be raised here, after a long and expensive contest as to the validity of the mortgage, upon the grounds stated in the original opinion, would not only encourage the most misleading practice, but work a great wrong, by permitting the defendant to do now what he cannot reasonably be deemed to have ever intended before he appealed to this court.

The basis of the point that the mortgage was not duly proven for record, and therefore not legally recorded, and hence is not binding as a mortgage of the personal property mentioned therein, is an alleged deficiency in the affidavit of one of the subscribing witnesses upon which the instrument was admitted to record as such oath is shown by the appeal transcript as stated in the certificate of record indorsed on the original mortgage annexed to the bill as a part thereof. The bill distinctly alleges that the instrument had been correctly recorded on the proof, whose sufficiency is now attempted to be assailed. By failing, under these circumstances, to take exception in the lower court by proper pleading to the sufficiency of the proof and legality of the record, and contesting the foreclosure of the mortgage throughout a firmly contested and expensive litigation on other grounds, involving that of the right of the mortgagees to record the mortgage at the time they did, the appellant must be held to have waived any defect there may be in such proof. The defendant has tacitly admitted the sufficiency of the proof and the legality of the record in so far as it is dependent upon such proof throughout the litigation, and up to a point at which he cannot be permitted to take exception to it without imposing upon the complainants great hardship and loss, which proper practice upon the part of the appellant could have obviated. Proper practice dictates that he should be held to the position of a tacit admission of the sufficiency of the record knowingly taken by him in the lower court. The objection, taking the most favorable view of it, is not one fatal to the complainants' claim; but like that of the prematureness of the suit, discussed above, it would only go to the bill; and assuming the objection to the proof to be good, and that it could not, had it been made below, have been cured by showing, as for aught we know may appear in the record in the clerk's office, that there was the most sufficient proof of the execution of the instrument, there can be no doubt, in view of the testimony, that had complainants been compelled to dismiss the bill they could have had it recorded on due proof, and renewed the suit without delay, and without any considerable expense or loss of time.

The third ground, which is that the obligations are void because of the stipulation therein for the payment of attorney's fees, is also one which properly should have been taken by demurrer to the bill. There is no such ground in the demurrer filed, nor is it made elsewhere by the defendant's pleadings. However, if the law rendered any and all contracts of which a stipulation to pay attorney's fees was a feature, absolutely void, and their enforcement contrary to public policy, under any and all circumstances, which, in effect, is the position of appellant here, we are inclined to think the court should refuse to enforce such contract, although the effect of the feature was called to their attention primarily on appeal. Pittman v. Myrick, 16 Fla. 692; Crosby v. Huston, 1 Tex. 203; Foster v. Wilson, 5 Mont. 53, 2 Pac. Rep. 310. This, however, is not the effect of such a stipulation in this state nor elsewhere, according to the authorities which we have been able to find. The decisions of this court affirm the legality of a stipulation for reasonable attorney's fees. L'Engle v. L'Engle, 21 Fla. 131; Long v. Herrick, 26 Fla. 356, 8 South. Rep. 50. No contest as to the reasonableness of the amount stipulated for was made in the circuit court, and it is not attempted to be made here, if it could be.

The decree is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Nov. Term, 1890.)

ASSISTING PRISONER TO ESCAPE—INDICTMENT.

Code Ala. § 4002, imposes a penalty upon any person who conveys into the county jail anything "useful to aid any prisoner to escape therefrom, with the intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner," etc., "or who, by any other act or in any other way, aids or assists such prisoner to escape." Held, that an indictment charging that defendant assisted in such an escape "by unlocking or opening the door or doors of the room or rooms of said jail, and by opening the window in one of the rooms of said jail," is bad, unless it charges that said acts were done "with intent to facilitate the escape," and that they were useful in aiding it.

Appeal from circuit court, Macon county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Walker was indicted for aiding the escape of prisoners from jail. Judgment of conviction, from which defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Peyton Thompson, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLOPTON, J. Appellant was indicted and convicted under section 4002 of the Code, which declares that any person who conveys into the county jail "any disguise, weapon, tool, instrument, or other thing useful to aid any prisoner to escape therefrom, with the intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner lawfully confined therein under a charge or conviction of felony, or who, by any other act or in any other way, aids or assists such prisoner to escape, whether such escape be attempted or effected or not, * * * must, on conviction, be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than ten years." The indictment originally contained three counts. A demurrer having been sustained to the second count, and overruled as to the others, defendant was put to trial on the first and third counts, which are respectively framed under the first and second clauses of the statute. The jury having found the defendant guilty as charged in the third count, which, under our rulings, is an acquittal of the offense charged in the first count, it is unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the latter count. The third count charges that defendant "did aid or assist Louis Key and Sing Bowen, who were then and there confined in the county jail of Macon county, Alabama, under the charge or charges of assault with intent to murder, to escape from such jail, in this, to-wit, by unlocking or opening the door or doors of the room or rooms in said jail, and by breaking or opening the window in one of the rooms of said jail." The statute, as has been said, is not merely an affirmation of the common law, but creates a new substantive offense, having three main ingredients: (1) A prisoner lawfully confined under a charge or conviction of felony; (2) conveying into the county jail or other place of confinement something useful to aid such prisoner to escape, or aiding or assisting his escape by any other act or in any other way, whether such escape be attempted or effected or not; (3) the intent to facilitate the escape of such prisoner. Wilson v. State, 61 Ala. 151. When the indictment charges that the offered assistance was by some other act or way than those specially named in the first clause of the statute, it is essential, in order to charge the complete statutory offense, that the indictment should aver the intent to facilitate the escape of the prisoner, and that such act or way was useful to aid him in escaping, unless it naturally so appears; these being necessary constituents of the criminal act, though mentioned only in the first clause in juxtaposition to the modes of assistance therein specially named. In Hurst v. State, 79 Ala. 55, it is said: "It would be necessary to aver what that other thing, act, or way was, and that it was useful to aid the prisoner's escape, unless by its very nature it appeared to be so. * * * The averment that it was done 'with intent to facilitate the escape' is indispensable. Without such intent the crime is not committed." Had the indictment averred the unlocking or breaking or opening a door or window of the room in which the prisoners were confined, this would naturally import usefulness in aiding them to escape; but whether unlocking or breaking or opening an outside door or window of the jail, or of any room other than that in which the prisoners were confined, would be useful to aid their escape, depends on the circumstances; and the indictment should have averred that it was useful. For the omission of both the averments mentioned, the third count is defective. Reversed and remanded.

HARRISON v. STATE.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ORIGINAL PACKAGES.

Where bottles of liquor are placed in a wooden box, and shipped into the state to be sold on commission, the box is the original package. Keith v. State, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 353, followed.

Appeal from circuit court, Choctaw county; WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Indictment against Harrison for selling liquor in violation of law. From a judgment of conviction defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Carnathan, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. The record contains no bill of exceptions, and we presume the evidence showed that the liquors sold were of the class averred by the indictment and forbidden by the statute. In framing indictments for a violation of the law against retailing, and of local prohibitory laws, regard should be had to the legal distinction of the various kinds of liquors, the sale of which is prohibited, and what is necessary to constitute an indictment sufficient to include them all. Tinker v. State, 90 Ala. 647, 8 South. Rep. 855; Brantley v. State, 91 Ala. 47, 8 South. Rep. 816; Allred v. State, 89 Ala. 112, 8 South. Rep. 56. The only error assigned in the record for revision is the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer to defendant's second plea. The purpose of the plea was to raise the question as to when an "original package" becomes a "broken package." The plea states that the bottles were packed in wooden boxes, and shipped to the defendant, to be sold on commissions; that after the boxes were received the defendant opened the boxes, took the bottles out, and sold the bottles of liquor separately. So far as the facts are presented in this plea, the precise question has been adjudicated. Keith v. State, 91 Ala. 2, 8 South. Rep. 353, (at present term.) The "original package" having been broken, the sale of each bottle of the prohibited liquor was a violation of the statute. The constitutionality of such statute has been too often recognized to require consideration. See, also, Tinker v. State, (opinion by McCLELLAN, J.,) 90 Ala. 638, 8 South. Rep. 814.

JACKSON et al. v. JACKSON.

RESTRAINING ACTION AT LAW—RIGHT TO INTERVENE.

1 An injunction restraining an action at law, issued on a bill by plaintiffs, as administrators, will not be dissolved on defendant's answer, alleging that the money sought to be recovered did not belong to the estate, but was her individual property, by gift from intestate, and was deposited with a firm, of which one of the administrators was a member; as the burden of proving such gift is on defendant.

2. Where a banking firm is sued to recover money deposited, a member of the firm cannot intervene as administrator of an estate claiming such deposit under Code Ala. § 2610, giving such right to one "not a party to the suit, without collusion with him."

Appeal from chancery court, Lauderdale county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Bill of interpleader by Felix E. Jackson and another against Elizabeth Jackson. From the denial of motion to dissolve injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McClellan & McClellan and O'Neal & O'Neal, for appellant. Simpson & Jones, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. Aristides E. Jackson died intestate in January, 1887, and in March afterwards the appellees were appointed administrators of his estate. Felix E. Jackson and Andrew Jackson were partners in trade in the firm name of Jackson Bros. Soon after the death of intestate, Mrs. Elizabeth Jackson, his widow, deposited with Jackson Bros. $880 as her own money, and took their receipt therefor. Subsequently she demanded the money of them, but they refused to pay it to her, on the ground, as they alleged, that the money was claimed as part of the assets of the estate of the intestate, and was not hers. She thereupon instituted an action at law against them for the recovery of the money she had so deposited with them. Felix E. Jackson, one of the administrators, is the same Felix E. Jackson who is a member of the firm of Jackson Bros. The present bill was filed by the administrators. It asserts that said money is the property of the estate of Aristides E. Jackson; that Mrs. Jackson claims it under an alleged gift made by her husband to her in his life-time; denies that such gift was made; and prays an injunction against her suit at law. It charges that she is insolvent. A temporary injunction was awarded. The foot-note waives answer under oath. Mrs. Jackson filed a sworn answer. She admitted that without the $880 she is insolvent. She denies the averment of the bill that she took the money without authority, and avers that her husband gave it to her in his life-time. She demurred to the bill mainly on the ground that complainants had an adequate remedy at law,—to be particularly noticed further on. A motion was made to dissolve the injunction—First, for want of equity in the bill; and, second, on the denials contained in the answer. The chancellor overruled the motion to dissolve, and from that ruling the present appeal is prosecuted. We will first consider the question of the denials in the answer.

When the bill avers facts, the burden of proving which is entirely on complainant, then, if the sworn answer is made on knowledge and contains an unequivocal denial of the charges on which the right to an injunction rests, the general rule is that the injunction must be dissolved on the denials in the answer. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 352, § 303. But even this rule is not universal. Satterfield v. John, 53 Ala. 127; Chambers v. Iron Co., 67 Ala. 353; Davis v. Sowell, 77 Ala. 262. The present case, however, does not fall within the class described above. Under the averments of the bill, the burden of disproving the alleged gift from intestate to his wife does not rest on complainants. On the contrary, stated as the question is in the bill, it was for her to satisfy the court by proof that the gift had been made to her. The answer on this point is in the nature of a confession and avoidance, and will not avail to dissolve an injunction. Rembert v. Brown, 17 Ala. 667; Miller v. Bates, 35 Ala. 580. The chancellor did not err in refusing to dissolve the injunction on the denials in the answer.

The second ground taken in demurrer is that complainants had an adequate remedy at law, and therefore the bill is without equity. The remedy claimed in argument is what is known as our statutory provision for interpleader at common law. Code 1886, § 2610 Possibly a sufficient answer to this argument is that the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the courts of law, or the recognition or enforcement by them of equitable rights and interests, even when conferred in terms by statute, does not, in the absence of statutory prohibition, take away or impair the original jurisdiction of the chancery court. Lee v. Lee, 55 Ala. 590; Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448. We hold, however, that the statute invoked is not adapted to such a case as this. The double relation which Felix E. Jackson sustains to the transaction incapacitates him to seek redress under it. It can scarcely be said that F. E. Jackson, administrator, is not a party to a suit against F. E. Jackson; and he surely could not make oath that he in the one capacity is not in collusion with himself in the other. Other clauses of the statute might be commented on, but we deem it unnecessary. Section 2611, Code 1886, is not suited to a suit on a moneyed demand. We hold that the bill contains equity, and that the chancellor did right in retaining the injunction until the hearing on the merits. Farris v. Houston, 78 Ala. 250.

VICKSBURG & M. R. CO. v. LEWIS et al.

RAILROAD LANDS—TAXATION—EJECTMENT—MESNE PROFITS.

1. Under Code Miss. 1880, § 608, allowing a railroad company to pay a privilege tax, and thereby be exempt from all other taxes, on property "owned and used in operating the railroad," land which belonged to it, and formed part of its depot grounds, but which had been included within the inclosure of one owning adjoining land, and which continued to be so inclosed and used by him under the mistaken belief of all that it belonged to him, is not protected from taxation as land by payment of the privilege tax.

2. Where the railroad company defends an action of ejectment for the land brought by persons who had obtained title under a tax-sale, it cannot free itself from liability for mesne profits by permitting a third person to remain in actual possession.

3. Making non-user of the lot for railroad purposes at the time of the levy of the taxes, instead of at the time the privilege tax was paid, the test of its exemption from taxation, was harmless error, it appearing that it was not used for such purposes at either time.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Ejectment by G. B. Lewis and others against the Vicksburg & Meridian Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Code Miss. 1880, § 608, allowed the railroad company to pay a privilege tax, and thereby be exempt from all other taxes on property "owned and used in operating the railroad." Plaintiff claimed the land under a sale for taxes assessed in 1880, after the railroad company had paid its privilege tax. Although the land belonged to the company before it lost title under the tax-sale, and was part of one of its depot grounds, it had for many years been included in the inclosure of one owning adjoining land, under the mistaken belief of all that it belonged to him. This land was known as the "Corson Lot."

W. L. Nugent, for appellant. C. M. Williamson, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. The evidence makes it clear that the "Corson Lot," for many years before 1880, and for years after that, was inclosed as a separate and distinct parcel of land, erroneously supposed not to belong to the railroad company, but to another owner, and not in any way used or even claimed by the company. Surely, under such circumstances, it cannot be successfully claimed that this lot was land owned by the company and used in operating its road, so as to protect it from taxation as land by reason of the payment of the privilege tax. The liability of the appellant for rent of the lot arises from the fact that it withheld the possession from the owners. Its yielding the house to Page could not free it from liability to the plaintiffs, who recovered the lot, and are entitled to mesne profits. The criticism of the first instruction for the plaintiff, because of its making non-user of the lot in operating the railroad at the time of the sale for taxes the test of exemption, is just, but unavailing as ground to reverse the judgment, because it is manifest that the same state of things existed in 1880 as did at the time of the sale, and on the facts the result is right. DAVIS v. NETTERVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Oct. Term, 1890.)

EXECUTION—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSONS—ABANDONMENT OF LEVY.

Under Code Miss. 1880, §§ 1774, 1775, which provide that on return of an execution levied on property claimed by a third person, with the claimant's affidavit and bond, further proceedings on the execution shall be stayed for an amount equal to the value of such property till the final decision of the claim, a second levy of an execution on property to the full amount of the execution, though irregular, cannot be considered as an abandonment of the original levy.

Appeal from circuit court, Wilkinson county; RALPH NORTH, Judge.

An execution was levied by C. H. Netterville against Hugh L. Davis, and defendant's wife, Laura McG. Davis, executed a claimant's affidavit and bond. On trial of the issue there was judgment for plaintiff. Claimant appeals. Affirmed.

Claimant claimed title under a deed from her husband, executed March 8, 1888, and recorded July 17, 1881, but the record failed to show when it was filed for record. The execution was levied July 14, 1888.

W. P. & J. B. Harris and Hugh L. Davis, for appellant.

WOODS, C. J. Netterville, who was the plaintiff in execution in the trial below, caused to be levied an execution upon certain live-stock as the property of Hugh L. Davis. The appellant made claimant's affidavit and bond, and took charge of the property. Subsequently, and before the return of the writ into court, additional levies were made on other property to the full amount named in the execution. On the trial of the claimant's issue, this writ, with the sheriff's returns, was offered in evidence by plaintiff in execution, and was admitted over the objection of appellant, and this action of the court is assigned for error. The ground of appellant's contention is, that, inasmuch as section 1774, Code 1880, makes it the duty of the officer holding an execution, after affidavit and bond made by a claimant, to return such affidavit and bond with the execution, and as section 1775 declares further proceedings on such execution shall be stayed for an amount equal to the value of the property so claimed, as indorsed and returned by the officer, until the final decision of such claim, therefore the subsequent levies in this case without any stay of execution to the amount of the value of the property taken by the claimant, should be held to be an abandonment of the first levy on the property embraced in the pending proceeding. The vice of the officer's proceedings in making the levies consisted in making the second and third levies for an amount greater than the statute authorized. The irregularity was in the subsequent levies; not in the first. The complaint lies properly to the action of the officer in making the later levies, and not to the first. Whether these later levies were invalid, or whether they were mere irregularities which may be corrected on application to the court out of which the process issued, it is unnecessary for us to determine. The right to make additional levies is not disputed by counsel, and, as the levy evidenced by the return which was admitted is unassailable, standing alone, we must hold that the subsequent irregularity in making the additional levies cannot be considered an abandonment of the original levy. Whatever the effect of the levy for an amount greater than that contemplated by the statutes cited on these additional levies, we must hold the original levy is in no way affected thereby, and hence that the action of the court was not erroneous.

The several other questions presented need not be considered by us, in view of the undisputed fact that the deed to the live-stock, though executed before the officer's levy, was recorded afterwards. It nowhere appears that this deed was filed for record before the day on which it was actually recorded. Under section 1178, Code 1880, making a conveyance from a husband to his wife valid when such conveyance is in writing and acknowledged and filed for record, it is declared that third persons are to be affected only by the filing of the conveyance for record. Before the conveyance from Hugh L. Davis to his wife had been recorded, and, so far as the record before us discloses, before the conveyance had been filed for record, (for, in the absence of any proof offered by claimant on this point, we cannot assume that it had been filed at an earlier day,) the execution had been levied and the rights of third persons had intervened. At the date of the levy upon the property involved in this suit, it is manifest that the claimant had no conveyance which she could assert or maintain against the appellee. This being determined, the other questions argued by counsel become immaterial. Montgomery v. Scott, 61 Miss. 409.

SCHLEICHER et al. v. WALKER.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Oct. 31, 1891.)

PARTNERSHIP—LIENS OF CREDITORS—SALE OF INTEREST BY PARTNER—DISSOLUTION—INSOLVENCY—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Partnership creditors have not, as such, any lien on partnership assets.

2. The equity of partnership creditors to have partnership assets applied to partnership debts as against claims of creditors of any one member of the firm is dependent entirely upon the lien or equity of the other member or members of the firm to have such application.

3. One partner may, upon a voluntary dissolution of a firm, sell to his copartner all his interest in the partnership concern, and if he do so bona fide, before any lien has been acquired thereon by partnership creditors through an execution, an attachment, or otherwise, the transfer will, if such be the intention of the partners, vest in the purchasing partner, divested of the equity of the selling partner to have the partnership assets applied to partnership debts.

4. A stipluation or covenant by the purchasing partner to pay the firm debts is not fatal to the good faith of a transfer of the other partner's interest in the partnership concerns, nor to the divestiture of the joint ownership or partnership character of the property; but, to the contrary, such a covenant may be the sole consideration of the transfer.

5. Where one partner transfers his entire interest in the partnership concerns to his copartner, so as to vest in the latter the partnership assets as his sole property, a dissolution of the partnership results.

6. The purchasing partner may, as against any simple creditor of the partnership, assign for the payment of his individual debts the partnership property vested in him as his sole property by a transfer from his partner. It seems that he may exercise the same dominion over it which he can over any other individual property.

7. The fact that partners were insolvent six weeks or more after a transfer by one of them of his entire interest in the partnership concerns to the other does not establish their insolvency as of the time of such transfer, nor avoid a transfer as a fraud upon partnership creditors.

8. Where the questions of the good faith of a sale by one partner to another, and of an assignment by the latter to pay his creditors, and of the intent to hinder and defraud creditors, and of whether such sale was made in contemplation of insolvency, have been fairly submitted to a jury, its finding will not be disturbed by an appellate court unless the testimony justifies it at least clearly.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Action on two promissory notes by Schleicher, Schumm & Co. against William Ashmead and Clarence Ashmead. John T. Walker filed an affidavit claiming certain money in the hands of a garnishee, and verdict and judgment were rendered in his favor. Complainants bring error. Affirmed.

STATEMENT BY THE COURT. On March 7, 1884, William H. and Clarence H. Ashmead being partners under the firm name of Ashmead Bros., at Jacksonville, the latter executed to the former a bill of sale, whereby, "for and in consideration of the sum of six thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States, to me paid by William H. Ashmead, * * * the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged," Clarence bargained, sold, and conveyed to William all his (Clarence's) interests in the assets of Ashmead Bros. On the 24th day of the same month William H. executed a written instrument, whereby he assigned and transferred to John T. Walker all moneys that he, William, "may be entitled to have from insurance effects from Ashmead Bros. on property of all kinds which was lost by fire in the building on Bay street, * * * destroyed by fire on the night of the 23d instant, in trust, however, that he shall collect the said money, and at once distribute the same pro rata, without any discrimination or preference, among all my creditors." It constitutes Walker his attorney in fact to demand, sue for, and receive all said moneys for the purpose aforesaid, and in his, William's, name and stead, or in that of Ashmead Bros., of whom William is "the successor by purchase and assignment," to execute all proper receipts and releases. On the 27th of the month the plaintiffs sued William and Clarence, doing business as Ashmead Bros., in an action of assumpsit, and on the 29th procured a writ of garnishment, which was served the same day on one Foster, an agent of the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company. The plaintiffs' action was brought to recover on two promissory notes dated January 22, 1884, each for the sum of $200 principal, and maturing, one 30 and the other 60 days after date. To this action defendants appeared on April 7th, the day the declaration was filed.

On April 24th William H. and Clarence, partners under the firm name aforesaid, parties of the first part, executed a deed to Whitfield Walker, reciting that they were indebted to divers persons in sundry sums of money, which they were unable to pay in full, and granting, bargaining, selling, and assigning to said Walker, his heirs and successors, all the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, stock, promissory notes, debts, claims, demands, property, and effects of every description belonging to them, either as partners or individuals, wherever the same may be, in trust, to sell and convert the property into money, and to collect the debts and demands, and out of the proceeds of such sales and collections to pay (1) expenses, costs, and charges of the trust; (2, 3) out of the proceeds of the sales of the individual property of each partner to pay his individual debts, and the surplus to carry into the fund for the payment of partnership creditors; (4) to pay rent due for premises occupied by them; and (5) to apply the residue to the liabilities of the said parties of the first part, in full or ratably, according to the sufficiency, giving him full power to demand, recover, and receive of and from every person or persons all property, debts, and demands due, owing, and belonging to the parties of the first part, or either of them.

On May 5th there was judgment by default, followed by a final judgment on the 17th for $405.24 and costs. On the same 5th day of May the garnishee answered, stating that the loss by fire had been adjusted at $3,000, and that the company was indebted to Ashmead Bros. in this sum, but that on the morning next after the fire, and before the writ of garnishment was served, the garnishee was notified that Ashmead Bros. had assigned all their interest under the said fire loss to John T. Walker, and that since then a copy of the assignment had been served, the same being annexed to the answer. The answer submits the question as to whom the money is due to the court.

On the 24th of August John T. Walker filed an affidavit entitled in the above cause, and to the effect that the money in the possession of the garnishee was bona fide his property as trustee for the purposes mentioned in the above deed of assignment to him, and upon this claim a jury was sworn on January 11, 1885, to try the issue thus made between the plaintiffs and said Walker, and, having heard the evidence, they found for the claimant. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and judgment was rendered that claimant had the right of property in the hands of the garnishee, and that he recover costs of the plaintiffs, etc.

The bill of exceptions shows that upon this trial the plaintiffs, who are plaintiffs in error, introduced in evidence the record of their suit and rested, and thereupon the claimant introduced the above bill of sale from Clarence to William H. Ashmead, and the deed of assignment from the latter to such claimant, John T. Walker, and rested. The plaintiffs then put in evidence the deed of assignment from the Ashmeads to Whitfield Walker, and also placed on the stand William H. Ashmead, who testified as follows: "My name is William H. Ashmead. I was one of the firm of Ashmead Bros., composed of Clarence H. Ashmead and myself. I am the William H. Ashmead to whom the bill of sale was made by Clarence H. Ashmead, and I am the person also who made the assignment to John T. Walker, and also one of the parties who made the assignment in the name of Ashmead Bros. to Whitfield Walker. At the time I made the assignment to John T. Walker I was indebted individually in small amounts to one or two persons, and owed my brother, Clarence H. Ashmead, the six thousand dollars mentioned in the assignment from my said brother to myself. My brother and myself, finding it best to continue the business after the said bill of sale was executed, rescinded the sale, and afterwards executed the assignment to Whitfield Walker. At the time we executed the assignment to Whitfield Walker we were insolvent. At the time that my brother, Clarence, sold out to me, we did not announce any dissolution of our copartnership in the papers or any other way. We afterwards found that I could not go on in business satisfactorily to both of us, and we thus rescinded the sale, and made the subsequent assignment."

The following instructions were asked by the plaintiffs, but refused, and the refusal of each of them excepted to:

"(1) If the jury find from the evidence that, at the time of the execution of the assignment to John T. Walker, William H. Ashmead was indebted to Clarence H. Ashmead, his former partner, in the sum of five thousand and odd dollars, as a part of the consideration of his purchase, then the said assignment to Walker, as a matter of law, is fraudulent and void, and the jury must find for the plaintiffs, and that the funds in the hands of the garnishee are subject to plaintiffs' garnishment.

"(2) Partners may make bona fide sales of their property at any time before their creditors acquire a lien, but a sale, directly or indirectly, to one of the partners, with a stipulation that he will pay the firm's debts, is not such a bona fide sale as to divest the property of its character as firm property primarily liable for firm debts; and a partnership creditor, by his attachment or garnishment, creates a lien paramount to the claim of the partner so purchasing or an assignee of said partner."

The judge, however, charged the jury, at the request of the claimant, as follows:

"(1) If you believe from the evidence that the assignment from Clarence Ashmead to William Ashmead, and the assignment to John T. Walker, were made in good faith, and without any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiffs or other creditors of Ashmead Bros., you will find for the claimant.

"(2) If you believe from the evidence that the assignment from Clarence Ashmead to William Ashmead was not made in contemplation of insolvency, and was made without intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiffs or other creditors of Ashmead Bros., and that the assignment to Walker was in good faith, and without any such intent, you will find for the claimant."

There were also charges as to the form of the verdict, which need not be recited.

Each of the charges given at the request of the claimant was excepted to.

A. W. Cockrell & Son, for plaintiffs in error. Walker & L'Engle, for defendant in error.

RANEY, C. J. In Griffin v. Orman, 9 Fla. 22, and 10 Fla. 9, there had been a partnership between Sewell, Orman, and Young, under the name of Orman & Young, and the period for which, by the articles, it was to last, had expired, but there had been no settlement between the partners, when, in January, 1829, Orman and Young sold their entire interest in the assets of the concern, for the consideration of $17,500, payable out of such assets, which payment was so made to Sewell, he assuming the payment of the debts of the firm, and executing to them a bond, with surety, conditioned for the payment of the same. It was contended that Orman and Young had an equitable lien upon the partnership property for amounts which they had paid for the firm subsequent to the sale. This court held that this would, notwithstanding the dissolution, have been so, but for the agreement represented above, the effect of which was, in its opinion, that the partnership stock became the exclusive property of Sewell, and that Sewell should pay all the debts, and the indemnity bond being for security that he would do so. It will be borne in mind, says the opinion, that the partnership property was not left in the hands of Sewell to pay the debts with, he assuming the trust. "The partnership is dissolved; a final settlement made; an agreement entered into between the partners, in which the creditors are not parties, that Sewell, as a part of the purchase money, will pay all the debts, not specifically out of the partnership property, but that he would pay them, and as an indemnity against their suffering he executes a bond with security." That the fact of taking this bond with security, and the fact of Orman and Young covenanting to warrant and defend against their claim, seemed conclusive that it was the intention of the parties that the effects assigned to Sewell should be appropriated to his private use.

In West v. Chasten, 12 Fla. 315, there was an agreement between the remaining and the retiring partner by which the former assumed the debts of the firm, and agreed to save the latter harmless from the same, the latter transferring and assigning all his interest in the goods to the remaining partner; and it was held that by virtue of this agreement the partnership property ceased to be joint property, and the lien or equity of the retiring partner to have a sale of the property and an application of it to the joint debts was destroyed. See, also, Upson v. Arnold, 19 Ga. 190.

It is true that these decisions were in cases between former partners, but it must be remembered that the right or equity of a creditor of a partnership to have partnership assets applied to partnership debts as against the individual creditor of any one member of the firm is through that lien or equity of the other member or members, which constitutes the right of the latter to such application. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 675, 1253; Story, Partn. §§ 358, 360; Washburn v. Bank, 19 Vt. 278; Bardwell v. Perry, Id. 292; Rice v. Barnard, 20 Vt. 479; Smith v. Edwards, 7 Humph. 106; Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. 119; Ex parte Williams, 11 Ves. 3; Ex parte Rowlandson, 2 Ves. & B. 172; Baker's Appeal, 21 Pa. St. 76; Clement v. Foster, 3 Ired. Eq. 213; Story, Partn. § 359; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; Sage v. Chollar, 21 Barb. 596; Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 534; Rankin v. Jones, 2 Jones, Eq. 169.

One partner may, upon a voluntary dissolution of a firm, transfer to his copartner all his interest in the partnership concern, and if he do so bona fide and for a valuable consideration, before any lien has been acquired thereon by partnership creditors through an execution, an attachment, or otherwise, the same will, if such be the intention of the partners, vest in the purchasing partner as his sole or individual property, divested of the right or equity mentioned above, in the selling partner. Not only do the authorities cited above affirm this proposition, but the two decisions of this court are in conflict with the theory of the second instruction asked by the plaintiffs in error,—that a stipulation upon the part of the purchasing partner to pay the firm debts would be fatal to the good faith of the transfer and to the divestiture of the joint ownership or partnership character of the property. There are numerous authorities in which the transfer has been sustained, and the vesting of the property in the purchasing partner as his individual property has been upheld as against the claims of firm creditors, notwithstanding the presence of such a covenant; and such covenant may be the sole consideration of the transfer. West v. Chasten, 12 Fla. 315; Story, Partn. § 359; Croone v. Bivens, 2 Head, 339; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; Ladd v. Griswold, 4 Gilman, 25. The fact, however, is that in the case before us there was no such stipulation, and whether such an obligation upon the purchasing partner is implied by the terms of the agreement is a proposition which has not been argued. If it is implied, the same result follows as if it had been expressed.

It is also settled that where one partner transfers his entire interest in the partnership concerns to his copartner, so as to vest in him the partnership assets as his sole property, a dissolution of the partnership results, and the purchasing partner may, as against any simple creditor of the partnership, assign the property thus vested in him as his sole property, for the payment of his individual indebtedness. He can exercise the same dominion over it that he might over any other individual property. A partnership creditor can, of course, sue him and his former partner, and can levy his execution on the separate property of either, just as he could have sued both before the transfer, and have levied upon the joint property of the firm or the several property of either member; but if, before a lien has been thus or otherwise acquired by the firm creditors, the purchasing partner shall have transferred or applied in good faith the effects which have thus become his sole property to the payment of his individual indebtedness, such transfer or assignment will be sustained in favor of such individual creditor. The selling partner by his sale parts with the equity which he would have retained had he not sold his interest to his copartner, and thus falls the support of any claim to such equity by partnership creditors. The purchasing partner, as sole owner, has, as against partnership creditors, the same right to apply this sole property to his individual debts as he has against individual creditors who have not acquired a lien thereon by attachment or execution, or in other lawful manner. Bullitt v. Chartered Fund, 26 Pa. St. 108; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; Sage v. Chollar, 21 Barb. 596; Coover's Appeal, 29 Pa. St. 9; Allen v. Center Valley Co., 21 Conn. 130; Rankin v. Jones, 2 Jones, Eq. 169; Baker's Appeal, 21 Pa. St. 76; Menagh v. Whitwell, 52 N. Y. 146; Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 534.

At the time Clarence Ashmead sold to William H. Ashmead, the plaintiffs in error had no lien on the partnership assets. This is clearly affirmed by the authorities cited above. Clarence had the right to make, and William the right to receive, the transfer, and, if done in good faith, the partnership creditors cannot complain. Its validity depends upon the bona fides of the transaction. Ex parte Williams, 11 Ves. 3. Where, at the time of the transfer, the firm and each of the partners are insolvent, as in Ex parte Mayou, 4 De Gex, J. & S. 664, or the firm had become insolvent, as in Yale v. Yale, 13 Conn. 185; Roop v. Herron, 15 Neb. 73, 17 N. W. Rep. 353; and Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587, —the transfer, it seems, should be held fraudulent and void as to the partnership creditors. Yet there is authority to the effect that insolvency at such time will not, of itself, avoid the transfer. Howe v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 553; Allen v. Center Valley Co., 21 Conn. 130. These parties may have been entirely solvent at that time, notwithstanding their subsequent insolvency, (Ex parte Fell, 10 Ves. 347; Ex parte Walker, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 509,) and if they were such subsequent condition will not defeat a transfer which was not otherwise fraudulent. That they were insolvent when the second assignment was made does not prove that they were so a month and a half before, when the sale was made by Clarence to William H. Ashmead. Though there is testimony that this sale was rescinded, there is none that John T. Walker was a party to the rescission, or that it was before the assignment to John T. Walker, or that the assignment of the insurance money to John T. Walker was ever abrogated. The questions of the good faith of the sale to William and of his assignment to John T. Walker, and of intent to hinder and defraud creditors, and of whether or not such sale was made in contemplation of insolvency, were fairly submitted to the jury, and they have passed upon them, and there is no testimony in the record that justifies interference by an appellate court with their verdict. To justify such interference it must appear at least clearly that they have erred.

The authorities cited by plaintiffs in error do not conflict with the views we have announced. The language quoted from Burrill on Assignments (section 88, p. 120) refers to an assignment by one partner to a third person, and in the same section it is said that an assignment by one partner of all his interest to the other partner or partners works a dissolution of the firm, and the remaining partner may thereupon execute an assignment of all his property, whether belonging to the previous firm or not, in trust for the payment of his individual creditors. Pomeroy v. Benton, 57 Mo. 531, was a suit involving questions between partners, as was Filbrun v. Ivers, 92 Mo. 388, 4 S. W. Rep. 674. In Marsh v. Bennett, 5 McLean, 117, the assignment by the retiring partner to the remaining one was expressly "for the purpose of paying" off the partnership creditors, thus constituting or continuing him a trustee for such creditors. Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626, holding that where a partner buys the interest of his copartners, and agrees to pay the firm debts, the property of the firm remains bound for such debts just as before the sale, is in conflict with the above decisions of this court and the weight of authority. Yale v. Yale and Wilson v. Robertson are explained above, as is Dimon v. Hazard. Cannon v. Lindsey, (Ala.) 3 South. Rep. 676, holds that the appropriation of partnership assets by one partner to the payment of his own debts without the assent of the other partner is a fraud on the latter; and Arnold v. Wainwright, 6 Minn. 358, (Gil. 241,) in so far as it should be noticed, involves the question of the rights of the purchaser of land, partnership assets, where the legal title stood in the name of a partner.

We will not be understood as expressing an opinion whether or not the assignment to John T. Walker is one for the benefit of his individual creditors, and excluding creditors of the firm; nor as intimating that Clarence Ashmead would be permitted to be paid out of the proceeds of the assignment as against the plaintiffs in error, even if the sale to him had not been rescinded, (Strattan v. Tabb, 8 Ill. App. 225;) nor as committing ourselves as to whether the use made of the "claim" proceeding in this case is proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISE et al. v. HYATT.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. April 27, 1891.)

JUDGMENT AGAINST ONE OF TWO DEFENDANTS—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BREACH OF COVENANT.

1. The fact that, in a suit against two defendants, no summons was served on one, nor judgment rendered against him, does not render the judgment against the other void.

2. A tenant in common of land cannot acquire a title adverse to that of her co-tenants.

3. A guardian of infant wards cannot, by purchasing a tax-deed of lands belonging to them, destroy their estate.

4. Where, in an action by certain grantees of land against their grantor for breach of warranty of title, the declaration alleges the sale of an entire lot, but the deed, filed as an exhibit, shows that only a portion was sold, and the answer admits that such portion was sold, it is error to dismiss the bill, since it entitles the grantees to recover for any breach of warranty as to such portion.

Appeal from chancery court, Yazoo county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Bill by Wise Bros. against Rebecca P. Hyatt for costs of protecting a title warranted by defendant. Dismissed. Complainants appeal. Reversed.

Lot 131, in Yazoo City, was a portion of the estate of one L. L. Hyatt, who died in 1865. Said Hyatt made a will giving this lot to his wife and children, (there being four minor children,) to be shared equally by said wife and four children, the wife being designated by his will as the guardian of said minor children. When the children arrived at the age of naturity, in 1889, they conveyed their interests in this lot to appellee; and after this conveyance appellants, Wise Bros., bought from Mrs. Hyatt, with other property, all of this lot 131, except a portion theretofore sold to another party, receiving a deed with general warranty of title. Before the children sold their interests to their mother, the appellee, two of them, R. W. and C. L. Hyatt, had been in business, and in the course of said business some eight or nine judgments were recovered against them, and after the purchase of the lot by Wise Bros. from Mrs. Hyatt executions on the judgments against R. W. & C. L. Hyatt were issued, and levied on their two-fifths interest in said lot 131, and at the sale under these executions Wise Bros. bought the interests involved to protect their title. And now Wise Bros. file this bill in the chancery court to recover from Mrs. Hyatt the amount paid by them at the sale under execution to protect the title warranted by her. Mrs. Hyatt answered the bill, alleging that it was not necessary that Wise Bros. should have bought at the execution sale, since she had acquired title as against the children by adverse possession of more than 10 years, evidencing her adverse holding by a deed to her from the state, the lot having been sold to the state for the taxes of 1876. Besides that, the judgments were void, because, in the returns of the sheriff on the summons in the cases when judgments were rendered, the officer signed his name without anything to show his official character, and because the names of the plaintiffs in the judgments rendered are not the same as those set forth in the summons.

W. S. Epperson, for appellants. Henry & Richardson, for appellee.

WOODS, C. J. 1. If all the judgments against R. W. & C. L. Hyatt were absolutely void, there was not an outstanding, paramount lien on lot 131, and the purchase of the interest therein of R. W. & C. L. Hyatt by the appellants, at execution sale, conferred no title, and imposed no obligation upon appellee to reimburse appellants for the sum so expended in extinguishing such supposed lien. But an inspection of the record fails to satisfy us that the judgments were void. The various summonses were apparently properly executed by a competent officer. The fact that in one of the suits against R. W. & C. L. Hyatt the summons was not served upon C. L., and that no judgment was entered against him, does not assist appellee's contention. While no interest of C. L. Hyatt was vendible under the execution issued on the particular judgment, still the interest of R. W. Hyatt was properly sold thereunder, and that interest was acquired by appellants. But, generally, we repeat, the judgments were not void, and appellants' contention on this point is not well taken.

2. In 1865, under the will of L. L. Hyatt, appellee and her four children became tenants in common of the lot 131. We must presume, from the evidence before us, that these children were minors, and that appellee was their guardian. Without any change of this trust relationship, and without any change in the estate in common in said lot, appellee acquired a tax-title to an undivided half interest in the lot, and now claims title to the entire lot by possession of 10 years. She cannot be permitted to do this on two grounds, viz.: (1) She was tenant in common at the time of her purchase from the state, and her purchase cannot be asserted adversely to the rights of her co-tenants; and (2) she stood in the relation of guardian to minor wards at the time of her purchase, (as we must presume,) and she cannot be permitted thus to destroy the estate of her infant wards. It is to be borne in mind that any ratification and assent to this purchase of the tax-title by the co-tenants was made about 12 years after the purchase, and after the rendition of the judgments above referred to against R. W. & C. L. Hyatt.

3. While the bill on its face charged a sale of the whole of lot 131 by appellee to appellants, the exhibit filed with the bill, the conveyance itself, disclosed that only the portion of lot 131 was sold and conveyed which the answer of appellee avers was sold and conveyed. The complainants were entitled to any less relief than the particular relief prayed, if the evidence justified. The better practice is to set the cause down for hearing to the end that the legal principles involved may be first settled by the court. When this has been done, and favorably to complainants, but the court, for want of evidence, or because arithmetical or other calculation, necessary to stating an account, are required before the court can say precisely what relief shall be granted, then the court should, whether asked or unasked, refer the matter to a master to take the needed evidence, and state the account, showing the exact condition of the parties. On the case as presented, the complainants were entitled to some relief, and the unconditional dismissal of their bill was error. Reversed and remanded.

LEVY ON STOCK IN TRADE—PARTY IN BUSINESS—EVIDENCE.

O. sold to W. a stock of goods, and put him in possession under a bill of sale. The business was carried on in the same store where O. had formerly conducted it in his own name. W. employed O. as clerk, and as such put him in possession. W. put up his sign after the sale to him, and it remained several days, when O. took it down, but no other sign was put up. Thereafter the goods were levied upon by plaintiffs as the goods of O. Held that, in the absence of anything else to show who was transacting the business, the goods were not subject to levy under Code Miss. § 1300, providing that, if any person shall transact business in his own name, all the property used or acquired in such business shall be liable for his debts.

Appeal from circuit court, Perry county; A. G. MAYERS, Judge.

Claim by W. H. Bufkin for goods levied on by I. L. Lyon & Co. as the goods of O. E. Bufkin. Judgment for Lyon & Co., and claimant appeals. Reversed.

The goods levied on had been the property of O. E. Bufkin, but he had sold them to W. H. Bufkin, and put him in possession under a bill of sale. The business was continued in the same store where O. E. Bufkin had been carrying it on. W. H. Bufkin hired O. E. Bufkin as clerk, and as such put him in possession. After the sale to W. H. Bufkin, he put up a sign with his name on it. This remained up a few days, when O. E. Bufkin took it down, and no other sign was put up in place of it.

J. L. Morris, for appellant. N. C. Hill, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. It does not appear from the statement of facts who transacted business as to the goods, and that is the material inquiry and the determining factor under section 1300[1] of the Code. O. E. Bufkin was in possession as clerk, and, presumably, what he did was in that capacity, and in the name and behalf of his employer, as there is nothing to suggest the contrary. The fact that the clerk had taken down the sign of his employer did not subject the goods of his employer to the demands of the creditors of the clerk. There must have been more than this to effect such a result. If the clerk transacted business in his own name as apparent owner, and used or acquired the goods in such business, the statute makes them his as to his creditors; but it is not in the power of a clerk merely by taking down the sign of his principal to subject the goods of the principal to the seizure of the creditors of the clerk. There is nothing to show that the goods were used or acquired by O. E. Bufkin in business transacted by him in his own name. He had owned the goods, it is true, but had sold them, whereby they became the property of another, and as such were not liable for his debts, unless made so by section 1300; and they are not shown to have been, as already stated, because it is not shown that O. E. Bufkin transacted business in his own name, and used or acquired the goods in such business. In Wolf v. Kahn, 62 Miss. 814, "the seller was in and about the store just as he had been when owner. He who had been up to that hour clerk then became owner. * * * The sign (of the former owner) remained over the door. His revenue and privilege licenses remained posted in the room. Lewis Kahn, the purchaser, who had been the clerk, and Max Kahn, the clerk, who had been the owner, were in and about the store just as they always had been. Every appearance that would lead to the belief on the part of the public that Max was transacting the business as before was presented, and nothing was done or said from which an inference could be drawn that he had retired from business, and his late clerk had embarked in it;" and these facts were held to make the goods liable to the creditors of Max Kahn, who acted as owner after the alleged sale, just as he had done before. The case before us differs from that in several important particulars. This was not a sale by an employer to his clerk, and the purchaser put up a sign over the door with his name on it, which remained up until taken down by the clerk, and that is all that appears. The question is not how significant the facts would be on an issue, whether the sale was in good faith or not, but do they bring the case within the operation of section 1300?—and that is answered in the negative. Judgment reversed, and judgment here for the claimant, which is the judgment which should have been rendered in the circuit court.

[1] Section 1300 provides that, if any person shall transact business in his own name, all the property used or acquired in such business shall be liable for his debts

DEATH OF JOINT LESSOR—ACTION BY SURVIVORS—MISJOINDER OF PLAINTIFFS—WAIVER.

1. Where a lease stipulates for the payment of the rent to the persons who jointly made the lease, the right of action thereon is on the death of one in the survivors.

2. The misjoinder of a party plaintiff is no ground for reversal, where objection was not made as prescribed by Code Miss. § 1511, and the recovery was in the name of the parties only who had a right of action.

Appeal from circuit court, Adams county; RALPH NORTH, Judge.

Action by Beatrice Dunbar and others on a lease for rent against W. L. Jackson, executor of M. E. Jackson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The lease was made by William H., Beatrice, Kate, and Ida Dunbar to M. E.

Johnson. Before the action William H. Dunbar and M. E. Jackson had died. The parties plaintiff were the three survivors and the guardian of certain grandchildren of William H. Dunbar. Recovery, however, was in the name of the three surviving lessors. There was a conflict of testimony as to the amount of rent due.

W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellant. James G. Leach, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. The testimony is conflicting, and we are unwilling to disturb the verdict on the facts. We agree with the counsel for the appellant as to the legal rights of a life-tenant and the owners of the expectancy, but in this case we are not informed by the record as to the precise relation sustained towards the land by W. H. Dunbar, said to have been life-tenant, and his three daughters, who with him were payees of the rent. The father and his three daughters united in making the lease, and the rent was stipulated to be paid to them,—why we do not know,—but when W. H Dunbar died the right of action on the obligation given to the four for the rent was in the survivors, who recovered a part of the sum sued for in this action. The guardian of the minor children of Adams had no right of action, and was improperly made a coplaintiff; but objection was not made to this in the mode prescribed by law, (Code, § 1511,) and no harm was done by the misjoinder, as the recovery was in the name of the three who had a right of action on the obligation for rent. Affirmed.

EFFINGHAM et al. v. HAMILTON.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. April Term, 1891.)

MANDAMUS—TO SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT—INTRODUCTION OF TEXT-BOOKS.

Act Miss. Feb. 22, 1890, (Laws, p. 86,) provides that a committee of teachers shall be appointed in each county to select a uniform series of text-books for the public schools, and that, after such selection, the county superintendent shall contract with the publishers for supplies of such books. A committee made a selection of books, but the county superintendent refused to sign the contract with the publishers. Afterwards another committee was convened, and without authority adopted the books of other publishers, with whom the superintendent entered into a contract. The first-named publishers applied for mandamus to compel the superintendent to contract with them. Held that, notwithstanding their clear legal right, and the unlawful conduct of the superintendent, the writ was properly refused, because the books of the other publishers had already been introduced into the schools, and a change would have seriously affected public interests.

Appeal from circuit court, Holmes county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Mandamus by Effingham, Maynard & Co. to compel G. T. Hamilton, superintendent of schools of Holmes county, to sign a contract with the petitioners for supplies of books for the public schools. Act Miss. Feb. 22, 1890, (Laws, p. 86,) provides that a committee of teachers shall be appointed in each county of the state to select a uniform series of text-books for the schools; and that, after the committee has made a selection, it shall be the duty of the county superintendent to enter into a contract with the publishers for supplies of such books. The committee appointed in Holmes county selected the books of the petitioners, but the superintendent refused to sign the contract required by the statute. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition the petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Hooker & Wilson, for appellants. Noel & Tackett, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. Upon the facts stated in the petition before us, and which upon demurrer must be taken as true, the right of the petitioners to have a contract made with them by the defendant, and to have their books selected by the committee on the 6th of October taught in the public schools of Holmes county, is indisputable. The refusal of the defendant to contract with them, as required by law, was wholly indefensible. He had no discretion about it. His plain duty was to proceed to contract, in pursuance of the action of the committee, and then "to see that only the adopted text-books are used" in the schools; and, if this were a matter affecting only the parties to this action, there could not be a doubt of the right of the petitioners to compel the performance of his official duty by the defendant in the matter wherein they have a pecuniary interest. But it is not in every case of clear legal right, and the absence of a sufficient legal remedy, and where, therefore, mandamus is an appropriate remedy, that it will be issued. It is settled by numerous decisions that a sound judicial discretion is to be used, and, where circumstances make it unwise and inexpedient to allow this writ, to refuse it when sought to enforce merely private right. 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 97, and cases cited; State v. Board, 24 Wis. 683; People v. Board, 27 N. Y. 378. We are therefore called on to consider the situation, and determine the propriety of refusing the writ. The petition shows that for some reason, after the action by the committee to select text-books on October 6th, and its dissolution, the state board of education (assuming, as its order shows, that the text-book committee of Holmes county at their meeting on October 6, 1890, failed to adopt a complete list of books for use, etc.) directed the defendant to reconvene the committee to supply the omission, and, acting upon this, he attempted to reconvene the committee, and appointed others to fill the places of those who refused to meet again; and at a meeting of the committee thus constituted, (consisting of some of the former committee and of some substitutes,) on November 8th, there was a revocation of the former action as to the books published by the petitioners and a selection of others, and in pursuance of this action the books of other publishers have been contracted for and introduced into the schools, and are being taught. We are thus informed that a committee claiming the right to act has revoked former action on which the right of the petitioners is founded, and that its action has been carried out so far as to result in a contract with other publishers whose publications have been introduced into the schools. The patrons of the schools have incurred the expense of procuring the books, as we must assume, and the teachers are required by the superintendent of education to teach these books, and have no discretion about it. In view of these complications, and the evil consequences likely to arise affecting public interest, we deem it proper to deny the remedy sought. It is to be remembered that the object of the law providing for the selection of a uniform series of text-books for the public schools, and of all its provisions, was for the benefit and protection of the people, and not of book publishers; and, while they may acquire rights, and be entitled to their protection and enforcement in proper cases, they must be subordinated to the public interest as to the particular remedy here invoked. Affirmed.

SIMS et al. v. WARREN.

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—TAX-DEED.

An assessment roll showed that 40 acres of a certain quarter section was assessed at $2.50 per acre, and 120 acres at $1 per acre, but failed to identify either tract. Complainant claimed the north 80 acres under a tax-deed conveying to him 80 acres of the quarter section, without further description. Held, that under Laws Miss. 1878, p. 28, providing that no failure to designate the precise locality of any subdivision of land within a section should vitiate the assessment or the sale thereof for the non-payment of taxes, but that it might be shown by parol testimony to what particular subdivision such assessment or sale was intended to apply, the assessment, otherwise void for uncertainty, was not aided by testimony of the assessor that he intended to sell the 80 acres on which taxes had not been paid by C. and M., and that one of them had paid taxes on 40 acres assessed at $2.50 per acre, and the other on 40 acres assessed at $1 per acre, and by the testimony of C. and M., to each of whom a receipt had been given for taxes on 40 acres in the quarter section, that they owned the south 80 acres of the quarter section, and thought they were paying taxes on the land owned by them.

Appeal from chancery court, Itawamba county; BAXTER MCFARLAND, Chancellor.

Suit by N. B. Warren against R. P. W Sims and others to confirm title to certain land claimed by complainant under a tax-sale. Judgment for complainant, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Complainant claimed under a tax-deed conveying to him "80 acres of the S. E. ¼ sec. 10, T. 8, R. 8, in Itawamba county." The bill claimed under this deed the north half of the quarter section. The assessment roll merely showed that 40 acres of the quarter section were assessed at $2.50 per acre, and 12 acres at $1 per acre, and left it indefinite as to which 40 acres were intended to be assessed at $2.50 per acre, or what 120 acres were intended to be assessed at $1 per acre. The deputy tax collector testified from memoranda made on the assessment roll at the time the taxes were being collected that one Cummings had paid the taxes on the 40 acres assessed at $2.50 per acre, and the administrator of one Morris had paid the taxes on 40 of the 120 acres assessed at $1 per acre. It was shown by these persons that the land owned by and on which they supposed they were paying taxes was the south 80 acres of the quarter section. The receipt issued to each of them was for the taxes on 40 acres of the quarter section, without any further identification as to the particular 40 acres. For former report, see 7 South. Rep. 226, 67 Miss. 278.

Clifton & Eckford, for appellants. Newnan Cayce, for appellee.

COOPER, J. We find nothing in this cause as presented by the present record distinguishing it from the case presented on the former appeal. The attention of counsel and court was then directed to the sufficiency of the assessment of the land to uphold its sale for taxes, and we held it to be insufficient. Sims v. Warren, 67 Miss. 278, 7 South. Rep. 226. It is now attempted to support the assessment and supply its defects by evidence of what the tax collector did and intended to do in making the sale of the land for the taxes, and by evidence that payments made by Cummings and the administrator of the estate of William Morris were intended by them as payment of the taxes on other lands in the same subdivision, and thus, by the process of exclusion, to show that the land sold was delinquent. The additional testimony, in effect, only shows that the collector intended to sell 80 acres of a tract of 160 acres, which 80 acres was whatever was not intended to be paid on by Cummings and Morris' administrator. The receipts given by the collector to these parties do not show upon what lands taxes were paid, and it is only be applying the receipts to the land owned by them that they are made to cover these, rather than any other land of like quantity in the subdivision. The decree of the court below necessarily rests upon the predicate that there may be a valid sale for taxes without a valid assessment of the land sold, or that an assessment insufficient in the description of the property may be cured by applying it to any property not paid on before the sale for taxes. The constitution requires an assessment of property for taxation, and this the legislature may not dispense with. The fundamental purpose is to secure equality and uniformity of the burden of taxation according to the value of the property taxed. To reach valuation there must be identification of the thing to be valued. If the whole of the subdivision in which the land in controversy is located had been valued at one price, a different question would be presented. But 40 acres of the 160 were assessed at $2.50 per acre, and the remainder at $1 per acre. On the face of the roll it is impossible to say to which part of the subdivision the valuation of $2.50 is to be applied, or to what that of $1 relates. The assessment required by the constitution must be provided in any scheme declared by the legislature for taxation. This accomplished, the constitutional command is obeyed, and it is within legislative discretion to provide nothing further save the machinery by which taxes shall be levied and collected upon the assessment thus made. But an assessment within and according to the constitution must be made before there can arise the power of sale provided by any legislative scheme or plan. The revenue act, under which the sale of the lands here in controversy was made, (Laws 1878, p. 23,) provided "that no failure to designate the precise locality of any subdivision of land within a section * * * shall be held to vitiate the assessment, or the sale thereof for the non-payment of taxes so assessed, if the section, township, and range within which the land is situated be properly entered on the rolls; and it may be shown by parol testimony on any proceedings to vacate such assessment, or in any controversy respecting the conveyance of any such lands when sold for the non-payment of taxes, or any subsequent conveyance, to what particular subdivision such assessment or sale was intended to apply." Until it be shown that there was a valid assessment of property, it is useless to inquire whether a sale otherwise regular has been made, for the invalidity of an assessment nullifies all that follows. The question always returns, has there been a valid assessment of the property sold? Looking to the evidence in this cause, we find nothing in aid of the assessment except the intention of the tax collector in making the sale, and this is an irrelevant and inconclusive matter, throwing no light upon the material inquiry as to what lands were assessed. Nor do we think it would have been competent to show by parol the intention of the assessor, undisclosed by what he did in fact do and record upon the memorial provided by law as the exponent of his action. There cannot be an assessment of lands, within the constitutional requirement, which rests only in the memory and purpose of the officer. There must be official action evidenced by the roll he is required to make. "The roll must furnish the clue which, when followed by the aid of parol testimony, conducts certainly to the land intended. It is admissible only to apply the description on the roll, which must give the start and suggest the course, which being followed will point out the land intended to be assessed." CAMPBELL, J., in Dodds v. Marx, 63 Miss. 443. In that case the court was construing a provision of the Code which provided for the admission of parol evidence if there is "enough in the description on the roll to be applied to a particular tract of land by the aid of such testimony," while the act controlling the question now under investigation provides for the introduction of such evidence where the section, township, and range are given on the roll. The act now under consideration is narrower than the Code provision, for under it parol evidence is only admissible where the section, township, and range are given, while under the Code provision it is admissible whether the section, township, and range are or are not on the roll. Under neither is it competent to do more than to apply the description to a particular tract; otherwise it would be to create an assessment by parol, which cannot be done. Reversed and remanded.

ELMSLEY v. GEORGIA PAC. RY. CO.

KILLING STOCK ON RAILROAD TRACK.

A railroad engineer cannot take chances of an animal getting off of the track, where he has an opportunity of easily avoiding all possibility of an injury.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by Bridget Elmsley against the Georgia Pacific Railway Company for the value of an animal killed by defendant's train. From a judgment for defendant plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The instruction for the defendant, to which objection was made, was that "a railroad has a right to a clear track, and that it is not liable for stock killed by its trains on its track unless they have failed to use ordinary care and prudence to avoid striking such stock, and it is not the duty of the engineer to stop his train when he sees stock upon the right of way. Unless there is a reasonable probability of the train striking such stock, it is his duty to make schedule time, using only reasonable diligence in avoiding striking animals upon the track; and in this case, if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the train was not going at full speed when the mule was seen upon the track, and that the engineer blew his stock-alarm whistle," etc.

D. C. Wasson, for appellant. Yerger & Percy, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The instruction asked and secured by the defendant is erroneous because it relieves the defendant from liability for the injury inflicted upon the property of the plaintiff, (a mule,) if at the time the engineer attempted to run by the animal there was a reasonable probability that it would not be struck by the train. The servants of the company may not speculate upon the probable consequences of an act apparently dangerous, and which was voluntarily entered upon with full opportunity of easily avoiding all possibility of injury. It cannot be said that the chances were great that the mule would quietly stand upon the narrow strip of land while the train ran by, nor that it would change its position and collide with the train. The engineer, with full knowledge of the danger, elected to take the chance of the animal remaining quiet; but it was at the risk of his employer, and not at that of the owner of the animal, that the experiment was tried. The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

KING v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.[1]

RAILROAD COMPANIES—LIABILITY FOR TORTS OF SERVANT.

Under Act Miss. Feb. 22, 1890, which provides that station agents of railroad companies shall preserve order in the waiting-rooms, and may arrest and deliver to some officer all persons guilty of disorderly conduct, the acts of such agents are imputable to the company.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action for false arrest by F. B. King against the Illinois Central Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Plaintiff was traveling, and arrived in Jackson at 2 A. M., over the Illinois Central Railroad, intending to go to Vicksburg that morning. While in the waiting-room, he had need to visit the closet, and asked of the porter where to find it. The porter directed him to the gentlemen's closet on the north end of the depot, but King failed to find it, and, returning to the waiting-room, entered the ladies' closet. He was ordered out first by the porter, and then by Mr. Montgomery, the depot-master, but refused to come until he got ready. When he did emerge from the closet Mr. Montgomery arrested him, and sent him to jail, where he remained until 4 P. M. next day, when he was discharged. Calhoon & Green, for appellant. J. B. Harris, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. We reject the view that depot or station agents of railroad companies are by "An act to amend the railroad supervision laws of this state," approved February 22, 1890, made officers of the state, and its representatives in the exercise of the power conferred, so as to relieve their principals from responsibility for their acts. The act cited creates the power and the duty prescribed to be exercised and performed by depot or station agents as such and for their principals. Under the act they are neither more nor less than depot or station agents, with the additional power and duty prescribed by it to be exercised and performed for and in behalf of their employers. The language of the act excludes the theory that they are made officers, for it provides that they shall "arrest and deliver to the custody of the most convenient sheriff or constable, or other proper officer," etc., thus showing that the power devolved on them is to be exercised at their place of business and in their capacity as its supervisor. The act is a part of the scheme of railroad supervision by the state, and its effect in the matter now being considered is to make it the duty of railroad companies through their depot or station agents to preserve order in the waiting-rooms in their respective stations. It is made a company or corporate duty to be performed by the designated representative of the company, and for the performance or non-performance of which the company is responsible. Neither the company nor the agent can avoid or shift the responsibility. It is fixed by law, and is not dependent on the action of the company or the view of its officers or agents. Every depot or station agent, whatever may be his instructions or his understanding, is made a conservator of the peace, "with authority to preserve order in the waiting-rooms," and the duty to arrest and deliver to some officer "all persons who are guilty of disorderly conduct." The manifest purpose of the legislature was to secure the preservation of order in the waiting-rooms through the designated officer or agent of the railroad company, and what he does or fails to do in reference to this duty is imputable to the railroad company as its act or omission. What is "disorderly conduct," within the meaning of the act, so as to authorize arrest, is to be determined from a consideration of the subject-matter dealt with by the legislature, and the evil intended to be guarded against. We will not attempt to define it. Each case must be determined by its own facts. "Circumstances alter cases." The law should be so interpreted and administered as, on the one hand, not to unduly fetter a depot or station agent in the discharge of the duty to preserve order in the waiting-rooms under his care; and, on the other hand, to protect the citizen against an unwarrantable interference with his liberty. Generally it will not be difficult to distinguish and characterize the conduct so disorderly as to call for arrest. It does not appear from the record that there was a determination by the circuit court of the question whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of disorderly conduct warranting his arrest, for the case was disposed of by the view that the railroad company was not re-

[1] A person arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct on the cars of an elevated railway company, and convicted thereof, cannot maintain an action for malicious prosecution against the company. Nor can he maintain an action against the company for false imprisonment, the arrest having been made by a police officer, and the imprisonment directed by the public authorities. Oppenheimer v. Railway Co., (Sup.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 411.

Defendant's ticket agent, acting under a notice given him by police officials to look out for a five-dollar counterfeit, and describing three men passing the same, supposing a bill presented at his window by plaintiff in payment for tickets to be one of the counterfeits, and supposing plaintiff and his companion to be the persons described, after giving plaintiff his tickets and change, sent for a police officer, and directed their arrest, while they were seated on the station platform waiting to take the next train. The officer stated that he knew the two men as reputable men, and that there must have been a mistake, but the agent insisted upon their arrest for passing counterfeit money, and they were arrested, but were, after an hour, discharged; the bill passed being pronounced genuine. Held, that the agent was acting without the line of his duty in taking the bill which he supposed to be counterfeit, and causing the arrest; and, it not appearing that plaintiff was at the time of his arrest in the agent's custody, or under his protection, with respect to the execution of the contract of transportation, defendant could not be made liable for his conduct. EARL and FINCH, JJ., dissenting. 14 N. Y. Supp. 456, reversed. Mulligan v. New York & R. B. Ry. Co., (N. Y. App.) 29 N. E. Rep. 952.

sponsible in any event for the arrest. Therefore the question as to the justifiableness of the arrest is involved in our consideration of the case only by the fact that, if it was clearly justifiable, the party would have no ground for complaint. It seems probable that the learned circuit judge did not consider the arrest as justifiable, and in this view we concur, but, disagreeing with him as to the other question, the judgment cannot stand. Reversed and remanded.

JULIENNE v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF JACKSON.

KILLING DOG RUNNING AT LARGE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. A dog may lawfully be killed by a police officer when running at large, contrary to an ordinance ordering all dogs confined, though it had just escaped, and was being pursued by plaintiff to return it to confinement.

2. Summary proceedings of the most stringent character, for the destruction of dogs kept contrary to municipal regulations, are entirely within legislative power.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action by J. C. Julienne against the mayor and aldermen of the city of Jackson for the value of a dog killed by a police officer. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Johnston, for appellant. J. B. Harris, for appellees.

COOPER, J. Though the plaintiff's dog was not permitted to be at large knowingly, but escaped from his close and was soon thereafter followed by the plaintiff's wife for the purpose of returning him to confinement, he was nevertheless "running at large," within the meaning of the ordinance of the city, and was lawfully killed by the city marshal. It may be conceded that the plaintiff had a property right in the animal, and might have recovered his value as against one unlawfully killing him. But, of all property, dogs are more peculiarly the subject of police regulations than any other class. They are very generally kept and considered of value because of their tendency to revert to their savage state, and to attack as an enemy any stranger who may approach them; and it is because of the danger to the public arising from these instincts that they are so often and so generally subjected to police regulations, especially in cities and towns. It is held with great unanimity by the courts that regulations of the most stringent character, and the most summary proceedings for the destruction of these animals kept contrary to such regulations, are entirely within legislative power, and free from constitutional objection, though the property of the owner is destroyed without notice or hearing, in the execution of the law. In Massachusetts it has been held that a dog, not licensed and collared according to the provisions of law, may be shot within the owner's close by the officers. Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136. So in New Hampshire, under a statute providing that "no person shall be liable by law for killing any dog which shall be found not having around his neck a collar of brass, tin, or leather, with the name of the owner or owners engraved thereon," it was held that a private person might lawfully kill a dog having on a collar on which was engraved the initials of the owner's name, even though he knew who was the owner, the court saying: "Actual notice of the ownership of the dog will not supersede the necessity of a compliance with the statute. Its provisions are direct and positive, and the consequences of a neglect of the statutory requirements are explicitly enacted." Replying also to the argument that the act conflicted with the constitution, in that it was a taking of private property for public uses, or deprived the owners of their property in dogs, the court said the act had no such effect, "but merely to regulate the use and keeping of such property in a manner that seemed to the legislature reasonable and expedient. It is a mere police regulation, such, as we think, the legislature might constitutionally establish." Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 373; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 741. The judgment is affirmed.

ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. v. PETERSON.

CARRIERS — LIVE-STOCK SHIPMENTS — RIGHT TO STOP AND UNLOAD — ENFORCEMENT OF UNITED STATES LAWS.

1. Where a railroad company, under a special contract, furnishes an entire car, in which stock may be fed and watered, to a shipper, who loads it with "emigrant movables" and several horses, the contract requiring that he load the car and accompany it, and feed, water, and care for the stock at his own risk and expense, and exempting the company from liability for delays, and there is no agreement as to any layout along the route, the shipper does not, in the absence of a custom to that effect, acquire by such contract the right to have the car stopped and laid out so that he may rest his horses, and thus save them from suffering and death, but can only secure such delay by abandoning the contract, or by contracting anew for the use of the car for a longer time.

2. Rev. St. U. S. § 4386, providing that animals transported on railroads shall be unloaded and fed at certain intervals, and that a penalty shall be recoverable in the federal courts for every violation of the act, is a statute with the enforcement of which the state courts are in no way concerned.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action by Peterson against the Illinois Central Railroad Company to recover damages for the death of two horses and injury to several others while being transported over defendant's railroad. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellant. E. E. Baldwin, for appellee.

WOODS, C. J. Under the special contract in evidence, and under which the appellee seeks a recovery, the defendant corporation let to appellee an entire car, to be used by him in the transportation of what is denominated "emigrant movables," consisting, in this instance, of six horses and a lot of miscellaneous property,—corn, feed-stuff, furniture, etc. The car was under the charge and in the care of appellee, was loaded by him at his own discretion, and was held in the defendant's yards at Chicago, to meet appellee's wishes, for about three days, in order to permit him to complete his load; and this while the horses were all on the car, they having been loaded at a point 30 miles north of Chicago. The contract stipulated, for the railroad company, against liability on its part, except for injuries resulting from collisions or derailment in transportation. That the railroad limited its liability for willful injuries or gross negligence is not contended by its counsel. By this special contract the appellee agreed to feed, water, and take care of his stock, and to load and unload the animals, and to exempt the railroad company from loss occurring by jumping from the cars, delay of trains, or any damage the stock might sustain, except such as should result from collisions or derailment of cars in course of transportation. Suitable provision was made for feeding and watering the stock on the car, and they were properly fed and watered by appellee, who accompanied the stock, without further charge than the price paid for the use of the car. After the stock had been loaded and kept confined in the car for nearly three days, the appellee completed his additional loading, and the car was taken in charge by appellant, to be transported on its route to Jackson, Miss. The next day after leaving Chicago appellee discovered that one of the young stallions was down in the car. He got it up, but before reaching Centralia, and about a day after the journey had been begun, the same young animal was found down again, and, as was thought by appellee, to be down finally, as he expresses it. On reaching Centralia appellee made application to the railroad company's agent to be laid out for 24 hours, to the end that he might rearrange his load, (then plainly seen to have been improperly loaded,) and to rest his stock, which application was not accepted and complied with, though the car of appellee was actually taken out of the train in which it was being carried, and was permitted to lie at Centralia for a few hours,—a time too short, however, as appellee thought, to afford him opportunity to unload, rest his stock, and rearrange the load.

The question, then, which meets us on the threshold of the case, and whose determination by us may prove conclusive of the entire controversy, is, had the appellee the right to demand that he be laid out at Centralia? If he had this right, how was it acquired? Was it an implied obligation resting upon the railroad? If it finds rest under the contract, it will be found by implication. There is no express obligation of this character appearing on the face of the instrument. If it was an implied obligation on the railroad, how is the implication raised? If it was the custom of the railroad company to lay out cars in which a few horses were carried, then there was an implied obligation assumed to comply with such custom on the part of the railroad. But the undisputed evidence perfectly shows that, while it was the custom to lay out car-load lots of animals every 24 or 28 hours, in order that they might be fed, watered, and cared for, no such custom prevailed or existed in cases where a few animals only were loaded in a car, and where provision was made thereon for watering and feeding the animals. The custom was unknown in cases of the latter character. Nor does the absence of the custom seem unnatural; there being no necessity, apparently, in ordinary cases, for any unloading. The cases referred to by appellee's counsel in Railroad Co. v. Adams, 42 Ill. 474, and Railway Co. v. Thompson, 71 Ill. 434, raised an implied obligation on the carrier to throw water on hogs crowded in a car, because of the known custom of railroads to so apply water to that particular animal. The other case relied upon by counsel for appellee is that of Kinnick v. Railroad Co., (Iowa,) 29 N. W. Rep. 772. In that case the railroad company received a car-load of hogs from plaintiff, and, after loading and starting them on their journey, there was such delay, by reason of the wrecking of another train, that a number of the hogs died; and the court held, as it was a natural propensity of hogs to struggle to get near to or away from the doors of a car, when it is left standing, and to "pile up" on each other in such struggles, and thereby produce injury or death, and as it appeared that the injuries complained of were attributable to the failure of the railroad company to give the animals any attention during the 12 hours during which the train was standing still because of the obstructing wreck, that the company was liable because of its negligence, in this extraordinary danger to the animals, in failing to do what the delay and consequent peril to the animals required should be done. We fail to see any support in any of these cases for the proposition that there was an implied obligation in the case at bar upon the railroad company to lay out the car, which appellee had hired, for 24 hours, at Centralia. The contrary is involved in these decisions, as we understand them.

In the absence of any custom imposing obligation to lay out on the appellee, what is there in the conduct of the parties to the contract before us which will authorize us to say that any purpose to lay out the car, after it had been started on its way to its destination, was in the minds of the company and the appellee? What is the foundation for implying that the minds of the parties ever dwelt upon or met in any unexpressed agreement that appellee should have such right? We have been unable to find any circumstance, even, which tends to support that proposition. On the other hand, there is much in the evidence of the appellee which strongly shows that he regarded the use of the car as confined to one continuous trip He placed three horses in each end of the car, and then partitioned both ends in front of the horses, their heads being towards the middle doors of the car. He likewise made stalls for the horses, respectively, within the partitioned spaces, and then he proceeded to fill up the vacant space in the middle of the car with a large quantity of corn and other feed-stuff, household goods, etc. The whole arrangement of the car-load, as made by the appellee, precluded the unloading of the car, unless with much labor and considerable time. It is perfectly apparent that neither when the contract was executed nor when the car was loaded was there any thought of having a layout accorded him while on the way, in the mind of appellee himself, even. We fail to find any ground for maintaining that there was any implied obligation, under the contract, to give appellee the desired layout.

It is said by counsel for appellee that by section 4386, Rev. St. U S.,[1] a definite rule for the transportation of animals is created, and penalties prescribed for disregard of the rule. With this rule and its enforcement the courts of the state are no way concerned. But the act itself, in a subsequent section, provides for the recovery of the penalty in a civil action in the proper federal court. It is waste of words to say more. Is there an obligation, founded in common humanity, which required the railroad company to lay out appellee's car, in order that dumb brutes may have relief from suffering and rescue from death? It is not necessary for us to answer. The evidence satisfies us that the appellee did not himself think the stock in the condition indicated in the foregoing question when he made his request at Centralia to be laid out. Surely it cannot be believed that, if he then knew, or had reason to know, that very valuable stallions (one of which he had paid $800 for) and valuable mares were in peril of impending death or serious injury, self-interest, as well as humanity, would not have constrained him to make a new contract for longer use of his car, or, if necessary, to abandon altogether his then contract with the railroad company, and take the chances of the trifling loss of $60, which he had bound himself to pay the railroad, by then and there unloading his car and leaving the train. It is manifest that by keeping his stock on the car for three days before starting them southward from Chicago, and by so loading the car as to render it impossible to take the stock out without great trouble and delay, the appellee had placed himself in the unfortunate situation which confronted him at Centralia, and from which he could only extricate himself by making a new contract for the use of the car for a longer time than originally thought needful, or by abandoning his contract altogether, and removing his stock from the train. As these views, for the present, appear to cut up by the roots appellee's contention, we find it unnecessary to express any opinion on any other point involved. Reversed and remanded.

[1] This statute provides that animals transported on railroads shall be unloaded and fed at certain intervals, and that a penalty shall be recoverable in the federal courts for every violation of the act.

BERRY v. DOBSON et al.

HOMESTEAD—ACQUISITION AND ENFORCEMENT—OCCUPANCY—OWNERSHIP.

1. Code Miss. 1880, § 1248, allowing a homestead exemption in lands "owned and occupied" as a residence, requires that the right be founded, not merely on occupation, but on the ownership of some assignable interest; and a widow derives no right from her deceased husband to lands which were conveyed by him before his marriage, and which he was afterwards allowed to occupy merely as tenant at will.

2. A deed to the property which the widow procures after her husband's death from his grantee will not support a claim for homestead, where it appears that the creditors of the husband have already levied upon the land, and secured an adjudication in their favor, and against the said grantee, for the sale thereof.

Appeal from chancery court, Rankin county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

This was a bill by Eliza A. Berry against Sol Dobson and others asking that a homestead be decreed to the complainant as against the creditors of her deceased husband. It appeared that in August, 1885, defendants recovered a judgment against W. H. Berry and his wife, who were then occupying the land in controversy as a homestead. In November, 1887, Berry and his wife conveyed the premises to D. D. & L. W. Berry. Afterwards the wife died without issue, and Berry married the complainant. The grantees permitted him to continue his occupation of the premises as if no conveyance had been made, and after his death his widow occupied them. The deed to D. D. & L. W. Berry was not recorded, and the defendants, considering that W. H. Berry at the death of his first wife had lost his homestead right as against their judgment, caused execution to issue on the land. D. D. & L. W. Berry then had the deed recorded, and filed a bill to enjoin the sale. Complainant failed to show that defendants had notice of the unrecorded deed, and a decree was entered that the land be sold to satisfy the judgment. W. H. Berry and his wife were not parties to the suit. The widow afterwards procured a deed for the premises from D. D. & L. W. Berry, and filed the bill in the present suit, asking that the sale be enjoined, and that, by virtue of the said deed and her occupancy of the land, her right to a homestead exemption be recognized. The court sustained a demurrer to the bill, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Cole and Calhoon & Green, for appellant. J. R. Enochs and A. J. McLaurin, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, J. The appellant had no right as to the land derivative from her deceased husband, for he had no interest in the land which was transmissible. He was not owner of any estate in it. He was but tenant at will, and this tenancy terminated at his death. Homestead right is founded on ownership of some assignable interest in the land. It must be "owned and occupied." It may be the lowest kind of estate, but it must be an interest in the land. Code, § 1248; 9 Amer.

& Eng. Enc. Law, tit. "Homestead." The husband had no interest whatever in this land, but had conveyed it and was a mere occupant. It would be a strange doctrine that an owner of land could put a family on each quarter section of his land, and thereby place it beyond the reach of creditors,—his own and the occupant's,—which would result, if the occupant could claim it as exempt. The appellant had no right, by virtue of the conveyance of the land to her, for her grantors had nothing to convey. They had been adjudged against by the decree of the chancery court, and the appellant, as their grantee, was in privity with them, and bound by the decree. Affirmed.

COHEA et al. v. JEMISON.

WILLS—NATURE OF ESTATE DEVISED.

1. A will directing the executors to sell testator's land, and to divide the proceeds equally among his children, does not by implication vest the executors with title to the land; and consequently the title and right to possession remain in the heirs until the sale, and they are the proper parties to maintain ejectment for the land.

2. The fact that a will confers on the executors a discretion to carry on testator's farm for a year does not vest them with an estate in the land for a longer period than the possession is necessary for that purpose.

Appeal from circuit court, Hinds county; C. M. WILLIAMSON, Special Judge.

Ejectment by Clara T. Cohea and others against Elizabeth Jemison for an undivided 14-15 of a lot of land. The court directed a verdict in defendant's favor on the ground that plaintiffs had not the legal title to the land. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Perry Cohea, plaintiffs' ancestor, died in 1848, leaving a will, the first item of which contained the language: "I do accordingly devise, will, and dispose of all my worldly estate." By clause 13 of his will, he directed his executors to complete a contract for the sale of a specified tract of land, which he had entered into in his lifetime, by conveying the land embraced therein to the vendee on the payment of the price. Clauses 14 and 17, so far as material, are as follows: "(14) It is my will that all my remaining lands in Hinds county shall be sold by my executors upon such terms and upon such credit as in their discretion shall deem most advisable for the interests of all concerned in my estate. It is my will, and my said executors are directed, to lay off said remaining lands into lots of ten, twenty, and thirty acres each, and sell the same upon the most advantageous terms, securing the payment thereon in a safe and satisfactory manner." "(17) After all of my just debts and legacies are paid, and charges on my estate provided for, it is my will and desire that all moneys remaining in the hands of my executors, from whatever source arising, shall be equally divided among my said children, Eliza Jane Stone, George J. Cohea, David A. Cohea, Edward W. Cohea, and the heirs of the body of my daughter Sophia Jelks, (now deceased;) the said heirs of her body collectively taken to receive, however, only such portion in said division as their mother, were she living and named with my last aforesaid children, would have been entitled to under said division, said portion to be equally divided among said heirs of her body." J. Stone, David A Cohea, and Samuel Mathews were appointed executors, with power to carry the will into effect. They sold nearly all of the land as directed by the will, excepting, among others, lot 6, in the city of Jackson, comprising 26 acres. Two executors, Stone and Cohea, subsequently died, and Mathews resigned. In 1872, W. B. Jelks, a son of testator's daughter Sophia Jelks, was appointed administrator de bonis non. He was entitled, as one of the devisees mentioned in testator's will, to an undivided 1-15 of the lands remaining unsold. He was in possession of lot 6, and finally disposed of it in small parts, to different persons. In 1889, plaintiffs, as heirs and devisees of Perry Cohea, brought this action of ejectment for an undivided 14-15 of a portion of lot 6, conveyed to defendant, Elizabeth Jemison, by Jelks; and the identity of plaintiffs, as heirs of Perry Cohea, was established.

E. E. Baldwin, for appellants. Calhoon & Green and M. M. McLeod, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The general rule is that a devise of lands to executors to sell passes the interest in it; but that a devise that lands shall be sold by executors confers but a naked power. 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 275. But in the absence of language conferring an estate upon the executors an estate by implication will arise where, from the nature of the trust conferred, it is necessary that an estate should exist in the trustee for its execution; and, where an estate is expressly given, it will be limited in duration to the trust to be performed, if a precise period for its termination can be shown. 3 Jarm. Wills, c. 34. Clearly, Cohea did not expressly devise the lands in controversy to his executors, and, if they took any estate in them, it arose by implication from the power and duty of selling the lands and distributing the proceeds. The better view, and that supported by the weight of authority, is that a mere power to sell land and distribute the proceeds does not require any estate in the executor, and therefore none exists by implication, and consequently that until the sale the title and right of possession remain in the heir at law. Greenough v. Welles, 10 Cush. 571. Fay v. Fay, 1 Cush. 93; Herbert v. Smith, 1 N. J. Eq. 141; Ferebee v. Procter, 2 Dev. & B. 439; Hall v. Burr, 9 Johns. 104; Haskell v. House, 1 Const. (S. C.) 106; Bergen v. Bennett, 1 Caines Cas. 1; Bogert v. Schauber, 7 Cow. 187; Romaine v. Hendrickson, 24 N. J. Eq. 231; 1 Williams, Ex'rs, 725; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 725. The discretion given to the executors to carry on the farm of the testator for one year could in no event confer upon them an estate by implication for a longer time than the possession was necessary for the purpose indicated. It follows that the legal title to the land sued for remains in the heirs at law of the testator, and the court erred in excluding the plaintiffs' evidence. Reversed and remanded.

STORY v. STATE.

HOMICIDE — CONTINUANCE — ABSENT WITNESSES — SPECIAL VENIRES — EXAMINATION OF JURORS ON VOIR DIRE — EVIDENCE OF MOTIVE — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. At the time a motion was made in a murder case for a continuance to procure witnesses, it was not known whether they would be present or not at the time set for trial, and as a matter of fact every witness desired appeared in court at the time set, save one, on whom process had not been served, and who was shown to have permanently removed to another state. Held, that there was no error in refusing to permit the application.

2. After the special venire of 30 drawn from the jury-box had, on the motion of defendant, been quashed, it was announced to the court that the names in the box were exhausted, and the court ordered the sheriff to summon a special venire of 30 in defendant's case, and overruled defendant's motion that the court direct the clerk to make up a jury-box by depositing therein the names appearing on the jury-list for the year. Held, that there was no error, as, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be assumed that the officers had discharged the duties imposed on them by law, and that the jury-box had been legally exhausted.

3. There is nothing prejudicial to a defendant in the court's examining jurors on their voir dire as to their competency, allowing counsel to suggest questions, but not permitting them directly to interrogate on the subject, turning them over, however, to counsel, after being satisfied as to their competency, to question with a view to peremptory challenge.

4. In a murder case, where the killing was admitted, and only the circumstances were in dispute, and the evidence showed that defendant was a comparative stranger to deceased and his affairs, without hatred or ill will towards him, the state may, for the purpose of showing motive, prove that a third person entertained hatred for deceased, and desired to get rid of him, and that he sent defendant to do the killing.

5. The state introduced evidence that defendant committed the homicide at the instigation of J., and that after the killing J.'s son promised defendant to send a telegram to his father to procure him on defendant's bond. The son, on his cross-examination by the state, was asked if he had sent the telegram, and, without any objection by defendant, answered that he had. After objection by defendant to the further question as to contents of the telegram, witness, without waiting for any direction of the court, gave the contents of the telegram: "E. [defendant] killed B., [deceased;] justifiable; will be home on tomorrow's A. M. train." Held that, no objection having been made to the evidence of the fact of the sending of the telegram, the error, if any, in admitting its contents was harmless.

Appeal from circuit court, Holmes county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Eugene Story was convicted of murder of Barney Kleinfelder. A new trial was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

After defendant had stated that he desired a special venire, the court ordered that there be drawn from the jury-box the names of 30 persons to constitute a special venire. On motion of defendant, the special venire so drawn was quashed. Thereafter it was announced to the court that the names in the box were exhausted. The court then directed the sheriff to summon a venire of 30 men, overruling defendant's motion that the court direct the clerk to make up a jury-box by depositing therein the names appearing on the jury-list for the year.

Haden & Dodd and J. E. Gwin, for appellant. T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., and Hooker & Wilson, for the State.

COOPER, J. We find no error in the rulings of the court below in refusing to permit the appellant to make an application for a continuance when the venire was ordered, or in directing the writ of venire facias to the sheriff, when, upon the motion of appellant, the venire drawn from the jury-box was quashed, or in overruling the application for a continuance made by appellant on the day fixed for his trial, or in the examination of the jurors upon their voir dire, and impaneling the jury by which he was tried and convicted. When the defendant first asked the court to permit him to prepare his application for a continuance, it was properly refused, because it could not then be known whether his witnesses would or would not be present at the time fixed or about to be fixed for trial, and if they should be in attendance the ground of the application would fail, as it did fail; for on the day of trial every witness desired by the defendant appeared in court, save one, on whom process had not been served, and who was shown to have permanently removed to another state.

The venire drawn from the jury-box was, upon the motion of the defendant, quashed, and it then appeared that the jury-box had been exhausted. The defendant then moved the court to direct the clerk to make up a jury-box by depositing therein the names appearing on the jury-list for the year. The court properly overruled this motion, for, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, (and none was offered by the defendant,) it must be assumed that the officers discharged the duties imposed on them by law, and that the jury-box had been legally exhausted. In this condition of affairs nothing remained for the court except to secure the venire in the method adopted.

We find nothing in the rule announced by the presiding judge for the examination of jurors prejudicial to the defendant That rule was that the judge would undertake the examination of jurors upon their voir dire touching their competency, permitting and inviting counsel to suggest any questions they desired to be asked, but not permitting them to directly interrogate the jurors upon the subject of their competency, and, after each juror had been found competent by the judge, he was then to be examined by counsel directly, with a view to peremptory challenge, but for no other purpose. The rule thus announced by the presiding judge is to be commended, rather than reprehended, for its operation is to prevent an unnecessary consumption of the time of the court, assures full and impartial examination of jurors, and violates no right of one charged with crime. Under its operation, an impartial jury, against no member of which is objection taken, was secured to the accused, without his having exhausted the peremptory challenges allowed him by law.

On the trial of the cause it appeared that Barney Kleinfelder, the deceased, by an arrangement between himself and Dr. Muntford Jones, had erected a saw-mill on the plantation of the latter, which was operated by Kleinfelder, who received three-fourths of the lumber cut from the timber on Jones' place, Jones receiving the remaining fourth, and that for some months before the homicide there had been a disagreement between Jones and Kleinfelder in reference to their business. Austin Williams, the principal witness for the state, and the only eye-witness to the killing, gives the following history of what preceded, and the circumstances attending, the killing: On or about the 1st of November, 1889, the defendant, Story, and Muntford Jones, Jr., a son of the owner of the plantation, appeared on the place, each armed with a new Winchester rifle and a pistol. They took their meals at the house of this witness, (a negro,) and, there being no vacant house on the place, slept at night in his cotton-house. Story had a pair of saddle-bags, the contents of which were one undershirt, one pair of drawers, and some Winchester cartridges. Story and Jones arrived at the house of witness in the afternoon, and Story some time thereafter suggested that they should go to the mill. Jones replied that he was too tired, and preferred to wait until morning. The next day they met at the mill, and, after their return, witness heard a conversation between them in which Story said, "They are fine fellows." Jones replied, "Yes, but I want a settlement." Story then said, "If you cannot get a settlement, let us do what we came here to do." Jones replied, "No; we came from Kosciusko, through Durant, Lexington, and Tchula, with our guns, and it will not do to have trouble so soon." Story then suggested, "We will get him off to himself some day, and lose him. I came here to get those fellows off the place, and will do it if I have to kill every one of them." On another occasion, at the house of the witness, Story, Jones, and Kleinfelder were all present, as were several other persons. It was night, and, when no one was looking at them, Story and Jones "winked and batted their eyes at each other and at witness, and made signs to him," which he interpreted as meaning that he should get the others out of the house, so they might kill Kleinfelder. Story then went and called the two negroes who had his pistols, and got the pistols. The witness then took Jones aside, and told him not to kill Kleinfelder in or about his (witness') house, as it would involve witness. Jones then had a whispering conversation with Story, and returned and told witness "it was all right." Story got up, and stood with his back to the fire, and witness then called him aside, and said to him that he did not want any murder at his house. When Kleinfelder was about to leave the house, Story said to him, "Go out this way," directing him to the door which led through the cotton-field. Kleinfelder said, "No;" he would go the other way. Then Story insisted upon his going through the field. Story and Kleinfelder then went out together, and walked off some distance in the dark. Witness then told Jones not to let any murder be done, and he replied that there would not be, and called Story, who returned, and he and Jones stood out doors, and talked awhile, but witness did not hear the conversation. The circumstances of the homicide, which was on November 14th, as given in the language of this witness, are as follows: "On the day of the killing of Kleinfelder I went across the bayou to John Parrot's to weigh some cotton, and found no one there. I came on back late in the evening, and passed by where Story was looking for a squirrel, stopped, and asked him what he was doing. He said he was after a squirrel, and asked me to shake a bush so as to turn it for him. I did so, and saw a hole in the tree that a squirrel could go into, and told Story of it, and that I did not have time to fool there. I then left him, and came up the road, and met Kleinfelder about a hundred yards from where Story was. I stopped, and told him I wanted to get some lumber, and gave him the size of the house, and asked him to make out the bill. While we were talking Story came up, holding his gun through his arms, inside of his elbows, behind and across his back, and stood near Kleinfelder, with the muzzle of the gun pointing towards his right side. Story threw or moved himself by motion of his body to and fro, and changed his right hand to the trigger and lock of the gun. All at once the gun went off. Kleinfelder said, 'Oh, Christ,' and leaned forward. Then Story handled his gun. Kleinfelder said, 'Don't shoot me,' and threw his arms across his chest or front of his body. Story then threw the butt of his gun to his shoulder, and fired another shot, and Kleinfelder fell to the ground. Story then shot him again. Story then told me to go up and feel in Kleinfelder's pocket, and see if he had a knife. I refused to do it, and Story leveled his gun on me, and said he had killed two men where he came from, that Dr. Jones would bond him and get him out of it, and told me if I did not do it he would shoot me. I then went up to Kleinfelder, and felt in his pocket, and felt the knife, but I told Mr Story I did not find a knife. We then went up towards my house, and met Mr. Jones, about thirty yards from the place of killing. Jones said, 'What is the matter?' Story said, 'I have killed Barney Kleinfelder down the road.' Jones asked if he was dead. Story replied, 'Yes; dead as hell.' Jones asked, 'Did you find a knife or any weapon on him?' Story replied, 'No.' Jones said, He had a knife; I saw it about a half hour ago.' We all three then went to the body. Jones took Kleinfelder's knife from his left-hand pocket, and opened and placed it by his side. He then took Story's knife, and cut Story's coat. Story said, 'Take care, fellow, don't cut my coat too much. This is all the coat I have.' Story and Jones then talked the matter over, and agreed what we were all to swear to about the killing. Story told me that if I did not swear to what he had agreed on he would kill me wherever he found me, and that Dr. Jones would back him up in it; and, if my evidence sent him to prison, he would kill me whenever he got out, it made no difference how long. What was agreed on I stuck to until I heard Story was in jail. I was afraid to do otherwise. We then went back to my house. Story then said to Jones, 'I have done what I agreed to, and I want my pay.' Jones said, 'I will telegraph to my father, and he will go on your bond.' At the time Kleinfelder was killed he had a bottle of coal-oil in his right hand and a stick in his left, with a sack across the stick, and a ham in each side of the sack. He appeared astonished at the first shot; not a thing indicated that Story intended to shoot. He had no knife in his hand at the time, and not an unkind word had been said. After the second shot he fell on his right side, and was shot the third time while in that position." The witness also stated, that on one occasion Story said to Jones that they could kill Barney and Jake Kleinfelder, but it would be a pity to kill the young lad, (a younger brother of deceased, who was also at the mill;) that when the others should be killed he would leave the place anyway; that on one occasion Jones and Story got up a wild-hog hunt, and invited Kleinfelder to go on it, who agreed to go, but did not do so; that afterwards, in a conversation between Jones and Story, they said Kleinfelder had saved his life by not going. The witness further said that he was the manager for Dr. Jones on his place, and that Story said to him that in any controversy between the landlord and outsiders the tenant should be on the side of the landlord. This witness, on cross-examination, admitted that, on the examination before the coroner's inquest, he had testified that when Story came up to where witness and Kleinfelder were talking about the lumber, he requested Kleinfelder to keep an accurate account of all lumber sawed by him on the partnership mill. That Kleinfelder inquired in an angry manner, "What in the hell have you got to do with it any way?" That Story said, "It is a part of the business for which I was sent here." That Kleinfelder then said, "I will kick hell out of you, and will settle this matter with you right now," and lunged at Story with his knife, cutting him on the breast of his coat, and that Story then shot and killed him. He also admitted that after his arrest, and while in jail, he had made similar statements to several persons, but explained that this was because of his fear of Story.

The state proved by a brother of the deceased that a short time before the killing young Jones had attempted to have a settlement of the partnership affairs between his father and the deceased, but failed to agree, and that while the discussion between Jones and the deceased was in progress Story sat near by with his rifle across his lap. It also was proved by this witness that immediately after the killing he went to the body of his brother, and found it lying on the back, with the sack of hams under it, a bottle of coal-oil clenched in the right hand, the right pocket partly turned out, and the knife lying near the left side in the blood; that there were three wounds on the body made by balls from the rifle,—one entering above the left hip, traversing the body, and coming out on the right side of the neck; one entering in front, and passing out at the back a little above the point of entrance; and the third entering beneath the left ear, and cutting the hat-band on the right side at its exit. The state, over the objection of the defendant, was permitted to show in evidence the following facts: By the brother of the deceased, that there was a pending lawsuit between Dr. Jones, the owner of the plantation, and the deceased. By the witness Austin Williams, that he had gone to Kosciusko several times during the year to see Dr. Jones, who was very bitter against Kleinfelder, and got witness to appear before the grand jury as a witness against him, whereby several indictments were secured against him, by reason of which Kleinfelder was unfriendly towards witness, which defendant knew, and he knew that witness wanted to get Kleinfelder off the place. By witness Neal, that in February preceding the homicide he had a conversation with Dr. Jones in reference to the trouble between Dr. Jones and the deceased, in which conversation Jones said that "Kleinfelder had sent him [Jones] word that he was going to make cat-fish bait out of him, and he never talked to Kleinfelder without having his hand on his pistol; that he was going to get rid of him, a blue-bellied son of a bitch, and would kill him if he were to make a motion against him." By witness Millsaps, that he was the manager of the store on the Marcella plantation of Mr. Richardson, which is about two and a half miles from Dr. Jones' place; that in the spring preceding the homicide he had a conversation with Dr. Jones, in which he stated that he desired to get rid of deceased, and would force him off his place; and by this witness it was proved that the following letter had been written to him by Jones, whose handwriting he recognized, which letter was also admitted in evidence, over the defendant's objection: "Kosciusko, Miss., May 30, 1889. E. F. Millsaps—Dear Sir: I hear that Kleinfelder is selling all my lumber to Gen. Miles, and to Marcella, too. Is it true? Please inform me by return mail how many Winchesters are on Marcella, and how many boys can I rely upon, and who are they? What became of those deer dogs that Mr. Alford had on Marcella? Your friend truly, M. JONES." Also, over like objection, the following letter written by Dr. Jones to the deceased: "Kosciusko, Miss., June 6, 1889. B. P. Kleinfelder—Dear Sir: I wrote you two weeks ago for a statement of lumber sawed at my mill up to date. I heard nothing from you. Again I ask you for the amount of lumber sawed at my mill, and notify you to saw no more; to shut my mill down from this day on. We saw no more on shares; our agreement is at an end. A settlement is required, and you to remove from my plantation. M. JONES." Objection was made to one other piece of evidence, which will be hereafter noticed. Objection was taken to all the evidence above noted, on the ground that the declarations of Jones therein referred to were not made in the presence of the defendant; that they were remote in time and irrelevant in character; that, if introduced by the state under the theory that a conspiracy was formed between the defendant and Jones for the murder of Kleinfelder, they were made long before any supposed conspiracy had been formed, and were not acts done or declarations made in the prosecution of the common purpose.

It is unnecessary to consider the evidence in the light in which it is supposed by appellant's counsel to have been introduced. There is another view, and the one we infer held by the court below, in which its competency, resting upon a totally different principle than that which applies where the act of one co-conspirator is sought to be used in evidence against another, is apparent. The act of one co-conspirator is admissible against the other, because, in contemplation of law, the act of each is the act of all. Its competency as evidence rests upon the same principle that underlies the relation of principal and agent in legitimate affairs, and is subject to the same limitations that are there applied. It is for the same reason that the act of an agent in civil affairs beyond the scope of his agency, and the act of a co-conspirator not done in the prosecution of the common purpose, are incompetent to bind, and therefore incompetent as evidence against the principal in the one case, or the conspirator on trial, in the other. That reason is that the act is not that of the person against whom it is invoked, done through the hand of another, but is the independent, unrelated act of the person by whom it is done. Where a conspiracy is formed to do an act, all are bound by the act of each in the prosecution of the common purpose, for the object of the conspiracy calls it into existence, and he who seeks to accomplish that object acts, not only for himself, but for all others who, by joining with him, aid, encourage, and authorize the act he does. 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, § 621, note 5. But a person actually committing a crime is none the less responsible for it whether he acts for himself alone or for himself and others. Upon the trial of the actual perpetrator of an offense, it is not necessary for the state to show by direct evidence the motive which impelled him to commit it. A malicious killing of itself implies some unlawful motive, and the state need not establish what that is by specific proof. But it does not follow that because it need not, therefore it may not, make such proof. It cannot be said that the motive with which an act is done is irrelevant to explain its character or to strengthen the probability that the person shown to have committed it was impelled by such motive rather than some other. Mr. Stephen, in his admirable Digest on the Law of Evidence, thus formulates the rule: "Where there is a question whether any act was done by any person, the following facts are deemed to be relevant, that is to say: Any fact which supplies a motive for such an act, or which constitutes preparation for it; any subsequent conduct of such person apparently influenced by the doing of the act; and any act done in consequence of it or by the authority of that person." Steph. Dig. Ev. p. 36, art. 7. In treating the subject under inquiry, Mr. Roscoe says: "But there are cases in which much greater latitude is permitted, and evidence is allowed to be given of the prisoner's conduct on other occasions, where it has no other connection with the charge under inquiry than that it tends to throw light on what were his motives and intention in doing the act complained of. This cannot be done merely with the view of inducing the jury to believe that, because the prisoner has committed a crime on one occasion, he is likely to have committed a similar offense on another, but only by way of anticipation of an obvious defense." 1 Rosc. Crim. Ev. 140. In Rex v. Clewes, 4 Car. & P. 221, upon an indictment for murder of one Hemmings, it was opened that great enmity existed between Parker, the rector of a parish, and his parishioners, and that the prisoner had used expressions of enmity against the rector, and said that he would give £50 to have him shot; that the rector was shot by Hemmings; and that the prisoner and others who had employed him, fearing that they should be discovered, had themselves murdered Hemmings. Evidence of the malice of the prisoner was given without objection, and it was then proposed to show that Hemmings was the person by whom the rector was murdered. This was objected to, but LITTLEDALE, J., decided that it was admissible. In Hunter v. State, 43 Ga. 483, it was held competent, as tending to show motive on the part of the accused, to prove that he was the rejected, and the deceased the accepted, suitor of a particular lady, and that rumors of an approaching marriage between the lady and the deceased were brought to the knowledge of the accused. The court there said: "In the administration of the criminal law, any fact shedding light upon the motives of the transaction will not be excluded from the consideration of the jury, whether it goes to the attestation of innocence or points to the perpetrator of the crime." For a like purpose, it has been held competent to show that the defendant and deceased both sustained a relation of illicit intercourse with the same woman, (State v. Larkin, 11 Nev. 316;) that the prisoner was in the habit of having illicit intercourse with the wife of the deceased, (Stout v. People, 4 Parker, Crim. R. 71;) that the step-children of the accused, with one of whom he had illicit intercourse, had left his house and gone to that of the deceased, who refused to give them up, (Fraser v. State, 55 Ga. 326;) that the deceased had a few days before killed a near relative of the prisoner, (Kelose v. State, 47 Ala. 573;) and in Hendrickson v. People, 1 Parker, Crim. R. 406, and State v. Green, 35 Conn. 203, in which cases the prisoners were charged with uxoricide, it was held competent to anticipate the presumption of conjugal affection, and show, in the one case, that the prisoner was not in truth the husband of his supposed wife, because he had a living wife at the time of his marriage to the deceased; and, in the other, that by the will of the wife's father the prisoner had been disappointed in his expectations of pecuniary gain in becoming connected with the family. In many of these cases the expression is used that, even where such evidence is inconclusive and of but slight value, it is proper to submit it to the jury under admonition not to assume the crime from the mere motive.

It would be difficult to imagine a case in which such evidence should be admitted if it was incompetent under the facts of the present one. If the testimony of the state's witness was believed by the jury, the defendant, by his own declarations, had connected the malice of Dr. Jones towards the deceased, and his desire to have him driven from his plantation, with the killing, as the motive by which he was impelled. It appears as an uncontroverted fact that the appellant had never seen or heard of Kleinfelder until the day before he, with young Jones, appeared on the farm. Naturally the accused would have insisted before the jury that a killing so barbarous and horrid as that testified to by the state's witness could not occur without some motive potent enough to impel the act, and that he, a confessed stranger to the deceased and his affairs, without hatred or ill will of any kind against him, and without occasion for desiring to injure him, could not, in the nature of humanity, have done the deed as detailed by the witness. In anticipation of this defense, the state laid the fountain of malevolence a step beyond, and attempted to show that the hatred towards deceased resided in another, and that the prisoner murdered him because of the procurement of that other. The fact of the killing stands confessed; its details are alone in controversy. According to the state's witness, the killing was of unparalleled barbarity, so exceptional in character as to stagger credulity, but for the fact that the wounds on the body and the incumbered hands of the dead man lend potent corroboration to his story. The defendant claimed that he was the party assailed, and that he killed the deceased in necessary self-defense. Under these circumstances, it was especially important that the state should, if possible, establish the motive of the crime. Looking to the whole evidence, that for the state and the defense, it is not difficult to trace the crime from its inception to its consummation. On the 30th of October, according to defendant's own testimony, he was employed by Dr. Jones to go to the plantation to guard convicts who were to be secured in the following January. Young Jones and the appellant, armed with two Winchester rifles and pistols, with one change of underclothing for the two, and fully supplied with cartridges, left Kosciusko for the plantation the next day. In two weeks' time Jones was rid of the man whose presence on his plantation annoyed him, and the appellant stood before the jury explaining how the deceased, with a bottle of coal-oil in one hand and two hams and a knife in the other, made a sudden and violent assault upon him, who was then armed with a Winchester rifle, and how, in defense of his life, he slew him. Under the facts of this case, if the evidence admitted to show motive were as clearly incompetent as under the law it is competent, we should still hesitate to disturb a verdict otherwise so abundantly supported.

It remains to notice but a single other exception. After the homicide, according to the testimony of Williams, young Jones promised the accused to send a telegram to his father to procure him to become surety upon appellant's bond to appear and answer for the killing. When upon the stand as a witness for the defendant, Jones was asked if he had sent the telegram, and, without objection by the defendant, replied that he had. He was then asked to state its contents, whereupon the defendant objected on the grounds—First, that the telegram was the best evidence of its contents; and, second, that it was incompetent, in any event, against defendant. The court seems not to have ruled upon the whole objection. The bill of exceptions states that the judge ruled that the witness could not be required to answer until the telegram should be first shown him. Whereupon the witness, without waiting for the court to direct him to answer, replied, giving the contents of the telegram as follows: "Eugene killed Barney; justifiable; will be home on to-morrow's A. M. train." We are not prepared to say that this evidence should have been admitted, but, since no objection was made to the evidence of the fact that the telegram was sent, we find nothing in its contents as proved tending to the injury of the defendant. The judgment is affirmed.

HUGHSTON v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF CARROLL COUNTY.

COUNTY ASSESSOR—ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION FOR PAST SERVICES.

A county assessor, who has received from the county five cents for "each individual assessed" by him during the years 1888 and 1889, as provided by Act Miss. Feb. 16, 1884, then in force, is not entitled to an additional compensation under Act Feb. 14, 1890, § 1, which directs the county board of each county to allow the assessor five cents "for each poll assessed" by him in 1888 and 1889, where he has "not received any allowance heretofore," since there is no plainly expressed purpose in the act of 1890 to give the assessor a compensation in addition to what he has already received for his services in those years.

Appeal from circuit court, Carroll county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by P. M. Hughston, tax assessor of Carroll county, against the board of supervisors of said county, for $315.15, additional compensation alleged to be due him for his services in 1888 and 1889, under Act Miss. Feb. 14, 1890. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

On the trial it was admitted that plaintiff had performed the services sued for;

but the county showed that he had been paid $203.80, in full for making individual assessments in 1888, which included the assessments of polls, and that he had been paid $231.65 in full for similar services in 1889. Act Miss. Feb. 16, 1884, (Laws 1884, p. 17,) in force during 1888 and 1889, provides: "The board of supervisors in each county shall allow the assessor five cents for each individual assessed, payable out of the county treasury." Act Feb. 14, 1890, (Laws 1890, p. 35,) provides as follows: "Section 1. The boards of supervisors of the counties in this state shall make an allowance to the assessor in their counties amounting to five cents for each poll assessed in 1888, and the same in and for 1889, where the assessors have not received any allowance heretofore by the boards of supervisors or auditor. Sec. 2. Hereafter the assessors of the various counties in this state shall have and receive, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, five cents for each poll assessed in each year, to be paid out of the county treasury on an allowance by the board of supervisors."

Somerville & McClurg, for appellant. Southworth & Stevens, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The first section of "An act for the relief of assessors in this state and for other purposes," approved February 14, 1890, does not contain apt words to entitle assessors to five cents for each poll assessed in 1888 and 1889, in addition to the compensation allowed by former laws. If it was the purpose to give additional compensation for past services, it should have been plainly expressed. Affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. STATE, to Use of FLIPPIN et al.

ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND — LIABILITY OF SURETIES — LIMITATION.

1. The death of an administrator of an unsettled estate does not start the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the sureties on his administration bond, since the liability of the deceased administrator is not fixed until the decree of the court approving the final account submitted by his administrator, and the statute does not begin to run until the rendition of such decree.

2. The rule that a decree finally settling an administrator's account, and fixing the amount due from him to the estate, is prima facie evidence against the sureties on his bond as to the amount of their liability, when sued by the distributees, applies also where the decree is rendered after the administrator's death on a final account submitted by his administrator.

3. The sureties on the bond of a deceased administrator are not chargeable with any misapplication of the assets of his own estate, made by his administrator.

Appeal from chancery court, Grenada county; B. T. KIMBROUGH, Chancellor.

Action by the state, to the use of Martha E. Flippin and others, against W. S. Williams and others, sureties on the bond of Samuel F. Flippin, administrator of the estate of John P. Flippin, deceased. Powell Flippin, a son of the administrator, Samuel F., and a grandson of the intestate John P., was not joined as a party plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. Horton and A. H. Whitfield, for appellants. William C. McLean, for appellees.

COOPER, J. John P. Flippin died in December, 1877, and in January, 1878, administration upon his estate was granted to Samuel F. Flippin, who qualified and gave bond, with the appellants as his sureties. In November, 1878, Samuel F. Flippin died intestate, and administration upon his estate was granted to one Williams, who, as such administrator, filed the final account of his intestate as administrator of the estate of John P. Flippin. This final account, as passed, showed a balance of $1,241.59 due by the deceased administrator to the estate of his intestate, and on the 15th of September, 1883, a decree was rendered thereon against the administrator of the deceased administrator for that sum. Administration de bonis non of the estate of John P. Flippin was granted to Mrs. Mary E. Flippin, and, the estate having been finally settled, the present suit is brought by the distributees of John P. Flippin against the sureties upon the bond of Samuel F. Flippin to recover the amount of the said decree, less the sum of $562.74, paid by the administrator of Samuel F. upon the same, the estate of Samuel F. having been fully administered as an insolvent estate. This suit was brought on the 11th of September, 1888, more than six years after the death of Samuel F. Flippin, but less than six years from the date of the decree above referred to. The defendants pleaded the statute of limitations of six years after the death of the administrator and before suit brought in bar thereof, and the action of the court below in disallowing this plea presents the first ground of the errors assigned.

It is urged by the appellants that the death of the administrator terminated the trust for the faithful administration of which they had become bound, and that, since any devastavit by their principal must have preceded this event, the statute of limitations then began to run, and by the lapse of the statutory period between the death of the administrator and the institution of this suit they are discharged of all liability as sureties on his bond. To this contention on the part of the sureties it is sufficient to reply that, though the administrator may die, the administration committed to his hands continues in the court until closed by his personal representative in the manner directed by law. The death of the administrator is not a devastavit of the estate, and confers no right of action either upon the administrator de bonis non of the original intestate or upon his distributees. It is the decree of the court having administration of the estate rendered upon the final account of the original administrator made by his administrator which fixes the liability of the deceased administrator, and from its date the statute of limitations begins to run. Nunnery v. Day, 64 Miss. 457, 1 South. Rep. 636; Cooper v. Cooper, 61 Miss. 676.

The defendants objected to the introduction in evidence against them of the decree of September 15, 1883, rendered upon the final account of Samuel F. Flippin as administrator, by his administrator, Williams, on the ground that it was res inter alios acta, and therefore incompetent. It is conceded by counsel that since the decision of Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476, it has uniformly been held in this state that an account of the administrator in the course of administration, or a judgment or decree against him, is admissible in evidence against the sureties, and makes a prima facie case to be rebutted by them. The contention is that a different rule should apply to an account rendered by the personal representative of the deceased administrator, for whom and for whose acts the sureties have not bound themselves. Counsel rely principally upon the decisions of the supreme court of Alabama, notably that of Martin v. Ellerbe, 70 Ala. 334. In that state it seems to be settled that a decree in the administration of an estate rendered upon the final account of an administrator by his administrator cannot be given in evidence in a suit against the sureties on the administrator's bond, but that a decree made upon the account of the principal administrator is conclusive against his sureties. We cannot concur in the correctness of the views entertained by the Alabama court. We can perceive no well-founded distinction between one decree and the other when both are made by the court having jurisdiction of the administration, and in the course thereof. The condition of the bond of the administrator is that he shall "perform the duties required of him by law," which duties consist in the due administration of the estate by the payment of debts and the distribution of the remainder among those entitled to receive it. There is much confusion and diversity, both of argument and decision, upon the question of the competency and effect in evidence of a judgment or decree against the principal, when offered against the sureties upon his administration bond. In Alabama such judgment or decree is conclusive, but a decree upon an account rendered by the administrator of the administrator is not evidence at all. In North Carolina a judgment against the administrator is not evidence at all against the sureties. McKellar v. Bowell, 4 Hawks, 34. In Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, New York, and Mississippi, the argument is against the competency of the evidence; but the decisions are that it is competent, but not conclusive, evidence. Munford v. Overseers, 2 Rand. (Va.) 315; Craddock v. Turner, 6 Leigh, 116; Lyles v. Caldwell, 3 McCord, 225; Ordinary v. Condy, 2 Hill, (S. C.) 313; Bryant v. Owen, 1 Ga. 355; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35; Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476. As we have observed, we are unable to adopt the distinction of the supreme court of Alabama, by which a difference is made between the decree against the administrator on an account rendered by him and a decree rendered against the estate of such administrator upon his final account rendered by his administrator. Each is a decree in the administration of the estate; each is conclusive against the principal in the bond or his personal representative; and each is upon an account filed in the administration of the estate by the first administrator,—one being rendered by him in person, and the other by his personal representative for him. It is to be remembered that the statute provides for both accounts as a part of the lawful administration of the estate, and it is for that that the sureties have bound themselves. Their obligation is that the administrator shall account for and pay over the estate committed to his charge. "The decree is evidence that he has been called upon and has not performed this obligation, and thus proves the breach assigned." Lyles v. Caldwell, 3 McCord, 225. The appellees are not chargeable with any misapplication by the administrator of the estate of Samuel Flippin of the assets of his estate. They had no control over the same, and could not have prevented the payment to Powell Flippin, who, it is conceded, was not entitled to receive anything until the debts of Samuel should have been fully paid. But this was a mere wasting of the estate of Samuel Flippin, and for that his administrator, and not appellees, must respond.

The decree is affirmed.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE—CONDITIONAL SALE.

Code Miss. 1880, § 1300, providing that all property used or acquired by a trader in his business shall, as to his creditors, be liable for his debts, and be in all respects treated in favor of his creditors as his property, gives his assignee for the benefit of creditors no better title than he had himself to property used in his business, and which he held under a contract, acknowledged and duly recorded, providing that the title should remain in his seller until all the installment notes for the purchase thereof had been paid, there being at the time of the assignment notes due and unpaid and others not yet due.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery, county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Replevin by James W. Tufts against R. T. Gayden for a soda fountain and apparatus. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant was the assignee for the benefit of creditors of a firm of druggists to which plaintiff had sold the property by a contract acknowledged and duly recorded, providing that title should remain in plaintiff until the several installment notes for the purchase thereof should be paid. The property was used by the firm in its business, but at the time of the assignment there were several notes due and unpaid and several others not yet due. Defendant took possession of the property, claiming it by virtue of the assignment and the provision of Code Miss. 1880, § 1300, that all property used or acquired by a trader in his business shall, as to the creditors of such person, be liable for his debts, and be in all respects treated in favor of his creditors as his property.

Sweatman, Trotter & Knox, for appellant. Calhoon & Green, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. As the assignee held by the same title by which his assignors did, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 854. Affirmed.

STATE, to Use of LAFAYETTE COUNTY, v. HALL et al.

COUNTY TREASURERS — PENALTIES — LIABILITY OF SURETY—PLEADINGS.

1. The provision of Code Miss. § 369, that if a county treasurer shall neglect to make a report to the board of supervisors at their regular meeting, or at other times, when required, he shall forfeit the sum of $200, is in the nature of a punishment to the treasurer individually, for which his sureties are not liable.

2. A complaint in an action on the bond of a county treasurer alleged that the treasurer failed to make reports to the supervisors at their regular meeting, as required by Code Miss. § 369; that by reason thereof the board were not informed that the treasurer had mingled the general funds of the county with the school funds, and of the mingled funds had embezzled a certain amount; that by mingling the funds the treasurer had made it impossible for plaintiff to know what particular fund was embezzled, and because of such want of knowledge plaintiff was unable to recover on the general bond given by the treasurer for county funds; that, if the treasurer had made the reports required by law, the board would have been informed of the condition of affairs, and would have prevented further embezzlement; that the losses therefore resulted from the failure of the treasurer to report as required by law. Held, that the complaint did not state a cause of action, as the failure to report was not the proximate cause of the damages, but the abstraction of the funds, and there was no direct allegation that the general funds had been embezzled.

Appeal from circuit court, Lafayette county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Action by the state, to the use of Lafayette county, against J. M. Hall, county treasurer, and the sureties on his general bond. A demurrer interposed by the sureties was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Phil. A. Rush and Edward Mayes, for appellant. C. B. Howry and H. A. Barr, for appellees.

COOPER, J. This is an action brought by the state for the use of Lafayette county against Hall, the former treasurer of the county, and the sureties upon his official bond. The declaration contains two counts. By the first count the plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $2,800, being 14 forfeitures of $200 each, for failures by the treasurer to comply with the provisions of section 369 of the Code, which provides that "the county treasurer, at every regular meeting of the board of supervisors and at such other times as may be required by the said board, shall make to such board a detailed report of all moneys received by him and of the disbursement thereof, and of all debts and sums of money due to or from the county, and of all other proceedings in his office, so that said receipt, disbursement, and debts may clearly and distinctly appear. He shall also, at the time of making such reports, bring all moneys belonging to the county treasury to the board of supervisors, to be counted by said board; and if any county treasurer shall neglect to make such report he shall forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars, to be recovered by suit in the name of the board of supervisors of the county, for the use of the county." By the second count the plaintiff sets out the failure of the treasurer to make the reports required by said section of the Code at the 14 meetings of the board specified in the first count, and then avers that by reason of his neglect so to do the board of supervisors were not informed of the fact that the treasurer had mixed and mingled the general funds of the county (for the security of which he had given the bond sued on) with the school fund of the county, (for which he had given no bond, though required by law so to do,) and of the mixed and mingled fund had embezzled, wasted, and misapplied the sum of $443.90; that by mixing and mingling the said funds the treasurer had made it impossible for the plaintiff to say or know which particular fund was embezzled, and because of such want of knowledge the plaintiff is unable to recover on the general bond given by said treasurer for the county funds; that, if the treasurer had made the reports required by law, the board of supervisors would have been thereby informed of the true condition of affairs, and would have made such orders and taken such steps in the premises as would have prevented further embezzlement by the officer; and that the embezzlements were of repeated, but small, sums, some of which were committed after the reports required by law should have been made; wherefore the plaintiff averred that the said losses resulted from the failure by the treasurer to report as required by law, and demanded judgment on the bond for the sum embezzled. A demurrer was interposed by the sureties on the bond, which was sustained, and the plaintiff appeals.

Two questions are presented by the record: (1) Are the sureties liable for the forfeitures declared by section 369 of the Code? (2) If the sureties are not liable for the forfeitures declared as such, do the facts averred in the second count show an actionable breach of the bond for which the damages claimed may be recovered? The first question is answered in the negative upon the authority of two decisions of this court as well as that of cases in other states. The forfeiture or penalty declared by the statute is in the nature of punishment to the officer eo nomine, and is additional to the liability upon his official bond for such actual damages as may result from his failure to perform the duty imposed by the section. In State v. Nichols, 39 Miss. 318, the action was to recover against a sheriff, who was by the statute made liable "for the acts of their deputies" for a false return made by his deputy, the penalty imposed by a statute declaring that "if any sheriff or his deputy, coroner, or other officer, shall make a false return on any process, such sheriff, deputy, etc., shall for every such offense be liable to pay the sum of five hundred dollars," or to be recovered on motion and notice given to "such sheriff, deputy," etc. It was held that the law created a penal offense against the individual liable to it, and that the penalty could not be enforced against the sheriff. A parent brought suit against a clerk and the sureties upon his bond to recover a penalty for the unlawful issuance of a license for the marriage of plaintiff's child. The statute declaring the penalty was that "if any clerk shall issue a marriage license without the requisites before prescribed, or in any other manner, such clerk shall for each offense forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for the use and benefit of the person suing for the same, to be recovered by action of debt before any court having cognizance thereof." It was held that the issuance of the license was a breach of the official bond, and that the plaintiff might sue the clerk and his sureties for the actual damages sustained, but that for the penalty imposed the officer alone was liable. State v. Baker, 47 Miss. 88. To the same effect are McDowell v. Burwell's Adm'r, 4 Rand. (Va.) 317; Treasurers v. Hilliard, 8 Rich. Law, 413. In Tappan v. People, 67 Ill. 340, the court, upon a construction of the statute, and principally because the penalty prescribed was a certain per cent. upon the sum withheld by the officer, and to be recovered in the same action as the principal sum, for which the sureties were unquestionably bound and were to be sued, was of opinion that the legislature intended to charge the penalty as liquidated damages upon the officer and his sureties. The second question involved must also be answered in the negative. Not, however, for the reason that the act neglected to be done was not an official duty, but because the damages alleged to have resulted are too remote. It is not shown by the averments of the declaration that the failure was directly the cause of injury. The averment is that, if the reports required by law had been made, the board of supervisors would have been informed of irregularities in the keeping of the moneys of the county, which irregularities gave opportunity for the embezzlements subsequently committed, and concealed the fact that prior embezzlements had occurred. The difficulty is that the loss to the county flowed not from the neglect to make the reports, but from the distinct and independent act of the officer in abstracting the fund; and this act, regardless of its origin, must be considered as the proximate cause of the injury, for redress of which indemnity is sought against the sureties. It is difficult to perceive upon what principle they can be liable by reason of the cause or occasion of the act, when non-liability for the act itself is admitted. The difficulty in this case, as in a former one between the same parties, (8 South. Rep. 464,) lies in the fact that the pleader imports into his pleadings the uncertainty which he supposes to exist in the evidence necessary to support the plaintiff's action. Instead of averring distinctly that there has been an embezzlement or unlawful conversion of the fund secured by the bond upon which he sues, (as he must do to escape the demurrer of the sureties,) and putting upon the defendants the burden of accounting for the lawful disbursement of the county funds which came to the hands of the delinquent treasurer, the pleader assumes that the burden of showing what fund was abstracted rests upon the state, and, being doubtful whether the state can support that burden, states in his declaration, not a cause of action, but the facts from which he doubts the existence of one. If the treasurer has not embezzled any of the fund secured by the bond upon which suit is brought the plaintiff cannot recover. If, on the other hand, there has been any embezzlement of that fund, no matter whether it was taken from that fund, kept separate and apart from the school fund, or from a mingled fund of which that formed a part, the delinquent, and those who became his sureties, must make good the loss. The question really involved is one of evidence and of the burden of proof; the declaration in this cause converts it into one of pleading. The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

McDONALD v. STATE.

LOCAL OPTION—ILLEGAL SALES—INDICTMENT.

Under Act Miss. March 11, 1886, (local option law,) providing that the commissioners of election shall canvass the returns, determine the result, and within 10 days make a report of the result, which shall be spread on the minutes of the board, such report is the only evidence of the result of the election; and therefore an indictment for selling in violation of such law, which merely alleges that an election was held, resulting in a majority against the sale, and that within 10 days a report was returned to the board of supervisors and spread on its minutes, but fails to state that the commissioners determined the result and made the report, is defective.

Appeal from circuit court, Franklin county; W. P. CASSEDY, Judge.

Defendant was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the local option law, (Act March 11, 1886,) and appeals. Reversed.

The indictment alleged that an election was duly held under said act, resulting in a majority of votes against the sale, and that within 10 days thereafter a written report was returned to the board of supervisors, and was spread on the minutes of the board, but failed to allege that the commissioners of election had canvassed the returns, determined the result, and made a report.

H. Cassedy, for appellant. T. M. Miller, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CAMPBELL, C. J. By section 4 of "An act for preventing the evils of intemperance," etc., approved March 11, 1886, it is provided that the "commissioners of election shall canvass the returns so made to them, and shall ascertain and determine the result, and shall within ten days after the election make a written report to the board of supervisors, verified by their affidavits, of the result so declared by them upon such canvass and return, which said report shall be spread upon the minutes of the board," etc. This is made the evidence of the result of the election, and is the only evidence on the subject admissible. Until the commissioners of election determine and report the result, it is as if no election had been held. This indictment is defective in not averring that the commissioners of election had determined and reported to the board that a majority of the votes cast were "against the sale." So far as shown by the indictment, the result may have been determined and reported by anybody. No intendment can be made in favor of the indictment, which must show everything required to sustain a conviction under the act. The indictment should have been quashed. Reversed, indictment quashed, and appellant held to answer in the circuit court any new indictment which may be found against him.

BRADY v. COOK.

VERDICT IN REPLEVIN—SEPARATE VALUATION.

Where on a trial in replevin it appears that defendant, after giving a forthcoming bond, disposed of the articles, so that he cannot return them, it is unnecessary that the jury assess the value of the articles separately, there being no reason therefor except when a return is possible.

Appeal from circuit court, Sunflower county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Replevin by John Cook against Susan P. Brady for several bales of cotton and cotton seed. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The jury did not value the several bales of cotton separately, but gave a gross sum as the value of all the bales. It appeared, however, on the trial that defendant, after giving a forthcoming bond, had sold the cotton, and that return thereof could not be made.

Calhoon & Green, for appellant. Chapman & Paxton, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. We find no reversible error in this record. The failure of the jury to assess the value of the several bales of cotton separately was not made a ground for a new trial in the circuit court, and would not have been available if it had been, because it was shown that the cotton had been sold, and the proceeds received by Mrs. Brady. The reason of the requirement to find the value of each of several articles differing in value is that the defendant or co-obligors in the replevy bond given may make return of the thing, if return thereof be adjudged; but when it appears that it has been disposed of, and cannot be returned, as in this case, the reason fails. Affirmed.

BRAMLETT v. ROBERTS.

ESTOPPEL—BY DEED—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

Code Miss. 1880, § 1195, provides that a quitclaim deed shall pass all the estate of the grantor, and shall estop him from asserting a subsequently acquired adverse title. Held that, while such an estoppel is limited, under said section, to the particular estate which the deed purports to convey, a reference therein to the lands as being the same acquired at sheriff's sale is not to be taken as designating the particular estate conveyed, but only as descriptive of the lands; and any subsequently acquired adverse title, therefore, inures to the benefit of the grantee.

Appeal from chancery court, Wilkinson county; CLAUDE PINTARD, Chancellor.

This was a bill by Fitts against D. C. Bramlett asking that an adverse title to land subsequently acquired by the respondent be decreed to inure to the benefit of the complainant, as his grantee. The facts set up were that the respondent had quitclaimed to the complainant a half interest in certain land which he had purchased at execution sale, and held under a deed from the sheriff; that subsequently he quitclaimed the remaining half to the complainant in the same way; that prior to the said conveyances the wife of the respondent had purchased certain of the lands at a tax-sale; that complainant, when he heard of the tax-deed, demanded that the respondent remove the cloud of his wife's claim, and that the latter, although asserting the superiority of the said claim, procured a deed from his wife to himself in order that the question might be the more easily tested whether he was bound to protect the title to the respondent. The lands conveyed to the complainant were referred to in the descriptive part of the deeds as the same lands acquired by the respondent at execution sale. After the commencement of suit, Charles Roberts acquired the title to the lands in controversy, and was admitted as complainant, instead of Fitts. There was judgment for complainant, and respondent appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Shannon and D. C. Bramlett, for appellant. J. H. Jones, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. We recognize the doctrine that the estoppel of a conveyance of land is only "co-extensive with the estate, right, or interest which the conveyance purports to pass," as held in McInnis v. Pickett, 65 Miss. 354, 3 South. Rep. 660, but the conveyances by Bramlett were not restricted to an estate less than the entire half-interest conveyed by each. He conveyed a half interest in the land by one instrument and the other half by the other. The reference in the conveyances to the sheriff's deed to him conveying the lands was for purpose of description of the lands, and not a particular interest conveyed. The sheriff's deed purported to vest in him a fee-simple, and his conveyances must be held to have been intended to pass a like estate. Therefore any title to these lands subsequently acquired by him inured to and vested in his grantee by virtue of section 1195[1] of the Code.

Affirmed.

[1] Code Miss. 1880, § 1195, provides that a conveyance of quitclaim shall be sufficient to pass all the estate of the grantor in the land conveyed, and shall estop him from asserting a subsequently acquired adverse title.

STATE ex rel. NOEL, District Attorney, v. HAMILTON, Superintendent.

SEPARATE SCHOOL-DISTRICTS—ORGANIZATION—OUTSIDE PUPILS.

1. Under Act Miss. 1886, §§ 42, 76, which provide that an incorporated town of 750 or more inhabitants may constitute a separate school-district if the town authorities so elect, the levy of a tax to carry on the school beyond the constitutional period of four months in each year is not an act precedent to the organization of such district, but a duty which may be enforced when deemed necessary.

2. Section 45 of the act, which provides for the admission to such school of pupils of the county outside of such district on payment by the county of "the actual pro rata cost of tuition for all such children," means such proportionate part of the entire tuition in such school as the number of outside pupils bears to the whole number attending the school.

3. The words "cost of tuition" mean the tuition in the separate school-districts, and not in the county at large.

Appeal from circuit court, Holmes county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Application by E. F Noel, district attorney, to the circuit court, for mandamus to G. F. Hamilton, superintendent of schools, to issue pay certificates. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The petition for the mandamus shows the organization of the separate school-district of Durant, the teaching of the school, the cost of tuition for each scholar, and the number of outside scholars attending, the amount due by the county for such scholars, the payment by Hamilton of a part of the tuition claimed by the Durant school, the demand and his refusal to pay the balance. Three special pleas were filed, to which demurrers were sustained. No answer was filed traversing the allegations of the petition; but a plea of not guilty was filed, which was treated by the court as a proper plea, and as raising the general issue, and the case went to trial. The superintendent claimed, among other things, that the mayor and aldermen of Durant did not levy a tax for 1890 to carry on a school for three months over and above the constitutional period of four months, as provided for by law. The jury found for the defendant, Hamilton, and the court ordered the town of Durant to pay the costs. Motion for new trial was overruled.

Hooker & Wilson, for appellant. W. P. Tackett and J. E. Givin, for appellee.

WOODS, J. 1. It is not disputed that the municipal authorities of the town of Durant, by appropriate action, have elected to constitute that town a separate school-district; but it is contended for appellee that a failure to levy a tax by that municipality sufficient in amount to carry on free public schools in the town each year for three months over and above the constitutional school term in the common schools generally, is a thing necessary to be done to constitute a separate school-district. The incorporated town of 750 inhabitants or more may be constituted a separate school-district at the pleasure of the town authorities. Whenever the town authorities officially elect to accept the privileges and duties of a separate school-district, the work is done. The official declaration of the creation of the separate school-district is the one act essential to its constitution The levy of a tax sufficient to maintain the free public schools in such town is a duty imposed upon the municipality, whose observance may be compelled in proper cases by appropriate remedies; but the observance of a duty imposed is not essential to the creation or continued existence of the separate school-district. The tax for the maintenance of the free public schools in the separate district is to be laid and collected only when necessary to maintain such schools. If by any means such schools may be maintained without the levy of a tax, then no duty rests upon the town to make the levy. If a levy is necessary during any year to maintain the school in the separate school-districts in towns of 750 inhabitants or more, and the town authorities neglect or refuse to make one sufficient to that end, they may be compelled to do so by proper legal proceedings. This view appears clear when sections 42 and 76 of chapter 24, Acts of 1886, are read together.

2. The remaining question is, what sum or amount shall be paid by the county for the tuition of educable children, who attend the schools of a separate school-district, such children not residing in such separate school-district? Section 45 of the act of the legislature, just referred to herein, declares that "educable children may attend the school of any such separate school-district in the county, and the county shall pay, during its free school term, the actual pro rata cost of tuition for all such pupils. In no other cases shall pupils attend a free school out of their district, unless said school be in their county." It is to be observed that the statute is designed for the benefit of educable children of the county, outside the separate school-district. It entitles them to attend the free public schools of the separate school-district, with or without the consent of authorities in the separate district. Such educable children of the county are not burdened with the taxes for erection and repair and furniture of school building in the separate school-districts, nor do they contribute to the tax fund for fuel, and other necessaries for the free public schools of such separate district. On these very favorable terms it is the right of educable children of the county who reside outside the separate school-district to enter and appropriate and enjoy the advantages of schools in such separate district on conditions more favorable than those enjoyed by the children of the separate district; for they pay no tax to build the school-houses, to furnish them, to heat them, or to secure other necessaries. The single condition annexed to the admission of the children from the county outside of the separate school-district to its free public schools is the payment by the county of what is termed by the forty-fifth section "the actual pro rata cost of tuition for all such children." This must be held to mean such proportionate part of the entire cost of tuition in the separate school-district as the number of outside pupils bears to the whole number of scholars attending such schools. The cost of tuition to be paid by the county for outside pupils shall bear that proportion to the entire sum expended for tuition in the schools of the separate district which the number of outside pupils bears to the total number of scholars. The words "cost of tuition," in the phrase above quoted from said forty-fifth section, plainly refer to the cost of tuition in the separate school-district, and not to the cost in the county at large. The construction of the statute which we have given will alone satisfy its language, in our opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

STATE ex rel. ADAMS, Revenue Agent, v. THIBEDEAUX.

COLLECTION OF LIQUOR LICENSE.

Rev. Code Miss. § 1109, provides that any person selling liquor at his place of business in less quantities than one pint shall pay the regular retail tax, and authorizes the sheriff to collect such tax. Act Miss. Feb. 22, 1890, provides for a revenue agent whose duty it is to collect delinquent revenues of the state. Held, that the revenue agent was not authorized to proceed against one violating the law until the sheriff, knowing of the violation, neglected or refused to collect the tax.

Appeal from circuit court, Yazoo county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action by Wirt Adams, revenue agent in behalf of the state, against J. L. Thibedeaux for the collection of retail liquor tax. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, with costs, plaintiff appeals. Reversed as to costs, and affirmed on the demurrer.

Thibedeaux was merchandising in Warren county in 1889 and 1890, and, it was said, sold vinous and spirituous liquors in less quantities than one gallon, without paying the privilege license, as required by the Code of 1880. In his declaration the revenue agent averred that the tax collector, whose duty it was to collect said tax, had failed and neglected to do so at the proper time, and that he now had no remedy at law against the defendant. By failing to pay the privilege license tax of $200, the defendant became liable in the sum of $1,000, payment of which plaintiff demanded and the defendant refused; wherefore the suit. The defendant filed several demurrers to the declaration, the sixth reading: "The law provides amply and exclusively, and in a more prompt and efficient manner, for the collection of the proper penalty for the wrongs complained of by the plaintiff." "Eight. The law makes it exclusively the duty of the tax-collector to collect in such cases, and provides a special remedy in default," etc. "Twelve. That the said declaration shows no special assessment by the board of supervisors," etc. The ruling of the court below was that the demurrers should be "sustained with leave to amend, and the said plaintiff thereupon declining to amend the said declaration, or to plead, it is by the court further considered that said plaintiff take nothing by his writ, and that the said defendant have and recover his costs," etc.

Calhoon & Green and Barnett & Thompson, for appellant. E. E. Baldwin, M. Marshall, Murry F. Smith, and J. Hirsh, for appellee.

WOODS, J. The act of the legislature of February 22, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of delinquent revenue in this state, and for other purposes," has for its leading purpose, manifestly, the coercion of delinquent tax collectors. Secondarily, its purpose is to secure collections of taxes due which the tax collectors refuse or knowingly fail to collect. To carry out this scheme for the collection of unpaid taxes primarily from delinquent collectors, and secondarily from delinquent tax-payers, provision is made for the creation of a revenue agent. This revenue agent is clothed with certain powers, but the language employed in the act is not so well chosen as to put the real scope and extent of the agent's duties and powers beyond controversy. That the revenue agent is a collector simply, without any power to make assessments, has already been declared by this court in the case of State v. Addler, 68 Miss. 487, 9 South. Rep. 645. It is equally clear that he is not armed with power to collect taxes which may become due under the legal methods by which property may be placed on the assessment rolls. Such taxes are to be collected and paid over by the tax collector, the officer, under our laws, specially charged with that duty. It is clear, too, that the revenue agent may not sue for and collect license or privilege taxes until the tax-collector has refused or knowingly failed to collect such taxes. In support of this view, it must be remembered that, as part of the machinery created by law for the safe, regular, and uniform collection of the public revenues of the state derivable from taxes, the tax-collector has imposed upon him the duty and responsibility of the collection of taxes, and we must not give the construction to the act creating the revenue agent which will deprive the regular collector of the functions and emoluments of his office; but, as was held in the case of State v. Taylor, 68 Miss. 730, 9 South. Rep. 894, he shall not act in conjunction or co-operation with the collector, but rather adversely to him. He is to proceed against the collector primarily for any failure on his part to discharge his duty according to law in collecting and paying over taxes, and he is, secondarily, to proceed against the individual tax-payer who is delinquent for taxes due from him, only when the collector refuses or knowingly fails to discharge his duty to collect such taxes from the individual tax-payer. We are not to suppose that the law may receive such constructions as will devolve the same important public functions at the same time upon two distinct officers. The regular and orderly collection of the state's revenues is not to be interrupted and imperiled by the struggles between rival officers, and by the legal contests which would inevitably arise between the contending officers. The regular collector, with the moderate compensation provided by law for his official service in collecting the revenues in the usual way, is to collect without interference. When he refuses to do his duty in collecting, or when he knowingly fails to do his duty, then the revenue agent's duty to proceed against the delinquent collector arises, and then, too, his duty arises to proceed against the individual tax-payer, whose taxes due the delinquent collector has refused or knowingly failed to collect. Any other view would involve the collection of the revenues in endless confusion. Moreover, it is not to be supposed that the statute was designed to give to the revenue agent one-fourth of such taxes collected by him, when the regular collector is required and may be compelled to perform the same work for the usual small compensation. Again, it is the right of the sheriff and tax collector to make collections of taxes, and until he refuses or knowingly ails to do so this right is not to be taken away from him. The case before us now will admirably serve to illustrate this view. It is alleged that the appellee was a merchant who secretly sold spirituous liquors at retail at his place of business, and that he concealed such sales of liquor to evade the payment of the tax imposed by section 1109, Code 1880, but that now his liability has been discovered, and hence the revenue agent sues to recover the tax due under said section, the sheriff and tax collector having failed and neglected to do so,—neglected to do so because of the liability having been concealed, and not because of the tax collector's knowingly having failed. The knowledge of such liability now being known, it became the duty of the tax collector to proceed to collect the tax due, and the presumption must be indulged that the collector will do his duty. If he shall refuse, or now knowingly fail, to do so, the revenue agent shall proceed against the collector and the sureties on his official bond, and against the delinquent tax-payer himself. Whenever the revenues of the state can be collected in the ordinary mode provided by law, the interests of the public and the rights of the collector require that it be so done, and only when the ordinary machinery fails is it intended that the extraordinary agent shall interpose. In the construction of this statute creating the revenue agent we must not overlook the very important fact that this court, in the case of French v. State, 52 Miss. 759, has determined that the sheriff and tax collector has rights which cannot be taken from him; and this decision is to be regarded as approved and adopted by the constitutional convention of 1890, which continued in the new constitution substantially the provision as to sheriffs with reference to which this decision was made. In view of this, we are not to give the statute under consideration such construction as will authorize the collection of taxes, hitherto collectible only by the sheriff and tax collector, by the revenue agent, except only in cases where the former officer refuses or knowingly fails in the discharge of his duty. Furthermore, unless the view we are enforcing be the true one, we will be driven to concede that the legislature intended to arm the revenue agent with powers so extraordinary and sweeping as to put it in his power to vex every tax-payer in the state who may be thought not to have had all his property assessed at its full value by a suit to collect the tax supposed to be due by reason of such under-valuation,—a result so astounding and so subversive of the existing order of the assessment and collection of taxes as to cause every thoughtful man to recoil from it. This suit is confessedly brought under section 1109, Code 1880, and is not maintainable. The action of the court below in taxing the state with the costs was error, and for this cause only the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and judgment entered here.

CANTON COTTON WAREHOUSE CO. v. POTTS.

DECREE ON DEMURRER—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

A decree on a demurrer to a bill sustaining the demurrer on one of the grounds assigned, and giving time (how much is not specified) to complainant to amend her bill as to such ground, but overruling the demurrer as to all other grounds, and giving defendant 60 days in which to answer, in effect sustains the demurrer; and therefore defendant cannot appeal, but should await the amendment of the bill, and then plead, demur, or answer.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Suit by Rosanna Potts against Canton Cotton Warehouse Company. On a demurrer to the bill assigning several grounds of demurrer, a decree was rendered reciting that "the court sustained the fourth ground alleged, and gave time to complainant to amend her bill as to that ground, and overruled the demurrer as to all other grounds alleged in said demurrer, and leave to defendant is granted within sixty days of this time." Defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Robert Powell and W. H. Powell, for appellant. E. E. Baldwin, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. As we interpret the decree of the chancellor, he sustained the demurrer on the fourth cause or ground assigned, and gave leave to the complainant to amend his bill, and allowed time, (how much is not stated,) and then proceeded to overrule the demurrer as to all other grounds, with leave to answer. This presents the singular spectacle of a demurrer sustained and overruled both at the same time, and by the same decree, which is a new sort of practice to us. A demurrer, however numerous the causes or grounds specially set forth in it, is an entire thing,—a whole,—and is to be sustained or overruled. It is well for the court to indicate the ground on which it sustains a demurrer, for the guidance of counsel as to an amendable defect; but when a demurrer is sustained, no matter on what ground, the bill will be dismissed, unless leave is given to amend, and until the amendment allowed is made the de-murrant may not be called on to further answer, and when the amendment is made the defendant may answer as at first. Davis v. Davis, 62 Miss. 818. The effect of the decree in this case was to sustain the demurrer, and the course for the defendant to pursue was, not to appeal from a decree sustaining its demurrer, but to wait the amendment of the bill made necessary by the view of the chancellor, and then, and not until then, to plead, demur, or answer to the amended bill. The demurrer was sustained, not overruled, and the appeal of the successful demurrant must be, and is now, dismissed.

PURNELL et al. v. FRANK.

ATTACHMENT FOR RENT—DEATH OF TENANT.

In replevin for cotton levied on for rent under an attachment against "G. and his heirs," defendant's avowry alleged that it was the property of her tenant, G., deceased, at the time the attachment was sued out. Held, that the plea was bad, as it showed that the attachment was against a dead man, and therefore void.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallahatchie county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Replevin by E. V. Purnell against Mattie E. Frank for cotton levied on by defendant on an attachment for rent against "Hill Guy and his heirs." There was judgment for defendant against plaintiff and her sureties for a return of the cotton which had been delivered to her. Plaintiff and her sureties appeal. Reversed.

Defendant, by her avowry, pleaded that "the cotton attached for rent was the property of her tenant, Hill Guy, deceased, at the time the attachment for rent was sued out, and, being liable for rent due defendant, was lawfully levied on." Plaintiff's motion to strike out the plea was not allowed.

S. R. Coleman, for appellants. Calhoon & Green, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The record before us very poorly presents the case, but enough appears to show that the attachment for rent was sued out against a dead man; and when one appeared and claimed a portion of the goods seized the landlord sought to justify the taking and detention of the goods by virtue of this attachment, which was plainly void. The avowry is bad, and should have been so held. Reversed and remanded.

GEORGIA PAC. RY. CO. v. ROBINSON.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — INJURY TO PERSON BOARDING TRAIN—COLLECTING FARE.

1. At a section-house on defendant's railroad plaintiff borrowed a lantern of the section-master, and signaled a train to stop. The train stopped with the engine nearly opposite him, and without telling any one that he wished to board the train, and, as far as appeared, without any one knowing it, he passed back to the coach he wished to enter, and, as he was stepping up, the train started, throwing him against the steps, and injuring his knee. Plaintiff testified that twice before he had signaled the train and taken passage at the section-house, but it was not shown that it was the custom to take on and let off passengers there, and defendant's testimony was that it was not a stopping place. Held, that plaintiff could not recover.

2. The fact that after plaintiff had entered the train the conductor treated him as a passenger, by collecting his fare from the next station, does not affect his relation to the company at the time of the injury.

Appeal from circuit court, Carroll county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by William Robinson against the Georgia Pacific Railway Company for injuries received while boarding a train. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Defendant went to Malmaison, a flag station on defendant's road, intending to take the train there, but as it was rainy, and there was no shelter, he walked to a section-house about half a mile away, and there borrowed a lantern of the section-master, and signaled the train to stop when it came along. The train stopped with the engine about opposite him. Without notifying any one that he wished to board the train, and, as far as appeared, without any one knowing it, he passed back to the coach he wished to enter, and just as he was stepping up the train started, throwing him against the steps, and injuring his knee. Plaintiff testified that twice before he had signaled the train, and taken passage at the section-house, but it was not shown that it was the custom to take on or let off passengers at that point, and the testimony for defendant was that it was not a stopping place.

A. F. Fox, for appellant. W. R. Harper and M. L. Southworth, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The evidence of the plaintiff fails to establish that the "section-house" was either a depot or a place at which the appellant was accustomed to receive or discharge passengers, or at which any invitation had been given to the plaintiff or any one else to take passage on its trains. The plaintiff's case must therefore stand upon the facts disclosed, of an unlawful flagging of the train by him on a dark and rainy night, at a point on the road at which the servants of the company had no reason to expect a passenger, the stopping of the train because of the signals given by the plaintiff, his attempt to board it while so stopped, the movement of the train at the instant he attempted to enter it, and the consequent injury, together with the fact that after he had entered the train the conductor in charge collected the fare due for a passenger from Malmaison to Greenwood. Upon the plaintiff's own testimony, and drawing therefrom the inferences most favorable to him, no right of recovery is shown to exist. It does not appear that any servant of the company was informed that the plaintiff desired to take passage on the train, or that he was attempting, or intended to attempt, to get on it. After the injury had been sustained, the plaintiff went into the car, (the train having just passed a station,) and when the conductor came through paid him the fare to his point of destination. But he himself states that he then for the first time saw the conductor, and there is nothing to show that the conductor had before seen him. The fact that fare was then collected throws no light upon the past occurrence from which the injury resulted. The conductor found plaintiff upon the car, and treating him then as a passenger, as he rightly might do, demanded and received the fare due from him as such. But this does not show that the conductor had invited him to enter the train at the point he did enter it as a passenger, or in fact knew that he had embarked there. We are not called upon, under the facts of this case, to determine whether it is within the scope of the authority of a conductor in charge of a train to bind the company by an attempt to enter into a contract of carriage with a person presenting himself at a place other than those provided for passengers, or outside of the usual course of business. It is sufficient for the decision of the present appeal to say that, under such circumstances, it is at least necessary that the servants of the company be informed that a person presenting himself, under the circumstances disclosed here, contemplates and offers to become a passenger, before they can be required to deal with him as such. No such fact appears in the present case, and the court should have given the peremptory instruction asked by the defendant. The judgment is reversed.

ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. v. MILLER.

SURFACE WATER—COLLECTION AND PRECIPITATION—DAMAGES.

1. Where a railroad company digs a ditch along its track, and thereby conducts the water collected therein onto low land at a distance from where the ditch commences, it is liable for the damage, whether the water be mere surface water or water diverted from natural water-courses by the construction of the road-bed.

2. In an action for damages for overflowing plaintiff's land he cannot, under a complaint alleging injury to the land and crops, recover more than the value of the land, where the evidence shows no direct injury to the crops, but merely that by reason of the injury to the land it was incapable of producing as large crops as before.

Appeal from circuit court, Panola county; JAMES T. FANT, Judge.

Action by W. J. Miller against the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the overflowing of plaintiff's land by reason of the construction of defendant's road. Judgment for plaintiff for $450. New trial denied, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellant. Stone & Lowry, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The condition of the record in this cause is such that on the main question involved we find ourselves unable to form any definite opinion upon the evidence on which the case was tried in the court below. By his declaration the plaintiff complains that the defendant in constructing or repairing its road-bed closed up the channels of certain natural water-courses, by reason of which the water flowing therein was caused to overflow his adjacent lands, to the great injury of the land and destruction of crops. A map of the road-bed and adjacent lands, which was used in the trial of the cause in the court below, is made part of the record, but nothing appears on it by which we are enabled to apply much of the evidence of the witnesses. The witnesses testifying before the jury and pointing out the localities to which they referred on the map were, we doubt not, enabled to give to the jury a clear understanding of the matters in issue; but we fail to learn anything from the testimony such as that given by the plaintiff, a part of which is as follows: "Here is my land in here. This part along here is a high place. The water did not damage that, but this in here, and this; and this is very fine bottom land. * * * On account of the railroad being here, it stops this water coming down these little ravines here, and turns it down the railroad; and when it gets here it goes through a cut here, where there is a lot of gravel," etc. It is evident that we cannot know what the witness meant or said, unless aided by some indicia on the map, locating the places spoken of. We gather from the record the general fact that the road-bed of the defendant crosses several little swales, or ravines, or small water-courses, in which, in periods of heavy rains, a considerable quantity of surface water is gathered. The road-bed prevents this water from flowing westward as it naturally would do, and a ditch cut by the company along the eastern line of its road gathers all this water, and conducts it some half mile to the land of the plaintiff, and, his land being lower than the bed of the ditch, is in times of excessive rainfall overflowed by the water running over the banks of the ditch. The contention of the plaintiff was that the defendant's road-bed intersected and obstructed natural water-courses and diverted water therefrom, and caused the same to overflow his land. On the other hand, the defendant contended that its road did not intersect any water-course, but that the water turned upon the land of the plaintiff was mere surface water, which, obstructed by the road-bed, turned aside, and, following the natural declivity to the north, flowed upon the adjoining land of the plaintiff. We are satisfied that whether the flow of water intersected and diverted by the road-bed was that of streams running in well-defined channels and having banks, or was mere surface water, coming from the adjacent hills, and flowing in sheets across the swales between the hills and the adjacent creek, the defendant is in either event responsible for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiff by the turning of the water upon his lands. If it be conceded that this was surface water, it has been so collected and discharged in injurious volumes upon the lands of plaintiff as to entitle him to compensation for the injury resulting to his property therefrom. The rules of the civil and of the common law in relation to surface water are directly contrary to each other. Under the first, the lower of two adjacent estates owes a servitude to the other to receive the natural drainage, and the other estate cannot withhold from the lower the supply of water flowing naturally. Under the rule of the common law the owner of the upper estate may withhold, and the owner of the lower estate may repel, mere surface or superficially percolating water upon or from his estate. In the states of Pennsylvania, Illinois, North Carolina, California, and Louisiana, and probably Ohio and Missouri, the rule of the civil law is adopted, while in England, Massachusetts, Maine, Vermont, New York, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Wisconsin the rule of the common law prevails, at least as to rural estates. Gould, Waters, §§ 265, 266, and authorities in notes. But neither under the rule of the civil nor of the common law is one permitted to collect surface water falling upon his own land or that of another in artificial channels, and to discharge it in undue and unnatural quantities upon the land of another. Gould, Waters, § 271; Barkley v. Wilcox, 86 N. Y. 148. The defendant has, for the protection of its road-bed, dug a ditch along its eastern line, into which is collected surface water falling upon adjacent lands for a half mile along the ditch, and which, but for the ditch, would have flowed upon lands of other persons, and has discharged the water thus accumulated upon the lands of the plaintiff, which were free from the flow of the water in its natural course. Upon all the authorities this is an unlawful act, and for it the plaintiff is entitled to recover. But the damages awarded by the jury are manifestly excessive. The evidence shows that the extent of the injury is confined to 12 acres of land of the value of $25 per acre. If the land had been totally destroyed not more than $300 could have been recovered for the injury to the land. The declaration claims certain other damages for injury to crops upon the land, but the evidence discloses that this damage resulted, not to the crops directly, but that by reason of excessive water put upon the land it was rendered incapable of producing full crops, as it had done before. The plaintiff has, therefore, been awarded double damages for the injury. He has recovered damages for injury to the land, and damages because the land as injured failed to produce full crops. For this the judgment must be reversed. If the appellee desires so to do, he will be permitted to remit all save $250, for which judgment may then be rendered here.

FOOT v. GOLDMAN.

PARTNERSHIP—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RIGHT OF INFANT PARTNER TO REVOKE.

1. An infant partner is not bound by an assignment of the partnership assets executed by his copartner.

2. It cannot be objected that the effect of a decree of court avoiding such an assignment would be to assist the infant to get possession of the firm assets, and convert them to his own use, without payment of the firm debts, because the court will so deal with the said assets as to protect all parties.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

This was a bill by B. Goldman, an infant, against Lawrence Foot, to set aside an assignment of the partnership assets of B. Goldman & Co. The facts alleged were that the firm of Goldman & Co., of which complainant was a member, was largely indebted, but not insolvent; that, notwithstanding complainant's protest, his partner executed an assignment of the partnership assets to Foot for the benefit of creditors; and that Foot was sacrificing the goods. Complainant asks that the assignment be set aside on account of his infancy. From a decree overruling a demurrer to the bill, the assignee, Foot, appeals. Affirmed.

R. Powell and W. H. Powell, for appellant. Calhoon & Green, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The decided weight, in number at least, of the authorities, is that one partner has not, by virtue of the partnership contract alone, and in the absence of special circumstances, authority to convey the whole partnership property to a trustee for the payment of the partnership debts. 1 Lindl. Partn. 127, note; Burrell, Assignm. 126; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 847. The authority of one partner to act for all rests upon the agency created by the contract of partnership; and in no case can an agent perform an act which, if done by the principal, would be invalid, or bind the principal irrevocably, when, if the act had been done by the principal himself, it might have been revoked. If the appellee had himself joined in the assignment, it might have been annulled on his application. It is impossible that one claiming to act as his agent can bind him irrevocably.

The suggestion that the infant seeks to get possession of the firm assets, and convert them to his own use, without payment of the firm debts, and that the court will by its decree aid him in this purpose, is not well founded. The court, having avoided the assignment, will so deal with the property as to protect the rights of all parties. 10 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 639. Decree affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. CITY OF VICKSBURG.

NEGLIGENCE OF FIRE DEPARTMENT—LIABILITY OF CITY.

A city is not liable for the negligent driving of a member of its fire department in going to a fire, though the department be under its direct control, management, and operation, and the members of it be employed and paid by the city.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county; J. D. GILLAND, Judge.

Action by W. C. Alexander against the city of Vicksburg for the value of a horse struck and killed by a hose-reel which was being rapidly driven to a fire within the city limits. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

It was admitted that the accident was the direct result of the negligence of the driver of the hose-reel; that he was in the employ of the city; that driving the hose-reel was his ordinary duty; that the fire department was under the direct control, management, and operation of the city; and that there was no contributory negligence.

Dabney & McCabe, for appellant.

Where a city manages and operates its own fire department, it is liable for the negligence of a driver while driving to a fire. Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 762; Wheeler v. City of Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 19; Fisher v. City of Boston, 104 Mass. 87; Tainter v. City of Worcester, 123 Mass. 311; Greenwood v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 226; Burrill v. Henry & Thompson, for appellee.

A city is not liable for what it does as an arm of the government and for the public good. Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 755. The work of a fire department is wholly gratuitous, and the city is not liable for injuries inflicted by it, although the firemen are employed and paid by the city. Hafford v. ALABAMA & V. R. CO. v. SUMMERS.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. April Term, 1891.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—FLYING SWITCHES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. It is negligence per se for a railroad company to make a flying switch across the streets of a town, along which people are constantly accustomed to travel.

2. A woman with a bundle on her head was walking south along a road across which a switch from a railroad track running parallel to the road was laid. She met a train, which passed her, going north, and, returning, threw some cars by a running switch onto a side track. The cars struck the woman when at the intersection of the street and the switch. The engineer attempted to warn the woman, but was unable to, on account of the bundle on her head. Held, the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county; WARREN COWAN, Special Judge.

Action by James Summers against the Alabama & Vicksburg Railway Company for damages on account of the killing of plaintiff's wife. Judgment for plantiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nugent & McWillie and Birchett & Shelton, for appellant. Anderson & Russell, for appellee.

COOPER, J. The appellee has recovered the judgment appealed from for the death of his wife, occasioned by a train of the appellant while making a "running" or "flying" switch in the city of Vicksburg. The main lines of appellant's road near the place of the injury lies nearly parallel to Water street, and some 25 feet to the east of a dummy line, which is either upon a part of Water street or a little east of it. At a point on the main line of defendant's road, stated by the witness to be from 120 to 165 feet north-east of the place where Mrs. Summers was killed, another line of defendant's road, known as the "River Line," intersects the main line. This river line leaves the main line on a curve towards the south-west, crosses the dummy line and Water street, and runs to the bank of the Mississippi river. On the day of the injury, the deceased, with a bundle of clothing on her head, was walking southward along the dummy line, (where many people were accustomed to walk,) and, while she was some distance north of the intersection of the river line of appellant with the dummy line, a train of the appellant, going north, met her, and passed on, she continuing to walk south. This train passed some distance north of the intersection of the main line and the river line, and then started south to make the switch, called by various witnesses a "flying," "running," "walking," or "dropped" switch. Whether it is one or the other seems to be determined by the rate of speed at which the train is running when the switch is made. The witnesses differ as to the rate of speed on this occasion, some saying the engine ran at a speed of 15 or 20 miles an hour, while others say it did not exceed 5 or 6 miles. However this may be, what was done was this: The train, having met deceased and proceeded north, started south, and, after momentum had been given to it, the two rear cars were detached. The speed of the engine and other cars was then accelerated, so that they should clear the switch at the intersection of the main and river lines before the detached cars reached that point. The engine and cars thereto attached proceeded down the main line, but the detached cars, on reaching the intersection, were switched off on the river line, and, running thereon, struck the deceased just as she was passing across the same along the dummy line. The engineer and fireman, seeing and appreciating the danger, attempted to warn the deceased by blowing the whistle and ringing the bell and calling to her, but the brakeman on the detached cars seems not to have seen her until too late to apply his brakes and check the speed of his cars. At the instance of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury that the act of the servants of the defendant in making the running or flying switch across Water street was negligence per se, and that, if the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and refused a peremptory instruction, asked by the defendant, because of the contributory negligence of the deceased. We approve the action of the court in both respects. It is negligence for a railroad company to make a flying switch across the streets of a town, along which people are constantly accustomed to travel. Fulmer v. Railroad Co., 68 Miss. 355, 8 South. Rep. 517; French v. Railroad Co., 116 Mass. 537; Brown v. Railroad Co., 32 N. Y. 597; Railroad Co. v. Garvy, 58 Ill. 83; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 223. Whether the deceased exercised reasonable care and prudence under the circumstances in which she acted was also properly submitted to the jury. No trains were at the time of the injury being run on the dummy line, along which she was walking, that line being then in temporary disuse. Walking, as she was, towards the south, she could readily observe any train approaching from that direction. The train on appellant's main line had just met her and passed to the north, and, returning, the principal part of it, attached to the engine, had again passed along the main line going south. We cannot say, as matter of law, that it was contributory negligence on the part of the deceased not to foresee and guard against the unlawful and negligent act of the defendant in making the flying switch by which a part of the train was shifted to another track and sped along its dangerous course behind her. The question was fairly submitted to the jury, and we are not prepared to dissent from the conclusion it reached. French v. Railroad Co., 116 Mass. 537; Craig v. Railroad Co., 118 Mass. 431; Gaynor v. Railroad Co., 100 Mass. 208; Railroad Co. v. McGowan, 62 Miss. 682. The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS et al. v. SCHMIDT.

TAXATION—PREMATURE SALE.

A sale for delinquent taxes made on the first Monday in May, instead of the second, under Act Miss. Feb. 13, 1867, making liquidating levee taxes payable on the 1st day of May in each year, and directing that lands in default shall be sold on the second Monday in May, is invalid, since a tax-payer has a right to pay his taxes between the time they become delinquent and the day prescribed for the sale.

Appeal from chancery court, Washington county; W. R. TRIGG, Chancellor.

Bill by Theodore Schmidt against Charles L. Davis and others to confirm a tax-title. Decree for complainant. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wynn, Thomas & Griffin, for appellants. Jayne & Watson, for appellee.

WOODS, C. J. The appellee claims to derive title to the lands in controversy through a sale made on the 4th day of May, 1868, to the board of liquidating levee commissioners, for non-payment of liquidating levee taxes alleged to have been due thereon for the year 1867. The second section of the act of February 13, 1867, to provide for the payment of all debts and liabilities contracted or assumed, and all scrip or evidence of debt issued by the general board of levee commissioners, etc., makes the taxes levied by the act payable on the 1st day of May in each year; and the third section of the act directs the lands so in default to be sold on the second Monday in May of each year. The taxes were not paid on these lands on the 1st day of May, 1868, and the same were sold, not on the second Monday in May, but on the first Monday in that month. Thus the question is presented, did this sale, made confessedly one week in advance of the day fixed by law for the sale of lands delinquent for taxes, convey any valid title? The question involves the construction of the statute, and is one of legislative intention purely, and not one of legislative power.

By the second section of the act, payment of taxes is contemplated to be made on or before the 1st day of May; and by the third section a sale of the lands is directed, if there be default made in payment, on the second Monday in May. A literal adherence to the words of the second section will deprive the tax-payer of the privilege and power of paying after the 1st day of May. It is true, the taxes were due on May 1st; but it is not true in that sense which made them subject to sale for default in payment of taxes due thereon. Until the lands are directed to be sold, it cannot be reasonably affirmed that there has been that delinquency which authorizes and requires a sale. The general scheme of our tax laws does not contemplate any imposition of burdens upon others than delinquent tax-payers. If the tax-payer had paid, in accordance with law, or if his lands were sold while he yet had the right to pay, in accordance with law, he could not be said to be delinquent, and should not be subjected to the penalty visited upon delinquents. In the case at bar the tax-payer should have paid on or before the 1st day of May, but, if he did not, he might pay at any subsequent time prior to the day when his taxes were due, in such sense as made his lands liable to sale for final default in payment. The intervening period between the 1st day and the second Monday in the month were days of grace in which the tax-payer might still pay. This view meets the spirit of our scheme of taxation, and does no violence to its letter, taken as one harmonious whole. Nor is this view at all at variance of this court in Nevin v. Bailey, 62 Miss. 433, and other later opinions on this general subject. In the first-named case the remarks of the court had reference to a sale made on final default in payment of taxes, and a sale after the days of grace had expired, on the day fixed by law when the lands were liable to sale for such final default. We find it unnecessary to consider the other question presented, as this opinion disposes of the case as it now stands. Reversed and remanded.

MARRIAGE BETWEEN SLAVES—LEGITIMACY OF ISSUE.

1. Neither Acts Miss. 1865, c. 4, providing that "all freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes who do now or have heretofore lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, shall be taken and held in law as legally married, and the issue shall be taken and held as legitimate, for all purposes," nor Const. Miss. 1869, art. 12, § 22, declaring that "all persons who have not been married, but are now living together, cohabiting as husband and wife, shall be taken and held, for all purposes in law, as married, and their children, whether born before or after the ratification of this constitution, shall be legitimate," validated a marriage between persons, one of whom was dead at the time the act was approved, or rendered the children of such persons legitimate.

2. Code Miss. 1871, § 1766, making legal and valid all marriages theretofore solemnized, not prohibited by the provisions of article 3, c. 23, of the new Revised Code, which section defined the degrees within which lawful marriage might take place, was intended only to validate marriages theretofore solemnized between parties within the forbidden degrees under former laws, and had no reference to slave marriages,—marriages not known to the law

Appeal from circuit court, Wilkinson county; W. P. CASSEDY, Judge.

Ejectment by Lizette Andrews against Leah Simmons and others. Plaintiff claimed title as the daughter and heir of one Barney, and offered evidence that said Barney was married to one Mary while they were slaves, and that she was the issue of that marriage; that her mother died a slave; and that her father never married again. The court excluded the evidence, and judgment was rendered for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Capell and D. C. Bramlett, for appellant. T. McKnight, for appellees.

WOODS, J. The only error assigned by counsel for appellant is the action of the trial court in excluding the evidence offered by plaintiff showing that she was the daughter of Ike and Mary Barney, who were slaves united in marriage according to the usages prevailing during the existence of slavery, and that Mary died in a state of slavery, after involuntary separation from her husband, and that Ike did not again remarry during the life-time of Mary. There being no marriages recognized in law among slaves, when this class of our population was enfranchised and elevated to citizenship the legislature promptly enacted laws applicable to the changed condition, so far as possible validating slave marriages, and legitimating the fruits of such marriages. Chapter 4, Act 1865, declares "that all freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes who do now and have heretofore lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, shall be taken and held in law as legally married, and the issue shall be taken and held as legitimate, for all purposes." This perfectly met the requirements of the embarrassing situation, and was all that could be done to give validity to slave marriages, and to legitimate the issue of such marriages. That the legislature neither undertook to make, nor, indeed, could have made, valid marriages against the consent of those bound, or against their wish, is too plain for disputation. The act of 1865 undertook to validate marriages between former slaves who had theretofore been and then were living together as husband and wife, and to render legitimate the offspring of such marriages; and this would appear to have exhausted the legislative power. To further meet the necessities of the changed condition of those who had been in slavery formerly, a constitutional provision, in substantial agreement with the act of 1865, was inserted in the twenty-second section of the twelfth article of the constitution of 1869, by which it was declared that "all persons who have not been married, but are now living together, cohabiting as husband and wife, shall be taken and held, for all purposes in law, as married, and their children, whether born before or after the ratification of this constitution, shall be legitimate." It will be observed that the constitution went no further than to establish the relationship of marriage between persons who were then living together and cohabiting as husband and wife, and to render legitimate the children of such persons, whether born before or after the establishment, constitutionally, of such marriage relationship. Neither the act of 1865, nor the twenty-second section of the twelfth article of the constitution of 1869, can, by any ingenuity of construction, be held to validate marriage between persons after the death of one of them, and, necessarily, without the consent of either of them.

It is said, however, by counsel for appellant, that section 1766, Code 1871, validated the slave marriage of appellant's parents, and legitimated the issue of such marriage. This section declares "that all marriages heretofore solemnized in this state, not prohibited by the provisions of article 3, c. 23, of the new Revised Code, are hereby declared to be legal and valid." A glance at said article 3, c. 23, will show that it is designed to define the degrees within which lawful marriage may not take place, and that it has no reference to slave marriages,—marriages not known to law. The plain purpose of section 1766 was to validate certain marriages theretofore solemnized between parties within the forbidden degrees under former laws. The apparent hardship of the case of this plaintiff was provided for by section 525, Code 1871, and an adequate and simple method was afforded to appellant's father by which to have had his child born out of lawful wedlock made legitimate. The father did not choose to have the appellant made legitimate, so far as the record in the cause discloses; and the courts cannot, at this late day, do what the father in his life-time did not wish done. Affirmed.

BROOKHAVEN LUMBER & MANUF'G CO. v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action by a lumber company against a railroad company for the value of lumber destroyed by fire resulting from the derailment of defendant's engine it appeared that, through no negligence of defendant, a switch, opening from the main line to a side track in plaintiff's yard, had been adjusted for the side track, and another switch at a fork in the side track had been so adjusted that an engine passing over it would be derailed. The second switch was under the joint control of plaintiff and defendant, and was not visible from the main track. The engineer of a mail train running 35 miles an hour was about 300 feet from the first switch before he saw that it was adjusted for the side track. He applied the air-brakes, and almost immediately the engine ran off the track at the second switch, and collided with and ignited the lumber. The court charged that if the engine and machinery of defendant were in perfect working order, and the engineer was faithfully discharging his duties, and after discovering that the switch was open did everything which a skillful and cautious engineer could or would have done "under the circumstances" to prevent the accident, then plaintiff could not recover; that the proper inquiry was not whether the accident might have been avoided if the railroad company had anticipated it, but whether, "under the circumstances as they then existed," the company was negligent in failing to anticipate and avoid the occurrence; that, though the first switch was negligently left open by defendant's servant, yet if the use to which the second switch was ordinarily put by plaintiff's and defendant's servants was such that a train leaving the main line would take one or other of the forks of the side track, and if in either event the train could ordinarily be checked without injury to plaintiff's property, and if the injury to plaintiff's property would not have resulted but for the condition of the second switch, and that was not attributable to defendant's negligence, then plaintiff could not recover. Held, that these instructions stated the true rule, and an instruction that, if the engineer discovered that the switch was open while at a sufficient distance therefrom to have stopped the train before the collision, and failed to resort to such appliances as, if resorted to, would have prevented the collision, then defendant was liable, was properly refused; since it required, by necessary implication, that the engineer must have anticipated that the second switch, which he did not see, was open, and that the engine would collide with the lumber.

2. The mere fact that an old juror, habituated to drink, was, at the request of his friend, supplied with a single draught of liquor by an employe of a successful litigant, is insufficient ground for a new trial, where all the evidence taken before the trial court on motion for new trial shows that the liquor was not given with intent to influence the juror's mind, and did not have that effect.

3. Where evidence of the amount of insurance held by the lumber company on the burned property was admitted to show motive on its part to cause the fire, but the court refused to admit a plea, in which the insurance was sought to be availed of in reduction of damages, and charged that defendant could not escape liability for any damage caused by its negligence, because of insurance on the property, a refusal to charge that the evidence neither proved nor tended to prove motive will not be adjudged error.

Appeal from circuit court, Lincoln county; J. B. CHRISMAN, Judge.

Action by the Brookhaven Lumber & Manufacturing Company against the Illinois Central Railroad Company to recover damages caused by fire from an engine of defendant. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Following are the 2d, 3d, and 4th instructions, given for defendant, and referred to in the opinion: "(2) If the jury believe from the evidence that the engine, train, and machinery of the defendant, which constituted the wrecked train, were in good condition and perfect working order on the occasion of the accident, and that the engineer, Berry, was faithfully discharging his duties when he discovered the condition of the switch, and that, after discovering that the switch was open, he did everything which a skillful, prudent, and cautious engineer could or would have done under the circumstances and conditions which then surrounded him to prevent the accident, then the plaintiff cannot recover because of a failure to stop the train before it came in contact with the mill. (3) The proper inquiry is not whether the accident might have been avoided if the railroad company had anticipated the occurrence, but whether, under the circumstances as they then existed, the company was negligent in failing to anticipate and provide against the occurrence. The law does not require of the defendant the use of every possible precaution to avoid injury to individuals or property, nor that the railroad should have employed any particular means which, it may appear after the accident, would have avoided the damage. The defendant was only required to use such reasonable precautions to prevent accidents as would have been adopted by prudent persons prior to the accident. Therefore, if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant took such care, and so conducted itself with reference to plaintiff's property as a person of ordinary prudence and caution would under like circumstances use if his own interest were to be affected, then defendant is not liable. (4) Even though the jury may believe from the evidence that the split switch was carelessly and negligently left open by defendant's servant, yet if they further believe from the evidence that the use of the stub switch to which it was ordinarily placed by plaintiff's and defendant's servants was such as would leave it so placed that a train leaving the main line at the split switch would take either the front switch or the horn switch, and that in either event the train could ordinarily be checked without injury to plaintiff's property, and that the injury complained of in this instance would not have occurred but for the condition of the stub switch at the time of the accident, and that such condition was not attributable to the defendant's negligence, then plaintiff cannot recover."

H. Cassedy and Miller, Smith & Hirsh, for appellant. W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellee.

Woods, C. J. This action was brought by the appellant in the court below for the recovery of $30,000 damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the appellant in the destruction by fire of its mills near Brookhaven by reason of the negligent conduct of the appellee or its servants. It is shown with reasonable certainty that the large property of appellant was destroyed by fire communicated by a wrecked engine of the appellee, and it is shown that the destruction and loss occurred in this manner: Appellant was the owner of certain lumber-mills, situated on the Illinois Central Railroad about one mile north of the town of Brookhaven, said mills and lumber sheds and yards being situated adjacent to the right of way of said railroad company, and to a small extent actually upon such right of way. A side track, for the convenience and accommodation of the business of these mills, was laid from the main line of the railroad out to and through one side of the mill property, being connected, at its north end, with the main line by a switch of that character known as a "split switch," which was provided with the usual and proper appliances for moving and using and handling this switch in putting in upon and taking out cars from this side track; and this side track did not again return to the main line, and had its southern terminus in the lumber-yards of appellant. About 100 feet from the intersection of the side track with the main line at the split switch an interior yard track sprang out from the first side track, already mentioned, and ran around for a considerable distance on the eastern side of the mill property, and, like the main side track, did not return again to the main line, or to the original side track, but terminated in the mill-yards on the eastern border of that property, and this additional and interior side track was connected at its point of departure with the main side track by a switch of that character known as a "stub switch." The split switch connecting the first side track with the main line of appellee's railway was under the control and in the charge of the servants of the railroad, and was kept securely locked when not in actual use in the shifting of cars from the main line to the side track, and vice versa. The stub switch was in the joint control of the servants of appellant and appellee, and was handled at will, in the shifting of cars, as occasion demanded, by the servants of both parties, and was never locked, being left movable for the convenience of appellant's servants in handling cars in their employer's lumber-yards. The stub switch could be set so as to throw cars on either the main side track or upon the interior one, and, unless set for the one or the other of these side tracks, any train of cars coming in upon the side track from the main line would be necessarily and assuredly derailed at the stub switch. The split switch, connecting the original side track with the main line, could be set for the main line or the original side track, at the pleasure of the switchman, and it could only be so set, for no derailment of moving cars would naturally occur at the split switch, no matter how it might be set; and the main line of railway of appellee, at and for some distance north of this mill, has a sharp down grade southward. It appears clearly, also, that on the evening of the accident which resulted in the destruction by fire of the mills the south-bound mail train of appellee was nearly an hour behind its schedule time, and was running at the rate of 35 miles an hour when it reached the mills in question, after 7 o'clock P. M., in the night-time at that season of the year; that when about the distance of 300 feet from the split switch, the engineer of the swiftly rushing train discovered to his surprise and alarm that this switch had been and then was set for the side track leading into the mill-yard, instead of for the main line, as it should have been, and as it had always theretofore been at the hour for the passing of his train, as must be assumed from all the evidence in the case; that the surprised and imperiled engineer, confronted with the dangers of an unexpected and unforeseen condition, not resolvable with confidence or with absolute safety, but demanding instant resolution and action, as quickly as possible applied his air-brakes, and before he could do more found himself hurled into the jaws of the yawning switch, and almost as quick as thought, afterwards, felt his engine pounding over the cross-ties, and then plowing through the bare earth, and speedily thereafter was hurled from his place among the scattered lumber in which his engine had buried itself, and from which his fireman was taken, a few moments later, a bleeding and lifeless body; and that the fire and loss immediately followed, and were produced by this frightful accident.

In exoneration of itself from the charge of negligence, the appellee showed these facts: (a) That the conductor and brakeman of the north-bound midday local train of that day, after doing some switching at the mill, (taking out and putting in cars,) closed the split switch against the first side track, and set the same for the main line, and did all necessary to be done to keep the switch so set, except to lock it, and, after so setting the switch, backed the train down south over it, and picked up the caboose or rear car of the train, and then safely carried the train north over the switch so set for the main line, having also left the stub switch set for the mill-yard. (b) That this train met the south-bound freight at Wesson, a point about 10 miles north of the mills, and, remembering the failure to lock the switch, the upward conductor notified the down-train men of the condition of the unlocked switch, and requested them to check up at the mills and rectify the error the careless brakeman had committed in failing to lock, and that the south-bound conductor, being advised and on the lookout, when his train reached the mills, found the switch properly and securely set for the main line, and ran his train by the switch and mills down to Brookhaven, a mile below, when he obtained the promise of the conductor of a wrecking train, then lying at that station, to go up with his engine and lock the switch. (c) That the conductor of the wrecking train, accompanied by the fireman of that train and a young man who lived at Brookhaven, immediately went up on his train's engine, ran it over and north of the split switch, then stopped, got off, went back, and finding the switch-target upright, and set for the main line, picked up the switch lock from the block, inserted it in its appropriate place, and locked the same, and then backed the engine down over the locked switch to the Brookhaven depot; and this wrecking train conductor observed, as did his fireman likewise, when he locked the split switch, that the inner or stub switch was not displaced, but was set for the additional or supplemental side track running into the eastern side of the mill-yards, and it is shown that this wrecking conductor's visit to and examination of the switches was about 4:30 P. M. of the day the fire occurred. (d) That no other train passed over the road at the mill, or came near the mill switch, until the down mail train reached that point, shortly after dark, and met death and destruction there awaiting it; and it is nowhere intimated that any employe of appellee was ever near the mill after the wrecking conductor locked the split switch, and before the luckless mail train arrived. (e) That Pfeiffer, a superior servant of appellant, and its witness, testifies that he saw the wrecking engineer come up on the engine, between 4 and 5 P. M., and work at or handle the switch lock, and that the target on the lever was upright, and showed the switch set for the main line, and that he did not see it moved by the wrecking conductor. (f) That almost immediately after the train had been wrecked an examination showed the split switch set for the side track, and the same, in all its parts, entire and unbroken, while the interior or stub switch was seen to have been misplaced, and set for neither side track, and that the engine left the rails at this stub switch. In opposition to these facts disclosed in evidence by the appellee, the appellant introduced Pfeiffer (the person just hereinbefore named) and two other servants of appellant, employes at the mills, who testified that the wrecking engine which came up to the split switch from Brookhaven did not run north of this switch, but stopped south of it; and, furthermore, the evidence of one Caroline Jones was put in to discredit the exonerating evidence of appellee, which we have set out herein with some fullness; and this evidence of Caroline Jones was to the effect that she saw this switch target, after the wrecking engine had gone back to Brookhaven, and that it was standing at an angle of about 45 degrees, showing it was set for the mill side track. To impair the weight of Caroline Jones' evidence, appellee showed that, though she was examined, soon after the destruction of the mills, at an inquest held over the body of the fireman of the wrecked train, who was killed in that accident, she had wholly failed to refer to this fact of the target being seen by her inclined, and showing the switch was set for the mill side track. With this comprehensive and careful summary of the important points of the controlling evidence borne in mind, the questions necessary to be considered in the determination of the cause will be made so clear that their real character, and their relations to the issue joined, and to each other, will readily appear. On the trial below, the jury found for the defendant, and, the court declining to disturb the verdict on motion of plaintiff for a new trial, the cause has been brought before us by appeal.

1. The action of the court in refusing the instruction on page 31 of the record, asked by plaintiff on trial below, and in giving the 2d, 3d, and 4th instructions prayed by defendant, is assigned for error. The refused instruction of the appellant is in these words: "The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe from the evidence that the switch was open through no negligence of the railroad company, yet if they believe further from the evidence that the engineer discovered that the switch was open while at a sufficient distance therefrom to have stopped the train before its collision with the lumber-shed, and that, though discovering the danger, he failed to resort to such appliances as, if resorted to, would have prevented such collision and consequent fire, (if the jury believe from the evidence the fire was a consequence,) then the failure to stop the train was such negligence as to render the defendant railroad liable for any injury to plaintiff's property that so resulted." The instructions given for appellee on this branch of the case required the jury to put itself in the engineer's place—in his position—when he suddenly and unexpectedly found himself called to face unforeseen difficulty, and to act on a fearful complication not anticipated, and to judge of his conduct by the baleful light of the perplexing surroundings into which he found himself inextricably thrust in the twinkling of an eye. These instructions for the appellee propounded the just rule, the fair rule, the true rule, and there was no error in the court's action in giving them. The refused instruction of appellant not only contained no recognition of this rule, but it laid down for the guidance of the jury in examining into and passing upon the conduct of the engineer a proposition which fixed liability upon the appellee because of the want of foreknowledge in that servant. The instruction, by necessary implication, condemns the engineer because he did not foresee that the stub switch (which he did not see with fleshly eyes) was open, and, because of this lack of prescience, he did not guard against the derailment of his locomotive at the stub switch, and its subsequent plunge into the lumber-shed; for, unless he could foresee that the stub switch was open, he cannot be held to have anticipated the derailment of his engine at that point, and the subsequent collision with the lumber-shed. The engineer's failure to act with the coolness, the self-possession, and the unerring wisdom which should characterize his conduct in handling and controlling his engine under the ordinary and anticipated and favorably concurring conditions of his accustomed daily task is, by necessary implication, deducible from the refused instruction: but, far more, and far worse, such failure is put for the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, while the unseen open stub switch, the efficient cause, is overlooked and disregarded. The open split switch was a causa sine qua non to the catastrophe, but the causa causans was the open stub switch, by which the engine was thrown from the rails and turned loose, unmanageable, upon its destructive work. Of course, if the engineer had reasonable time and fit opportunity to prevent the impending calamity, and failed to do so, the appellee is liable; but in the case at bar, with its facts finally resolved, if liability is to be raised, about six seconds must be held reasonable time in which to make ready to use the various appliances for stopping a train, and in which to actually put into effective operation such appliances, (for the train would be in the very jaws of the open switch in about six seconds from the time of its discovery by the surprised engineer;) and, moreover, the unhappy engineer must be held to have naturally anticipated that the stub switch would be open, and that his train would be derailed at that point, and that it would, consequently, collide with a lumber-shed about 200 feet distant, and not anywhere touched by either side track, —a prescience involving the preternatural. But we forbear to press remark further on this point, and content ourselves by saying that the engineer was only required to act in view of what he then saw, situated as he was, and that, suddenly and unexpectedly confronted with a complicated difficulty impossible to have been foreseen, he is not to be held accountable for failure to exercise that cool and unembarrassed and unerring judgment which we, freed from sudden surprise and danger, could now form and execute. He appears to have done the best he could, situated as he was, and nothing more could reasonably be required of him.

2. The ruling of the court upon the motion to set aside the verdict because of the alleged misconduct of the juror Dixon is also assigned for error. While it cannot be too strongly insisted that the stream of justice shall be kept pure,—so pure as to afford no suspicion of corrupt or improper intermingling of any foreign or hurtful matter,—yet it must not be forgotten that no mere irregularities of behavior, in this day of greater and wiser freedom for jurors, at least in civil trials, will be permitted to disturb the stability of judicial proceedings. While it is yet the settled law that bribery and embracery and misconduct in the jury, purposely brought about by a successful litigant, will require the arbitrary setting aside of the verdict thus obtained, both as promotive of the course of public justice and as a punishment upon the offender, yet it must be taken as equally well-settled that in other cases, where only irregularities have occurred that do not necessarily or naturally involve suspicion of improper influence in the finding of the verdict, the approved course is, upon proper presentation of a complaint, for the trial court to examine witnesses and take testimony with the view to ascertaining whether any improper influences have been put in operation to control the mind of any or all of the jurors, and, after ascertainment of the facts, with the further view of sustaining or setting aside the verdict, as the facts disclosed upon such examination may demand. This was the course pursued by the able judge who presided in the court below, and we have no hesitation in concurring in his judgment that the evidence submitted upon the motion failed to make out a case requiring a setting aside of the verdict as a punishment to be imposed upon the successful party. It is the case of an old man who was infirm, and who had been habituated to drink, weakly and unwisely seeking a glass from his neighbor and friend, and whose want, in the absence of means to meet it by his friend, was supplied, to the extent of a single draught, by an employe of the appellee, at the request of the juror's friend. That the act of supplying the drink to the juror was not done with any purpose to affect the juror's mind touching the case being then tried, and that it did not so affect it, was so found by the trial judge in denying the motion, and in this action of the court we see no error. It is to be regretted that the weakness of the juror in this case subjected a verdict, reached only after laborious and protracted effort, to any imputation of fraud, but, without disregarding the evidence of all the witnesses, including the offending juror himself, we cannot say that the verdict rests under any suspicion of having been obtained by any improper influence.

3. Complaint is made because of the admission of evidence showing the amount of insurance held by appellant upon the burned property, and because of the refusal by the court to instruct the jury to disregard that evidence, and the evidence tending to show motive and purpose on the part of one Allen to injure appellee's property. It seems to be conceded that the evidence was competent as tending to show motive. The evidence showing insurance clearly was not admitted to reduce the amount of any damages that might be awarded. The court refused to permit appellee's fifth plea, in which the insurance was sought to be availed of as a matter in mitigation or reduction of damages, to be filed at all; and, that the jury might certainly not consider that defense, the court charged the jury, at appellant's request, that the appellee could not escape liability for any part of the damage caused by its negligence, because of such insurance on the property. That the court below erred in declining to instruct the jury that one piece of evidence, dissociated from all the other evidence in the case, neither proved nor tended to prove motive, we are not prepared to say. To our minds the evidence as to Allen and as to appellant, offered as tending to show motive, is inconclusive, wholly unsatisfactory, and utterly empty. The evidence in the case, taken altogether, leaves no room to doubt that the fire and consequent loss were the result of the derailment of appellee's engine and its collision with the lumber-shed. Freely and fully conceding this, the verdict is so manifestly in agreement with the great facts in proof, so consonant with reason and right, that we do not feel authorized to disturb it on any ground.

ATTACHMENT—JUDGMENT—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—EVIDENCE.

A judgment by default against defendants in an attachment suit, on the ground of fraudulent disposition of property, is not, as against persons claiming to have bought the goods from them, prima facie evidence that the sale to claimants was fraudulent.

Appeal from circuit court, Amite county; D. C. BRAMLETT, Special Judge.

Smith Bros. & Co. attached goods on a writ against Porter & Webb. The goods were claimed by A. E. & E. W. Orr. On claimants' issue there was judgment for plaintiffs in attachment, and claimants appeal. Reversed.

Price & Sternberger and H. Cassedy, for appellants. E. H. Ratcliff, for appellees.

COOPER, J. Appellees sued out an attachment against Porter & Webb upon the following grounds: (1) That they had property or rights in action which they concealed and refused to apply to the payment of their debts; (2) that they had assigned or disposed of, or were about to assign or dispose of, their property or rights in action, or some part thereof, with intent to defraud their creditors; (3) that they had converted, or were about to convert, their property into money or evidences of debt, with intent to place it beyond the reach of their creditors; (4) that they had fraudulently contracted the debt sued for. The attachment was levied upon certain goods, which appellants claimed to have bought from the defendants in attachment. Judgment by default against the defendants in attachment was recovered, and upon the trial of the claimants' issue this judgment in attachment was introduced in evidence At the instance of the plaintiffs, the court charged the jury that this judgment was prima facie evidence that the sale to the claimants of the goods attached was fraudulent, and devolved upon them the burden of showing that they were purchasers in good faith for value. This was error. The attachment, for aught that appears in the record, may have been rightly sued out upon the ground that the defendants therein had fraudulently contracted the debt sued for, or because they had property which they concealed and unjustly refused to apply to the payment of their debts. We have been referred to no authority supporting the instruction in any view which may be taken of it. Certainly there is nothing in the case of Richards v. Vaccaro, 67 Miss. 516, 7 South. Rep. 506, which warranted the present instruction. In that case the fraud of the seller in the particular sale under which the claimant claimed was abundantly shown by competent testimony, and under these circumstances we held that it devolved upon the claimant to establish his own good faith and payment of the purchase price, which, being shown, would protect his title notwithstanding the fraud of the seller. We have not held that the judgment against the defendant is evidence, as against the claimant, of the facts on which it rests.

EJECTMENT—PAROL GIFT—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Code Miss. 1880, § 1188, providing that "no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than one year, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing, signed and delivered," does not prevent one entering and claiming under a parol gift from acquiring title by adverse possession.

2. Adverse possession under a parol gift extends to the whole tract given, though only a part is actually occupied.

3. In ejectment, where defendants recognize the title to have been originally in plaintiff, and claim the land only by virtue of a parol gift followed by adverse possession, the only issue is the character of the possession, and the burden of proof is on defendants.

Appeal from circuit court, Attla county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Ejectment by Simon Davis against Frank Davis and others for 40 acres of land. Judgment for defendants, a new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Defendants claimed under a parol gift from plaintiff, entry thereunder, and continuous adverse possession for the statutory period of 10 years next preceding the commencement of the action. The fifth instruction for defendants was that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to satisfy the jury by the preponderance of evidence that he was entitled to recover. The tenth instruction asked by plaintiff was that the only question to be determined was that of the character of defendants' possession, and that the burden of proof to establish their title, growing out of possession, was on defendants.

COOPER, J. It is too well settled by decisions of this court, and by innumerable authorities in other states, that a claim of title under a parol gift or purchase, accompanied by entry and adverse holding, may ripen into an indefeasible title by the lapse of statutory period of limitation, to admit of present argument or contention. Magee v. Magee, 37 Miss. 138; Davis v. Bowmar, 55 Miss. 671; Niles v. Davis, 60 Miss. 750; Geohegan v. Marshall, 66 Miss. 676, 6 South. Rep. 502; Campbell v. Braden, 96 Pa. St. 388; Clark v. Gilbert, 39 Conn. 94; Steel v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 425; Outcalt v. Ludlow, 32 N. J. Law, 239; Bartlett v. Secor, 56 Wis. 520, 14 N. W. Rep. 714; Potts v. Coleman, 67 Ala. 222; Collins v. Johnson, 57 Ala. 304. The suggestion of counsel that section 1188, Code 1880, which declares that "no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than one year, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another unless the conveyance be declared by writing, signed and delivered," prevents the title from vesting in the occupant under such circumstances, is met by the reply that title does not pass by the parol gift or sale, but by the lapse of time operating under the law upon the adverse possession. In Niles v. Davis, 60 Miss. 750, it was held that a parol vendee entering under his purchase was, as against his vendor and those claiming under him, in possession of the whole land, though only a portion should be actually occupied. This rule, though announced in that case for the first time in this state, had been silently recognized in Davis v. Bowmar, 55 Miss. 671, and has been distinctly formulated and applied in other states. In Bell v. Longworth, 6 Ind. 273, the court said: "When a party is in possession of land, claiming an adverse title, the question must always arise, to what extent does his claim reach, what land does his claim of title cover? And where there is nothing but naked possession to evidence it, his title must, from necessity, be limited to the lands over which he has exercised a visible authority, known to others as owner; to those, in short, from which he has excluded the former owner and others. A man cannot go, solitary and alone, to the prairies or forests of the west, set himself down in the middle thereof, and claim that he possesses all, to an undefined extent, not then actually possessed by some one else. He must be limited to that portion over which he exercises palpable and continuous acts of ownership, as being the quantity which he claims as his own, there being no other evidence in such case to enable us to determine the quantity. But where a party is in possession under and pursuant to a state of facts which, of themselves, show the character and extent of his entry and claim, the case is entirely different, and such facts, whatever they may be in a given case, perform sufficiently the office of color of title. They evidence the character of the entry and extent of the claim, and no colorable title does more, for such colorable title alone does not give right." In Rannels v. Rannels, 52 Mo. 112, a parol gift of the land had been made, the donee entered thereunder, and remained in possession for the statutory period. It was held that her possession was of the whole tract, though only a part was actually occupied. In Hughes v. Israel, 73 Mo. 538, the parties to a deed undertook by verbal contract to rescind the deed, and the grantor thereafter remained in the actual possession of a part of the land, claiming title under the oral rescission. It was held that his possession extended to the whole tract described in the deed. We find nothing in the facts of this case, as developed on behalf of the defendant, withdrawing it from the operation of the principle of the decision in Niles v. Davis. That these facts are controverted by the plaintiff is immaterial, since the jury must determine by its verdict what the truth is, and, this being done, all opposing evidence is unavailing.

But the court below erred in refusing the tenth instruction asked by the plaintiff, and in giving the fifth instruction for the defendant. It is true the burden of proof on the whole case was upon the plaintiff, but the defendant by his evidence, and by his whole defense, recognized the title to have been originally in the plaintiff, and claimed the land only by virtue of the parol gift or sale, followed by his adverse occupancy for the period of limitation. The real question was whether by reason of this affirmative defense the right of the defendant had become perfect against the otherwise confessed legal title of the plaintiff. On this, the only issue, the burden was upon the defendant, and not upon the plaintiff, and the court should so have instructed. Geohegan v. Marshall, 66 Miss. 676, 6 South. Rep. 502; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 803. The judgment is reversed.

GAINES et al. v. KEETON.

LANDLORD'S LIEN ON CROP — WAIVER BY INCONSISTENT SECURITY.

Where a landlord's agent, not content with the statutory lien for supplies, takes, in his own name, a trust deed on a crop to be raised by the tenant on the leased premises as security for supplies to be furnished, the landlord, as against third persons, must confine himself to the security afforded by the deed of trust, and cannot recover from a purchaser in good faith the value of crops sold to him and raised by subtenants; since the principal tenant could not, by the deed of trust, incumber the crops of others, even though grown on the leased premises.

Appeal from chancery court, Lauderdale county; SYLVANUS EVANS, Chancellor.

Bill by J. W. Gaines and others against A. J. Keeton, to recover the value of crops grown on premises leased by complainants to John Witherspoon, and on which crops complainants alleged they had a landlord's lien. On a final hearing the bill was dismissed, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

On the trial it appeared that J. W. Fewell had for some years acted as plaintiffs' agent, and had advanced supplies to the tenant. In December, 1885, Fewell sold to Witherspoon, the tenant, a team of horses, wagon, etc., for $355. To secure this sum, together with advances to be made during the year, Fewell took a trust-deed on the horses, wagon, etc., as well as on other personal property, and on the crops to be raised by Witherspoon on the leased premises during the year 1886. The advances made by Fewell during that year amounted to $406.88. Witherspoon made default in payment, and the personal property covered by the trust-deed was sold, leaving a balance of $724.32 due on the purchase price and on the advances. Complainants then filed this bill, alleging that defendant had purchased a large portion of the crops with knowledge of their rights, asking for a recovery of its value, and praying discovery. Defendant was a merchant, and he admitted that he knew that Witherspoon was complainants' tenant, and that he had purchased a portion of the crop grown on the leased premises, but denied all knowledge as to anything being due complainants for supplies. He also alleged, and it was proven at the trial, that he had advanced supplies to Henry Brown and others, who were subtenants of Witherspoon; that these subtenants delivered to him a portion of the crops raised by them in payment for such advances; and that defendant received no other products raised on the leased premises, and none whatever raised by Witherspoon.

Miller & Baskin, for appellants.

The statutory lien for supplies is superior to all others, and a purchaser of the crop, with knowledge of the existence of a landlord's lien at one time, must see that it is discharged; and he must, at his peril, inform himself of the tenant's contract. Buck v. Paine, 50 Miss. 648, 52 Miss. 277, Fitzgerald v. Fowlkes, 60 Miss. 270; Dunn v. Kelly, 57 Miss. 825; Cohn v. Smith, 64 Miss. 816, 2 South. Rep. 244; Newman v. Bank, 66 Miss. 323, 5 South. Rep. 753.

Witherspoon & Witherspoon, for appellee.

COOPER, J. If the correctness of the propositions of law argued by counsel for complainants be conceded, we think the decree of the chancellor should nevertheless be affirmed. Not content to rest the security of their demand against their tenant upon the provisions of law by which a lien was given,[1] they carved out and required another and apparently inconsistent security, which, on its face, secured a debt to a third person, whose agency for the landlords was not disclosed by the instrument. It is not necessary for the decision of the present controversy to hold, as do some courts, that the mere taking of other security is a waiver of the statutory lien. We confine our decision to the reason that the parties have so dealt in reference to the subject-matter of the lien that they ought not, as against third persons who have purchased the property in good faith, to be permitted to repudiate the security selected by their agent to secure a debt professedly due to him, and resort to the lien secured by law to themselves as landlords. As against third persons, at least, we think complainants must be confined to the security of the deed of trust. Goble v. Gale, 41 Amer. Dec. 219. As between complainants claiming under the deed of trust, executed by the principal tenant, and the defendant claiming by purchase from the subtenants, owners of the property, the defendant's right is superior. The tenants of complainants could not, by mortgage, incumber the crop of others, even though grown upon the leased lands. The decree is affirmed.

[1] Code Miss. 1880, § 1301, provides: "Every lessor of land shall have a lien on all the agricultural products of the leased premises, however and by whomsoever produced, to secure the payment of the rent, and the fair market value of all advances made by him to his tenant, for supplies for the tenant and others for whom he may contract, and for his business carried on upon the leased premises, and this lien shall be paramount to all other liens, claims, or demands of any kind upon such products; and the claim of the lessor for supplies furnished may be enforced in the same manner, and under the same circumstances, as his claim for rent may be; and all the provisions of law, as to attachment for rent, and proceedings under it, shall be applicable to a claim for supplies furnished."

MORTON et al. v. MCCANLESS.

DESCENT OF HOMESTEAD—SALE BY GUARDIAN.

Under Act Miss. Nov. 28, 1865, (Acts, p. 137,) providing that all property exempted thereby shall, on the death of the husband, descend to the widow as the head of the family, during her widowhood, for the use and benefit of herself and children, the children, on the death of their father, become co-tenants with their mother in his homestead, and their interest is, during her widowhood, subject to be sold by their guardian under an order of probate court, the same as any other property derived from their father.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; LOCK E. HOUSTON, Judge.

Ejectment by Julia A. Morton and others against W. A. McCanless for lands sold by their guardian under an order of the probate court made in 1870. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The property was the homestead of plaintiffs' father, who died in 1869. Act Miss. Nov. 28, 1865, (Acts p. 137,) provides "that all the property, real and personal, exempted by the provisions of this act, upon the death of the husband, shall descend to the widow as the head of the family, during her widowhood, for the use and benefit of herself and children, and, in the event of her marriage or death, to descend in like manner as other property descends by the laws of this state." It was claimed that the children, on the death of their father, acquired no interest in the property which could be sold while their mother was living and still a widow. The order of sale was procured, and the sale made, by their mother, who was their guardian. She testified that she supposed, as advised by counsel, that the sale would be void as to the interest of the children, and that they, on arriving at age, could avoid the sale.

CAMPBELL, C. J. The only question in this case different from those decided in Morton v. Carroll, 68 Miss. 699, 9 South. Rep. 896, is as to the validity of an order of the probate court to sell what is alleged and proved to have been the exempt property of the father of the plaintiffs, held under the act entitled "An act to amend the exemption laws of this state," approved November 28, 1865, (Acts, p. 137.) The children and their mother were cotenants of this land, the mother having an interest terminable by her marriage or death, and the children having the fee. Hardin v. Osborne, 43 Miss. 532. The interest of the children was subject to sale as any other land owned by them. Mc-

Caleb v. Burnett, 55 Miss. 83; Code 1857, art. 151, p. 463. The whole object of the exemption law of 1865 was to preserve the property from creditors, and not to affect the power of the courts to deal with the property as that of the children and heirs of the exemptionist. In the probate court proceedings resulting in the sale of the lands sued for here, there was no mention of the land being homestead or exempt property. The contrary is rather suggested by treating the land as subject to the widow's dower, but the blundering ignorance on this subject did not affect the power of the court to deal with it, and fortunately the proceeding was so conducted as to result in a valid order of sale, whereby the wicked and shameful scheme which the then guardian now swears she had in view was effectually defeated. We are constrained to believe that her memory is at fault, and that she does great injustice to honorable counselors when she states that this scheme was with the knowledge and advice of her lawyers. The result in this case was right. Affirmed.

GREAVES et al. v. ATKINSON.

RESULTING TRUSTS — HUSBAND AND WIFE — PURCHASE FROM TRUSTEE — BONA FIDES — PLEADING.

1. Prior to the adoption of Code Miss. 1857, on the purchase of lands by the husband in his own name with funds of the wife, a resulting trust arose in her favor to the same extent, and under the same circumstances, that it would have arisen in favor of any other person furnishing the purchase money.

2. Where a bill to establish a resulting trust in lands purchased from the trustee fails to state the facts and circumstances bearing on the question of the bona fides of the purchases under the trustee, the defense must be raised by plea or answer, and not by demurrer.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Suit by S. A. D. Greaves and others to establish a resulting trust in certain lands. A demurrer to the bill was sustained, and complainants appeal. Reversed.

The bill alleged that in 1853 complainants' father purchased the land in his own name with funds belonging to his wife; that he was adjudged a bankrupt, and the land was sold by order of the bankrupt court; that defendant, with notice of complainants' equity, purchased the land from the vendee of the purchaser at the bankrupt sale. The bill also alleged the death of complainants' mother and father. It, however, contained no statement of the facts and circumstances bearing on the bona fides of the purchases under the bankrupt, and stated nothing as to notice to the purchaser at the bankrupt sale or to his vendee, defendant's grantor. The demurrer was on the ground that prior to the Code of 1857 a wife acquired no resulting trust in lands purchased by her husband in his name with her funds; and on the further ground that the bill did not negative the bona fides of the purchasers under the bankrupt.

F. B. Pratt and H. B. Greaves, for appellants. W. H. Powell, for appellee.

COOPER, J. Prior to the adoption of the Code of 1857 a resulting trust arose in favor of the wife when her money was used in the purchase of lands in his own name by the husband, under the same circumstances and to the same extent that such trust would have resulted to any other person supplying the purchase money. 1 Perry, Trusts, 137, and note; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 422. When all the facts and circumstances of a purchase from a trustee in a resulting trust are shown, and it thereby appears that a person is a purchaser for value and entitled to protection as such, he may raise the defense by demurrer to a bill exhibited against him to subject the lands to the trust. Story, Eq. Pl. 603. But when they do not so appear, the defense, being an affirmative one, must be raised by plea or answer. Id. 604, 605; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pl. 677, 698. The facts disclosing the bona fides of the purchases under S. A. D. Greaves do not appear in the bill in this cause, and the demurrer should have been overruled. Decree reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

WILCZINSKI et al. v. LICK.

LANDLORD'S LIEN—TRUST-DEED—PRIORITIES.

Where one in possession of land under a contract of purchase executes a trust-deed on his crops, he cannot, by surrendering the contract, and agreeing to pay rent for that year, create a landlord's lien superior to the trust-deed.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; R. W. WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action by D. J. W. Lick, as trustee of Ring Land & Mercantile Company, against L. and N. Wilczinski to recover the value of certain coton. There was a verdict and judgment on a peremptory instruction for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Helm and Wilczinski, the owners of certain land, put one Showers in possession under a contract bearing date of November, 1887, providing for the sale to him of the land on annual payments to be made on the first day of each of the four succeeding years, the contract to be void unless payments were promptly made. Showers failed to make any payment, and in 1889 made an agreement with defendants, the successors in interest of Helm and Wilczinski, whereby the contract of purchase was abandoned, and Showers took a lease, and agreed to pay rent for the year 1889. Prior to this Showers had executed the trust-deed to plaintiff on the crops of 1889. The cotton in controversy was part of the crop of that year raised by Showers, which defendants had taken and applied on their claim for rent and supplies.

C. P. Neilson and I. Schlesinger, for appellants. Wynn, Thomas & Griffin and Calhoon & Green, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, C. J. "It is not allowable by a subsequent agreement to convert the relation of vendor and vendee into that of landlord and tenant, so as to defeat supervening rights." Nobles v. McCarty, 61 Miss. 456. The evidence in this case shows that that was done, and the instruction for the plaintiff was properly given, and the verdict is supported by evidence. Affirmed.

LOUISVILLE, N. O. & T. RY. CO. v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—RIGHT OF WAY—CONDEMNATION — QUALIFICATIONS OF COMMISSIONERS—NEW AWARD.

1. Under Act Miss. March 16, 1886, § 3, (Laws, p. 93,) providing that where a telegraph company shall not agree with the owner of land for a right of way over the same, then condemnation may be had, a telegraph company, after making efforts to get a right of way by contract, without receiving any reply to its proposition within a reasonable time, may resort to condemnation proceedings.

2. The fact that the record of the condemnation proceedings which section 9 of the act requires the clerk to keep, shows that the commissioners summoned by the sheriff were "good and lawful men, citizens of the county," is sufficient, though the sheriff's return does not show that they possessed those qualifications, as required by the precept under which they are summoned.

3. Under the provision of the statute that, on petition for a new award, "if the judge shall be of opinion that the commissioners acted upon testimony that was irrelevant or incompetent, and that their award was contrary to the law, and such evidence as was competent and relevant, and that injustice has been done, a new inquest and assessment shall be ordered by him," a new inquest does not follow as a matter of course, either from the fact that illegal testimony was heard by the commissioners, or that a party was wrongfully denied the right to open and conclude the argument.

Appeal from circuit court, Claiborne county; J. D. GILLAND, Judge.

Proceeding by the Postal Telegraph Cable Company to condemn for a right of way for its telegraph line a part of the right of way of the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company. The commissioners awarded the railway company $2,500 damages, but it applied to the circuit judge for a new inquest, which he denied, and it appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellant. McIntosh, Williams & Russell, for appellee.

COOPER, J. No error is shown in the proceedings of the commissioners to award damages for which a new inquest should have been directed by the judge of the circuit court. The proceedings were had under the provisions of an act approved March 16, 1886, (Laws, 93) by the third section of which it is provided that condemnation may be made of any land in cases where the telegraph company shall not agree with the owner or owners, etc., for a right of way over the same. That the company had not agreed with the railway company for an easement is manifest, and under the strict letter of the law the condition existed on which resort might be had to the right of condemnation. If we should apply the rule strictissimi juris, appealed to by the railway company, it would be fatal to its contention; but we think the record does show an effort upon the part of the telegraph company to adjust the matter by contract, and that the proposition so to do was to "be considered of" by the railway company, and that, no reply being made by that company within a reasonable time, the telegraph company might lawfully proceed in condemnation under the statute.

The second objection taken by appellant to the award is not supported by the record. That objection is that the record does not show that the commissioners summoned by the sheriff under the precept from the clerk were "good and lawful men, citizens of the county" of Claiborne, as required by the sixth section of the act. In this, counsel are mistaken. The precept commanded the sheriff to summon such men, and, though his return does not show that they were possessed of the qualifications required, that fact is shown in the record of the proceedings kept by the clerk, which record, by the ninth section of the act, he is required to keep.

If it be conceded that the commissioners should have permitted counsel for the railway company to open and conclude the argument, and that illegal testimony was heard by them, it would not follow that a new inquest should have been awarded. The statute declares that upon a petition for a new award, "if the judge shall be of the opinion that the commissioners acted upon testimony that was irrelevant or incompetent, and that their award was contrary to the law, and such evidence as was competent and relevant, and that injustice has been done, a new inquest and assessment shall be ordered by him." As was said in Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Alabama & V. R. Co., 68 Miss. 314, 8 South. Rep. 375: "In such cases as this much must be left to the determination of the commissioners, for it is often extremely difficult to arrive at even approximate justice where questions of value are to be determined. Scarcely anything is so variable, according to circumstances, as value."

The judgment is affirmed.

HALL v. MOORE.

EXECUTION—SETTING ASIDE SALE—RETURN-TERM.

The power of a circuit court to set aside an execution sale on account of fraud is confined to the return-term of the execution, after which relief can be had only in a court of equity. Hopton v. Swan, 50 Miss. 545, followed.

Appeal from circuit court, Holmes county; C. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Motion by E. J. Hall in the circuit court to set aside on account of fraud a sale of land made to D. W. Moore under an execution issued on a judgment rendered in that court. There was an objection to the motion on the ground that it was not filed at the return-term of the execution. The objection was sustained, and the motion denied. The judgment debtor, E. J. Hall, appeals. Affirmed.

Hooker & Wilson, for appellant. Noel & Tuckett, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. We regret that the state of the law is such as to deny relief to the appellant, who seems to have been greatly wronged; but it was decided in Hopton v. Swan, 50 Miss. 545, that the power of a circuit court to afford such relief is confined to the return-term of the execution, after which relief can be had only in a court of chancery. We do not see why this should be so, but, unable to find anything satisfactory on the subject in the books we have carefully searched for the purpose, we do not feel disposed to depart from the rule announced in the case cited. As long as two sets of courts are maintained to do what one might do as well, the established rules as to the line of division between them, where happily they can be traced, as in this case, must be respected. Affirmed.

SMEDES v. ILSLEY et al.

JUDGMENT OF ANOTHER STATE — RES JUDICATA — ASSIGNMENT OF NOTE—DEFENSES.

1. A judgment of another state in favor of an assignee of a note in an action in which the maker appeared and defended is a conclusive adjudication that the assignee became the owner of the note, and therefore an action on the judgment will not be enjoined on the allegations of a bill that the assignee had falsely sworn that he was the owner of the note; that he, the payee, and a third person had entered into a conspiracy to defraud the maker; and that, as the maker learned after the rendition of the judgment, when another note given by him to the same payee became due, the collateral given as security for both notes, and which was to have been surrendered when the second became due, had been fraudulently disposed of by the payee, who was insolvent.

2. The judgment being the property of the assignee of the note, he can maintain an action on it for the benefit of whomsoever he pleases, and it is therefore no ground for an injunction that he is maintaining it for the benefit of the payee.

Appeal from chancery court, Warren county; CLAUDE PINTARD, Chancellor.

Suit by T. M. Smedes against Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. and others to restrain an action by Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. against T. M. Smedes on a judgment obtained on a note given by complainant to B. F. Watkins, one of the other defendants, and by Watkins assigned to Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. On motion of defendants Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. a temporary injunction of the action on the judgment was dissolved, and on their demurrer the bill was dismissed; both the motion and the demurrer being on the ground that complainant was concluded by the judgment on the note. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

The judgment on the note was obtained in New York, in an action in which Smedes, a resident of Mississippi, summoned by publication, appeared, and defended on the grounds that Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. were not lawful holders of the note; that they had obtained it by fraud of Watkins, in violation of a written agreement made by him with Smedes; and that Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. had entered into a scheme with Watkins and one Harrison to unlawfully obtain payment of the note from Smedes. The parties, other than Ilsley, Doubleday & Co., made defendants to the injunction suit, were Watkins and Harrison. The bill as amended alleged that at the time Smedes executed the note on which the judgment was obtained he gave two other notes to Watkins, payable nine and fifteen months after the first became due; that he gave certain collateral security, part of which was to be surrendered by Watkins when the second note became due; that when the first note became due he refused to pay it because he was informed that Watkins had fraudulently transferred the collaterals to Harrison, who fraudulently claimed to have purchased them; that Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. fraudulently claimed to have purchased the note, and in the action thereon falsely swore that they owned it; that Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. and Watkins and Harrison entered into a conspiracy to defraud and cheat Smedes; that it was not until after the judgment, when the second note became due, and Watkins refused to surrender the collaterals therewith, that Smedes definitely ascertained and was able to prove that Watkins intended to defraud him of the collaterals. The bill further alleged that Watkins was insolvent, and that the action on the judgment in the name of Ilsley, Doubleday & Co. was in reality for the benefit of Watkins.

Miller, Smith & Hirsh, for appellant. R. V. Booth and Warren Cowan, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, C. J. Upon the facts stated in the bill and the amendment proposed the appellant could not successfully defend an action upon the note itself if it appeared that the appellees became owners of it, as conclusively adjudicated in their favor by the judgment recovered in New York. If theirs, they may maintain an action for whomsoever they please, and the averment of the bill on that subject constitutes no ground for injunction. Affirmed.

SUBROGATION OF INDORSER OF NOTE — CANCELLATION OF JUDGMENT — EVIDENCE OF PAYMENT — MORTGAGES — CONVEYANCE OF LEGAL TITLE TO MORTGAGEE—JUNIOR LIENS.

1. Code Miss. 1880, § 998, subrogating a surety who pays a judgment against the principal debtor to all the rights of the judgment creditor, including the right of enforcing all the liens which the latter had by virtue of such judgment, and section 1140, extending the benefits of section 998 to any party to an execution who shall pay it, against any other party who is liable to him for the sum paid, extend the right of subrogation to an indorser of a draft, on which judgment is rendered against him and the principal debtor, immediately upon his payment of the said judgment.

2. No entry on the judgment of such payment is required, and an entry of satisfaction, made by plaintiff without the authority of the indorser, will not defeat the latter's right to enforce the judgment in his own favor against the land of the principal debtor, even though a third person has bought the land meanwhile without notice, and in reliance upon the said entry of satisfaction.

3. Where a mortgagee takes the property under an absolute conveyance in satisfaction of his mortgage debt, and there are at the same time junior liens against it, the burden of proof is on the mortgagee to show that his debt was equal to the value of the property, and that, the equity of redemption being worthless, no harm had resulted to the holders of such liens.

Appeal from chancery court, Jackson county; S. EVANS, Chancellor.

This was a bill by W. K. Mead and others against Mrs. M. L. Yates, M. A. Dees, and J. C. Strong, assignee, etc., asking an injunction against the sale of complainants' land under execution, and an adjustment of the conflicting claims of the parties to the unpaid purchase money. Judgments were recovered in November, 1880, and May, 1881, in favor of John I. Adams & Co. against G. M. Dees and M. A. Dees upon certain drafts, of which G. M. Dees was drawer and M. A. Dees was indorser. The executions issued thereon were settled by M. A. Dees. Plaintiff's attorney entered satisfaction upon the docket by writing the word "Settled," and signing his name thereto. Afterwards, in 1886, M. A. Dees assigned the judgments to Mrs. Yates, and directed that executions issue in his name as surety for her benefit. The executions so issued were levied upon complainants' land, which at the time of the rendition of the judgments belonged to G. M. Dees. In February, 1880, G. M. Dees had executed a mortgage on the land to Danner & Co. to secure an indebtedness of $10,000. In July, 1881, he conveyed the land to Danner & Co. by absolute deed in satisfaction of the mortgage and of other advances, the amounts of which were not named. Danner & Co. leased the land to W. K. and J. W. Mead, with privilege of purchase, and the latter conveyed it to the Danner Land & Lumber Company, which afterwards made an assignment, including this land, to J. C. Strong, for the benefit of creditors. Afterwards W. K. and J. W. Mead bought the land from the assignee, as allowed by the terms of their lease. Before it was fully paid for, the executions in favor of Mrs. Yates were levied. Mrs. Yates contended that M. A. Dees, upon satisfying the judgments of Adams & Co. against himself and G. M. Dees, the principal debtor, was subrogated to all the rights of the judgment creditors; that she acquired this right by assignment; that the deed conveying the legal title to Danner & Co. operated as a merger of the mortgage lien; and that Danner & Co. took with notice of the judgments, and subject to the lien of the same. J. C. Strong, the assignee, contended that the right of subrogation did not extend to one who was a party to the execution, and liable as an indorser of the drafts upon which the judgments were rendered; that at the time of the conveyances under which he claimed the record showed that the judgments were satisfied, and that there was nothing, therefore, to notify purchasers of the continued existence of the said judgments. The court decreed that the assignee, Strong, was entitled to the balance of the purchase money due by W. K. and J. W. Mead. Mrs. Yates appeals. Reversed.

T. W. Brame, for appellants. C. H. Wood and H. Bloomfield, for appellees.

WOODS, J. Section 998, Code 1880, by its terms subrogates a surety paying a judgment against the principal debtor to all the rights of the judgment creditor, including that of enforcing all the liens which the judgment creditor had by virtue of such judgment. It was intimated in Dibrell v. Dandridge, 51 Miss. 55, that a similar statute in the Code of 1871 did not cover cases in which indorsers had made payment for the principal debtor of a judgment jointly rendered against the debtor and the indorser. But, as we suppose, to meet this opinion of the court in Dibrell v. Dandridge, section 1140 of the Code of 1880 extends the benefits of section 998, Code 1880, to any party to an execution who shall pay it, against any other party to it who is liable to such party for the sum paid. It seems clear, therefore, that M. A. Dees, by operation of law, immediately upon paying and satisfying the judgments of John I. Adams & Co. against G. M. Dees, the principal debtor, was subrogated to all the rights of the judgment creditors. This subrogation took place, as we have said, immediately on payment by the indorser, and by operation of law. No entry of record of the fact of payment by the indorser was required to be made; and the entry of satisfaction on the execution docket and judgment roll by simply writing the word "Settled" is not ground for refusing subrogation to the indorser, M. A. Dees, who is clearly shown to have satisfied the judgments; such entry not having been made at the instance or under the direction of the indorser. The fact of payment by the indorser was not a matter requiring to be put to record, and the failure of the record to show this fact does not affect the rights of the indorser who paid the judgment. It is insisted, however, by counsel for appellees, that any judgment lien which M. A. Dees acquired by his subrogation to the rights of the judgment creditors on the lands embraced in this controversy cannot be enforced by sale under execution, because the deed of conveyance of July 14, 1881, was taken by Danner & Co. (through whom appellees trace title) in payment and satisfaction of a pre-existing lien created by a mortgage from G. M. Dees to Danner & Co., made in February, 1880, and that the mortgagees had the right to take the mortgaged estate in good faith, in satisfaction and settlement of the pre-existing debt secured by the mortgage. Granting the correctness of the general proposition, it is true, nevertheless, that in the present litigation it was incumbent upon those asserting this right in Danner & Co. to show that they so dealt with the mortgaged estate, in taking to themselves absolute title to the same, as not to injure or destroy rights of junior lienors. In other words, the burden was upon Danner & Co., or, more properly speaking, upon those claiming under them, to show the amount due upon the mortgage debt at the time of taking an absolute conveyance to the property, to show the value of the property at the time; to show that the debt was equal in amount to the value of the mortgaged estate; that the equity of redemption was valueless, and hence that no harm came from such acquisition of absolute title to the junior judgment creditors. This burden the appellees have not successfully borne. Moreover, the absolute conveyance of July 14, 1881, on its face, the antecedent agreement between Danner & Co. and G. M. Dees of July 9, 1881, and the evidence generally, demonstrate that the conveyance of the absolute title was not made solely to pay and satisfy the mortgage debt, but that it was made in pursuance of a plan to settle all indebtedness of every character due from G. M. Dees to Danner & Co. in consideration of the surrender and extinguishment of such indebtedness by Danner & Co., and the payment of an unknown sum of money by Danner & Co. for G. M. Dees to certain named and unnamed creditors of Dees. The decree of the court below is reversed, and a decree will be entered here in favor of M. L. Yates.

PAXTON v. VALLEY LAND CO.

TAX-TITLES—LEVEE BOARD—ADVERSE POSSESSION—DEED FROM STATE.

1. Act Miss. March 1, 1875, known as the "Abatement Act," allowing delinquent owners of land sold for taxes to pay one year's taxes for 1874 as the price of relinquishment of all the state's claim on the land for the past, failing in which the land was to be sold as prescribed, did not, by its mere approval, divest the title of the state or levee board; but if the owner did not pay the taxes for 1874, and the land was not sold under the act, it remained unaffected by the act, and continued to be held as before.

2. Land in Mississippi was sold for taxes in 1870, and conveyed to the levee board. Afterwards, in 1881, under the decree of the chancery court of Hinds county in the suit of Gibbs v. Green, 54 Miss. 592, it was sold to one G., who conveyed to E. Upon the latter's failure to pay taxes it was, in 1883, sold to the state. In 1884, under Act March 14, 1884, (Acts, p. 182,) authorizing and directing the auditor of public accounts to deliver to all purchasers of lands in the liquidating levee district sold under the decree in Gibbs v. Green, and to all persons claiming under them, a quitclaim deed of the title of the state to such lands, upon payment of taxes up to the date of the deed, the land was conveyed by quitclaim deed by the auditor to E. In 1888, under Act March 2, 1888, (Acts, p. 40,) authorizing a similar conveyance by the auditor, a quitclaim deed was made by him to E.'s grantee. Held that, even though the sale in 1883, on E.'s failure to pay the taxes, was void, the deeds by the auditor, in 1884 and 1888, gave the grantees therein a perfect title, and divested any title the former delinquent owner may have had.

3. One claiming title to land which has been sold for taxes cannot invoke the statute of limitations, unless he has been in possession of the land for the statutory period.

4. Code Miss. 1880, § 562, requiring the auditor to make a statement, on each conveyance by him to a person redeeming or purchasing land sold for taxes, of the amount of taxes and damages, and the amount of his fee and commissions, does not apply to quitclaim deeds from the auditor under the acts of March 14, 1884, and March 2, 1888, authorizing and directing the auditor to execute and deliver to all purchasers of lands in the liquidating levee district, sold under the decree of the chancery court of Hind's county in the suit of Gibbs v. Green, 54 Miss. 592, and to all persons claiming under them, a quitclaim deed of the title of the state to such lands, upon the payment of the taxes up to the date of the deed.

Appeal from chancery court, Sunflower county; W. R. GRIGG, Chancellor.

Bill by the Valley Land Company against A. J. Paxton to quiet its title to certain land. Judgment for complainant. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chapman & Paxton and Calhoon & Green, for appellant. Nugent & McWillie and Frank Johnston, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. Sections 5 and 6, the subject of this suit, were acquired in fee-simple by the appellant in 1846, and belong to him now, if his title has not been divested. The lands were in their natural state, undisturbed by man, without any sort of occupancy, until 1888. Because of their liability to inundation from the Mississippi river annually, they were esteemed of little value, comparatively, and unsuited to cultivation, until the past few years, during which the levees have given promise of protection; and because of this they were not settled upon, and during all these years the taxes on them were not paid. In the early part of the year 1888 the appellant made an actual entry upon the land, and commenced to improve it, by clearing and building; and about that time A. G. Paxton, son of the appellant, applied to the auditor of public accounts to purchase or redeem the land, offering to pay any dues, in order to effect this; and he was informed that the state did not claim the land, and thereupon he petitioned for a mandamus to compel a conveyance by the auditor, which proceeding, having begun, is still pending, not having been actively prosecuted. Because of the non-payment of taxes, in 1859, section 5 was sold for taxes, and conveyed to Whitehead; and in 1860 part of section 6 was sold and conveyed to the treasurer of the levee board; and on July 1, 1867, both sections were sold for taxes, and conveyed to the state of Mississippi; and on May 11, 1870, both sections were sold for taxes, and conveyed to the levee board; and October 3, 1881, they were sold and conveyed by the commissioners invested with the title of the levee board, and acting in accordance with a decree of the chancery court of Hinds county, in the case of Joshua Green and others against Hemingway and Gibbs, to E. C. Gordon, who conveyed them to Evers, who conveyed to Burroughs, who conveyed to Prentiss, who conveyed to Mrs. Prentiss, who conveyed to the appellee. In March, 1883, these lands were sold for taxes delinquent for 1882, and conveyed to the state of Mississippi; and in May, 1884, the auditor of public accounts executed a quitclaim of the title of the state to these sections of land to Evers, in pursuance of an act of the legislature of Mississippi entitled "An act for the benefit of purchasers of levee lands," etc., approved March 14, 1884, (Acts, p. 182;)[1] and in August, 1888, the auditor, acting in obedience to an act entitled "An act to quiet and settle the title to certain lands," etc., approved March 2, 1888, (Acts, p. 40,)[2] executed a deed conveying to George Prentiss (named above) the state's title to the above described lands. On March 1, 1875, was approved an act, familiar to the bench and bar of this state, by the name of the "Abatement Act," (Acts 1875, p. 11.) The two sections involved in this suit, being held by the state for taxes by its purchase July 1, 1867, were subject to the provisions of that act, and liable to be sold under it, but were not sold.

The appellee (complainant in the suit) has vested in it whatever title the commissioners of the levee board or the state of Mississippi could convey by their several conveyances; and the important question is whether either had a title to transmit. The tax-deeds of 1859 and 1860 may be dismissed from consideration. If those sales were void, as claimed by Paxton, as probably they were, that disposes of them; but, if valid, the subsequent sale to the state, July 1, 1867, renders their further consideration unnecessary. The title acquired by the state by the sale, July 1, 1867, was perfected by the lapse of five years from the date of the sale, by virtue of the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of titles to lands held and claimed under tax-sale and tax-titles," approved February 10, 1860, (Acts 1859–60, p. 213, § 8.) Sigman v. Lundy, 66 Miss. 522, 6 South. Rep. 245. The sale for taxes in 1870 to the levee board need not be further considered. If void, as affirmed by the appellant, that disposes of it; and if valid, or if the perfecting effect of five years after the sale, by virtue of the act of February 10, 1860, be ascribed to it, or if the completion of the five years, whereby the state's title acquired July 1, 1867, was rendered unassailable, operated as a merger of the claim of the levee board by its purchase May 11, 1870, the result is the same. If the levee board had title, or if the state had, the appellee acquired it. The abatement act did not, by its mere approval, divest the title of the state or levee board. It does not release title. It abates or remits all taxes for years prior to 1874, and, where land was dealt with and disposed of under it, any former title of the state or levee board was gone; but, if from any cause land held and subject to disposition under this act was not disposed of, it was unaffected, and continued to be held as before. The purpose of the act was to induce delinquent owners to pay one year's taxes as the price of relinquishment of all claim on the land for the past, failing in which the land was to be sold as prescribed; but the state did not, by this act of grace, renounce its title or reinvest the delinquent owner with it. It sought to induce him, by liberal terms, to come forward and pay the small part due for years of delinquency, and declared a purpose to sell the land and acquire a new title, if he did not pay, as proposed, but he could not claim anything, by virtue of the act, except by compliance with its terms. The title of sections 5 and 6 was not affected by the abatement act, and remained as before.

The liquidating levee commissioners, exercising their power under the law, and with the sanction of the chancery court, which had intervened, in the interest of creditors, in Gibbs v. Green, 54 Miss. 592, sold and conveyed the two sections on October 3, 1881, to Gordon, as stated above, and he conveyed to Evers, who failed to pay taxes for 1882, and the lands were sold to the state for this delinquency March 5, 1883, and were afterwards, in 1884 and in 1888, severally conveyed by the state, through its auditor of public accounts, for the purpose, plainly declared by the acts authorizing the conveyances, of perfecting the title acquired by the conveyance of the levee commissioners. The tax-sale of March 5, 1883, was void according to the averment of the appellant, and the purchase by Evers, and the conveyance to him by the auditor, the appellant claims, was a redemption of the land. Accepting these views, it follows that the tax-sale of 1883 may be put entirely out of view, and that by the combined operation of the conveyances of the levee commissioners and the auditor of public accounts the appellee got a perfect title to these lands, which were lost to their former owner, the appellant, by his delinquency in not paying the taxes on them.

The defense of the statute of limitations of 10 years, invoked by the appellant, is effectually disposed of by the fact that until 1888 he had no such possession of the land or any part of it as to set the statute in motion. Tush-Ho-Yo-Tubby v. Barr, 41 Miss. 52. The conveyance by the auditor, under the act of 1884, was not invalid for failure to collect taxes for 1881 on the land, for none were due; and section 562 of the Code of 1880[3] has no application to the deeds by the auditor under the acts of 1884 and 1888. It applies to conveyances contemplated by section 561. We fail to discover how the several decisions of this court, set forth in the answer of the appellant to the bill, can avail anything in his behalf in this case. It is his misfortune not to have anticipated the announcement in Sigman v. Lundy, plainly foreshadowed by earlier decisions, in time to have prevented the bar of five years, by paying what was required to clear his title; but this court was not precluded from applying a statute designed for the purpose of curing irregularities in a tax-sale, because of the fatal effects on delinquent land-owners who for years experimented as to the value of tax-sales. Sigman v. Lundy is new in the instance merely, not in principle. It did not overrule any former decision, or announce any new principle, or contravene any judicial utterance. It, for the first time, declared the effect of the act of February 10, 1860, and applied it, because never before had the court been called on to do so. We regret that during the many years elapsed, and the many opportunities afforded, the owner did not free his lands from all claim except his own; but the title, lost by delinquency and neglect, has been securely vested in another, and it must be upheld. Affirmed.

[1] Act Miss. March 14, 1884, (Acts, p. 182,) authorized and directed the auditor of public accounts to execute and deliver to all purchasers of lands in the liquidating levee district under the decree of the chancery court of Hinds county in the suit of Gibbs v. Green, and to those claiming under them, a quitclaim deed of the title of the state to such lands, upon payment of all state, county, and levee taxes up to the date of execution of the deed.

[2] Act March 2, 1888, (Acts, p. 40,) authorized a similar conveyance by the auditor.

[3] Code Miss. 1880, § 562, requires the auditor to make a statement, on each conveyance by him to a person redeeming or purchasing land sold for taxes, of the amount of taxes, and damages thereon, and the amount of his fee and commissions.

ROBINSON v. JONES.

PARTITION — MISTAKE — REFORMATION OF DEED — BONA FIDE PURCHASERS — ESTOPPEL — RENTS — ACCOUNTING.

1. The heirs of R., who died intestate leaving lands in Mississippi and Alabama, partitioned the lands, but by mistake omitted all mention of 80 acres which by the agreement were allotted to complainant. The writing was not recorded. All the lands allotted to complainant were in Mississippi, and all of those allotted to J., one of the heirs, were in Alabama. Another of the heirs sold to J. the lands which had been allotted him in Mississippi, but included in the deed the 80 acres allotted to complainant. J. then, by a conveyance in severalty, deeded to defendant, as security, both the lands which had been allotted and deeded to him. Thereafter J. conveyed the Mississippi lands to defendant in payment of the debt thereby secured. Subsequently, in a suit in Alabama over the lands in that state conveyed by J. to defendant, to which suit defendant and all the heirs of R. were parties, the partition proceedings were shown, and the mistake therein relative to the 80 acres. The court then subjected the whole interest in the Alabama lands to the payment of J.'s debt to defendant, and decreed that the 80 acres in Mississippi should be assured to complainant. Held, that defendant, by taking a decree for the entire interest in the Alabama land, knowing that complainant had an interest therein unless it passed to J. by the act of partition, ratified the partition, and could not resist complainant's suit to have the mistake corrected.

2. Where the owner of land takes on himself the burden of proving exactly what sums have been received therefrom by one who, without title, but in good faith, has occupied it, he is entitled to recover such sums in discharge of his claim for rents.

Cross-appeals from chancery court, Noxubee county; T. B. GRAHAM, Chancellor.

Suit by William Robinson, non compos mentis, by his guardian, against Winston Jones, to correct a mistake in a written agreement of partition, to remove clouds from complainant's title to land, to obtain possession, and for an account of the money received for rent. There was a decree for complainant, but from so much of it as related to the manner of accounting for the rents complainant appealed. Defendant took a cross-appeal. Affirmed except as to rents.

Complainant, by his guardian, James P. Robinson together with the other heirs of William Robinson, Sr., who died intestate leaving lands in Alabama and Mississippi, entered into an agreement for the partition of the lands. By mistake 40 acres of the land intended to be allotted to complainant were omitted from the preliminary agreement furnished the scrivener, and by his mistake another 40 acres, which should have been allotted complainant, were omitted from the final articles of agreement, and no mention of either 40 acres was made therein. The agreement, moreover, was not recorded. All the lands allotted to and intended to be allotted to complainant were in Mississippi, while those allotted to his guardian, James P. Robinson, individually, were in Alabama. Charles T. Robinson, another heir, to whom lands in Mississippi had been allotted, sold them to James, and included in the conveyance the 80 acres intended to have been allotted to complainant. James then conveyed the lands allotted to him, together with those deeded to him by Charles, to Jones & Co. as security. Thereafter he deeded to Jones & Co. the Mississippi lands in payment of the debt they secured. Subsequently Jones & Co. began foreclosure proceedings in Alabama against the land in that state conveyed them as security. In connection therewith all of the heirs of William Robinson, Sr., filed a bill in equity, claiming that on account of inequalities in the partition they had a prior lien on the lands for such excess. After allowance of this, the balance was decreed to Jones & Co. The decree also attempted to correct the mistake made in the partition of the Mississippi lands. The defendant claims through Jones & Co. For former opinion on demurrer, see Robinson v Jones, 65 Miss. 520, 5 South. Rep. 102.

Rives & Rives and George G. Dillard, for appellant. A. C. Bogle and W. H. Bogle, for appellee and cross-appellant Jones.

COOPER, J. We concur with the chancellor in his finding that the facts in evidence establish the mistake arising in the agreement for partition of the lands of William Robinson, deceased, and that the lands in controversy were, and were intended to be, allotted to the appellant, but that a mistake was made in preparing the written agreement, by reason of which these lands were not described among those allotted to him. This being true, it follows that the writing should be corrected, so that it may express the true agreement, unless the present holder is a bona fide purchaser of the land. Without reference to that portion of the testimony which consists of evidence of notice in pais to Jones, we are of opinion that he cannot sustain the position of a bona fide purchaser for this reason: He accepted from James P. Robinson, who was his debtor, and who was one of the heirs at law of William Robinson, deceased, a conveyance in severalty in fee of certain lands in this state, (including the lands now in controversy,) and of others in the state of Alabama, in trust, to secure certain debts then due him by the said James P. Robinson. The Mississippi lands were afterwards conveyed by said Robinson to Jones in payment of the debt they secured, and a litigation arose over the lands in Alabama. In that suit all the heirs at law of William Robinson, deceased, were parties, and it was there made to appear that the whole estate had been divided, and that only by virtue of the partition could Jones claim the entire interest in the lands mortgaged to him by J. P. Robinson. Aside from the partition, James P. Robinson was only a tenant in common with the other heirs, in consequence of which Jones found himself in such position that he must either claim the whole interest in the lands under the partition, or only the undivided one-fifth interest which descended to his debtor as heir at law. Before final decree he was informed by the pleadings and proof that the mistake to correct which the present bill is exhibited had been made in the act of partition. In truth, the court in Alabama, by its decree subjecting the whole interest in the lands mortgaged to the payment of Jones' debt, also decreed that the lands now claimed by the non compos mentis in this state should be assured to him. It is insisted for Jones that the court in Alabama had no power to make any decree in reference to lands in Mississippi, and also that it was not sought by that proceeding to correct any error in the act of partition. However this may be, it yet remains true that Jones has secured in Alabama a decree against the whole interest in the lands in that state mortgaged to him by J. P. Robinson, with full knowledge of the fact that the one-fifth interest therein belonged to the present complainant, unless it passed to James P. Robinson by the act of partition, and he also knew that in the partition a mistake had occurred as to the Mississippi lands, the result of which would be, if uncorrected, that the non compos mentis would fail to get a part of the lands for which he had yielded his interest in those in Alabama. It would be contrary to the plainest principles of justice to permit Jones, with full knowledge of the facts, to take, because of the partition, the interest in the Alabama lands which had descended to the present complainant, and then hold the lands in this state against the partition. Having acted in reference to a part of the subject of the partition, and derived advantage from it to the detriment of the non compos, he must be held as ratifying the whole act, and can occupy no better relation to the land here than could James P. Robinson if the title yet remained in him.

The court erred in applying the rule announced in Staton v. Bryant, 55 Miss. 261, for the measurement of rents to be decreed against the defendant in possession. The rule there announced was for the protection of one who, without title, occupied in good faith the lands of another, believing himself to be the owner, and against whom the plaintiff seeks to recover the reasonable rental value of the property. The manifest hardship of compelling a defendant in such attitude to respond for what the lands might have rented for, in the absence of evidence as to what they were actually rented for, led the court to announce the rule there formulated, the justice of which commends it for application in all similar cases. But the rule is applicable only where the demand for rents is in the nature of a quantum meruit. It has no place where, as here, the complainant takes upon himself the burden of showing exactly what sums have been received by the defendant, and is content to receive them in discharge of his claim. It cannot be unjust to compel restoration of what has been actually received, for the defendant is but restoring to the complainant his own, and this is the end and purpose of remedial justice. Decree affirmed, except as to rents, on which it is reversed and remanded, to be further proceeded with in the court below.

LIMITATIONS—ACTIONS AGAINST DISSOLVED PARTNERSHIP—APPLICATION OF ASSETS—PAYMENT OF DEBTS—WAIVER OF RIGHT.

1. A partner made a will, which, after providing for the payment of all the testator's debts, gave the entire residue of the property to his copartner. The will contained no provision authorizing the continuance of the business after the testator's death, nor any express waiver of the testator's right to have the partnership effects applied to the payment of the partnership debts. Held not a waiver of the said right.

2. Code Ala. 1886, § 2604, makes the obligation of a judgment against two or more persons, or of any joint promise in writing, several as well as joint. Section 2605 provides that one of several partners may be sued for the obligation of all. Held that, where one partner dies, and suit is brought by a creditor against the survivor as an individual, this does not preclude him from afterwards asserting his claim against the partnership, on the theory of his having elected to treat the said claim as an individual indebtedness; and the fact that another claim was joined in the action, for which the deceased partner was not liable, can make no difference.

3. Code Ala. 1886, § 2632, provides that the time between the death of a person and the grant of letters testamentary, not exceeding six months, is not to be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of actions by or against his executor. Section 2268 provides that no suit shall be commenced against an executor as such until six months after the grant of letters testamentary. Held, in an action by a creditor against a surviving partner to subject land to the payment of partnership debts, that, inasmuch as the right of creditors to sue is the same as that of the survivors or executors of the deceased partners to compel a settlement, the right is not barred by lapse of time until the said right of the partners would be barred; and that, inasmuch as the estate of a deceased partner must be represented, the case is within section 2633, which provides that the six months during which an executor is exempt from suit after the grant of letters is not to be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of an action against him.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

This was a bill by Meyer I. Goldsmith against Eichold Bros. & Weiss and others to subject land, which had been used and occupied by the firm of A. & B. Moog, to the payment of the debts of said firm. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chamberlain & Richardson, for appellant. Pillans, Torrey & Hannaw, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. In the authorized American edition of Lindley on Partnership (volume 1, p. 2) are many definitions of the term "partnership." Perhaps none of them will be found more precisely and comprehensively accurate than that of Chancellor Kent: "A contract of two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, and skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, and to divide the profit and bear the loss in certain proportions." 3 Kent, Comm. 23. To constitute the relation inter sese the contract must extend beyond a common agreement to share in the profits. It must equally bind the parties to bear the burden of the losses. McCrary v. Slaughter, 58 Ala. 230; Couch v. Woodruff, 63 Ala. 466; Mayraut v. Marston, 67 Ala. 453. Partnership is not necessarily an entire merger of the individual, his labor, energy, or estate in the firm. The extent of the merger is determined by the agreement entered into, and the purpose the partners have in view. Anything left out of the partnership agreement and its views, whether it be money, property, labor, or skill, pertains to the individual in as absolute right as if there had been no contract of partnership. The merger of the individual into the firm or company extends to and includes everything embraced, expressly or impliedly, in the terms of the agreement, and to that extent changes the character of his ownership. The individual parts with the separate right and power to manage, direct, and control that of which, before that time, he had been supreme arbiter. His dominion was an integer. It becomes a fraction. He surrenders to the partnership an interest in his property, labor, skill, energy, one or more, as the agreement may bind him, by express or implied stipulations, in consideration of a corresponding surrender, to like extent and for like purposes, by his copartners. The agreement consummated, each partner becomes seised and rightfully possessed of the same interest in and power over whatever has been contributed to the firm by his copartners as he retains in that contributed by himself. This, and no more. These properties of partnership render it eminently a relation of trust. All its effects are held in trust, and each partner is, in one sense, a trustee; a trustee for the newly-created entity,—the partnership,—and for each member of the firm, who thus becomes a beneficiary under the trust. He is more; he is a trustee and a cestui que trust,—a trustee, so far as his own duties bind him; a cestui que trust, so far as duties rest on his copartners. And it is sometimes said that each partner is both a principal and an agent,—a principal, to the extent he represents his own interest, but an agent only so far as he represents his copartners. The first duty devolved by this trust on each of the partners is to apply the partnership effects to the payment of the debts of the partnership, and not to pervert them to individual uses or wants, without the consent of the copartners. Any attempt to so pervert them, whether by private arrangement or under judicial proceedings, can be intercepted by the nonconsenting partners. This on the plain principle that, being beneficiaries under the trust, they have a clear right to prevent its breach. The trust goes further. After discharging all the partnership liabilities, the residuum is still held in trust for partition or distribution among the several partners, according to their several interests; and the same rights and remedies exist to preserve, protect, and secure the proper administration of the trust fund to this end as are given in enforcing the payment of debts. In administering the two remedies noted above, the court simply enforces a trust against property held in trust, and at the suit of one in whose favor the trust is declared to exist. It is only carrying out the intention which influenced the formation of the partnership. Each partner has the right to have the partnership debts paid with partnership effects, so as to relieve his individual property of the burden; and each partner has a clear right to his share of any surplus that may be left after paying the partnership debts. All men will assent to the soundness and justice of the principles stated above.

Partnerships are dissolved in various ways; sometimes by voluntary agreement, and sometimes by a sale from one or more partners to others, or by a sale to strangers. In cases falling under either of these classes there is generally no trust relation preserved, unless it is provided for in the terms of the dissolution or sale. The wants of this case do not require us to discuss this question.

Dissolution takes place also by the death of a member, and by bankruptcy or insolvency. In cases falling within either of these classes the affairs of the partnership are frequently wound up and the effects and estates administered in the courts of justice. Courts always have respect to the fiduciary rights and duties which subsist between partners, and, in the absence of special circumstances to vary the rule, will apply partnership effects primarily to partnership debts. This, because of the trust which subsisted between the parties. Hence, if the death of a member caused the dissolution, the representative or succession to his estate has the clear right to have the partnership effects applied to the payment of partnership debts in preference to the debts of the survivor, and in like preference of any right he may assert to reembark them in trade; and the insolvency of the deceased member does not vary the question. In the administration and settlement of a firm thus dissolved the court will enforce the trust in favor of the deceased or bankrupt member's estate, and apply the assets first to the payment of the partnership debts. Not because of any lien or right the creditor or creditors can assert. They have no such lien or right. It is their debtor's right to have the assets thus applied; and in enforcing that clear right the benefit and preference accrue to the partnership creditor. It is thus that the court of equity, by a process of its own, works out the partnership debtor's quasi lien in the prior payment of the partnership creditor's demand, while he himself has no lien, and can assert no claim to be a beneficiary under the trust. The preferred payment being the result of the copartner's lien, and not of the creditor's, it follows that, if the partner has done any act by which he surrenders his lien, or estops himself from asserting it, the creditor is equally barred or estopped. His quasi lien being, at best, only the resultant of his debtor's lien, of course it cannot exist after the debtor has ceased to have any lien from which it could result. This is axiomatic.

The questions we have been considering have been often and learnedly discussed by courts and by text-writers. Possibly no clearer enunciation of the principles can be found than is shown in the opinion of Justice MATTHEWS in Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369. We cite many authorities bearing on the question, without attempting to collate or classify them. Pierce v. Pass, 1 Port. (Ala.) 232; Reese v. Bradford, 13 Ala. 837; Burwell v. Springfield, 15 Ala. 273; Halstead v. Shepard, 23 Ala. 558; Lang v. Waring, 25 Ala. 625; Offutt v. Scott, 47 Ala. 104; Little v. Snedecor, 52 Ala. 167; Farley v. Moog, 79 Ala. 148; Levy v. The firm of A. & B. Moog was composed of Abraham Moog and Bernard Moog. They were engaged in a mercantile business. They incurred a debt to Meyer I. Goldsmith, January 12, 1884, of $12,500. Abraham Moog died February 23, 1884, having made a will, which, after his death, was probated and established. Bernard Moog was named executor in the will, and relieved of the duty of giving bond as such. He qualified soon after his brother's death. The will contains this clause: "After payment of all my debts, as above provided, I give and devise to my brother, Bernard Moog, all my property of every kind and description, real or personal and mixed," etc., "to have and to hold to him and his heirs, in fee-simple forever." The will contains no authority or power to continue the mercantile business after the death of Abraham Moog. Bernard Moog did continue the business, employing therein the assets of the late firm of A. & B. Moog, until his business was broken up by attachments issued and levied January 12, 1885. In the mean time, on July 1, 1884, he incurred an additional debt to Meyer I. Goldsmith of $6,000. Abraham and Bernard Moog owned valuable real estate, which they used in connection with their business. The titles were made to Abraham Moog and Bernard Moog, their heirs and assigns, without any reference to their partnership name. In September, 1884, B. Moog executed 20 notes, payable to his own order at the Savings Bank of Mobile, each for the sum of $1,250; the first due October 25, 1884, and the others in regular order at intervals of 10 days, the last being due May 4, 1885. Contemporaneously with these notes he executed a deed of trust, conveying said real property to a trustee to secure the payment of said 20 notes. This property was finally disposed of in payment of said notes, and is now held and occupied in part by Eichold Bros. & Weiss, as derivative purchasers under said trust-deed. In January, 1885, Meyer I. Goldsmith instituted suit by original attachment against Bernard Moog for the recovery of his combined claim of $12,500 and of $6,000, and in May, 1885, he received judgment for the amount of the two claims and interest. Out of the property attached, which was personal chattels, he realized less than $500. The residue of the judgment remains wholly unsatisfied, and Bernard Moog is insolvent. The present bill was filed July 9, 1890. It seeks to subject the said real estate which had been used and occupied in the business of A. & B. Moog to the payment of said partnership debt of $12,500. It charges that the said 20 notes, given, as they were, after the firm had been dissolved by the death of Abraham Moog, were the individual debt of Bernard Moog, and hence could not be paid with partnership effects until partnership debts were first paid. There was a demurrer to the bill, which the chancellor sustained, and from that ruling the present appeal is prosecuted.

The defense takes many forms. One contention is that, by giving and devising all his estate and effects to Bernard, the survivor, Abraham clothed him with the individual right and title to all the property of every kind which had belonged to the partnership, and thereby surrendered any lien he may have had to have the partnership effects applied to the payment of partnership debts. We will not say this could not have been done. Possibly a will, containing an express waiver, would have cut off the lien; and possibly, if it had directed or authorized a continuance of the business with the firm effects, and it had been so continued, this would have worked a surrender of the lien by necessary implication; but we need not decide this, as the will contains no such provision. On the contrary, it first directs the payment of all of testator's debts, and gives and devises to Bernard only the residue after the payment of the debts. There is nothing in this contention. It is further contended that by suing Bernard Moog as an individual, and obtaining judgment against him as an individual,—particularly by joining an individual debt of Bernard Moog in the same suit,—Goldsmith has elected to treat his claim as an individual demand, and cannot now be permitted to assert it is a partnership debt. There is nothing in this. After the dissolution of the partnership by the death of Abraham Moog a joint action at law could not be prosecuted against them. Bernard, if sued at all, must needs be sued alone. It cannot make any difference in principle that another claim is joined in the action, for which his deceased partner is not liable. Code 1886, §§ 2604, 2605,[1] and notes.

The defense relies on the statute of limitations of six years. According to the averments of the bill, Bernard Moog qualified as his executor March 22, 1884. This suit was brought July 9, 1890, more than six years after he so qualified. The suit being against the living survivor, it is contended that it was barred under section 2632[2] of the Code. Such it surely would be, if that presented the whole merits of the contention. Bradford v. Spyker, 32 Ala. 134; Brewer v. Browne, 68 Ala. 210; Wells v. Brown, 83 Ala. 161, 3 South. Rep. 439. But it does not. It must be borne in mind that the rights of creditors to sue in a case like this are precisely the right of the survivor, or of the representative of the deceased copartner, to compel a settlement of the copartnership accounts and assets. Till that right is barred by lapse of time the right of creditors is not barred. A suit, then, for the purpose of settling the partnership accounts, must be brought either by the personal representative of the deceased partner against the survivor, or by the survivor against the personal representative of the deceased partner. Instituted in either form, it is necessary that Abraham Moog's estate be represented by a personal representative. This, then, brings the case within section 2633 of the present Code, which provides that "the six months during which an executor or administrator is exempt from suit after the grant of letters is not to be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of an action against him." In section 2263 it is provided that "no suit must be commenced against an executor or administrator, as such, until six months * * * after the grant of letters testamentary or of administration." If Bernard Moog were to sue as surviving partner to have an account and settlement, Abraham Moog's estate must be represented; and, being himself the qualified executor, the appointment of an administrator ad litem for and in the interest of the estate would become a necessity. So, if Bernard Moog were to sue as executor, the same necessity would arise for an administrator ad litem, for Bernard Moog could not represent the two antagonistic interests which would be presented. In either form the six months' exemption from suit must be accorded to the representative of Abraham Moog's estate, and this brings the time less than six years from the death of Abraham Moog. The statute of limitations is no bar to the present action. Steele v. Steele, 67 Ala. 438; Allen v. Elliott, 63 Ala. 432; Espy v. Comer, 76 Ala. 501.

The purpose of this suit being to subject lands to the payment of a partnership liability, it would seem the legal title must be brought before the court. According to the averments of the bill, the undivided half interest in the land is in the heirs at law of Abraham Moog, unless his will in favor of B. Moog changes the rule. We make this suggestion without intending to decide anything in regard to it.

Reversed and remanded.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. PHILYAW et al.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—VERBAL SALE OF LAND — PAYMENT OF PURCHASE PRICE —STALE CLAIMS.

1. In a suit for specific performance of a verbal contract of sale of land, and to enjoin actions arising out of a judgment against complainant in ejectment for the same land, complainant based his rights on possession granted under the verbal contract and on the payment of the price, which he alleged was paid to defendant, P., and that P. executed a receipt therefor. The receipt was made part of the bill, and purported to be signed by P. Held, that a preliminary injunction was properly dissolved on the filing of answer denying that P. executed the receipt, and denying the payment of the price, or any part thereof, as the answer could not be considered evasive by reason of its failure to negative the execution of the receipt by some one authorized to execute it for P.

2. Under Code Ala. § 1782, making verbal contracts for the sale of land void unless the purchase money, or a portion thereof, be paid, and the purchaser be put in possession by the seller, payment after the giving of possession brings it within the exception.

3. A bill for specific performance filed March 24, 1890, is not open to the objection of staleness, which alleges a contract of sale by P. in 1872; possession taken under it, and full payment of the price; actual possession by the vendee for six or seven years, until his removal from the state; his continued claim of the land and payment of the taxes thereon till 1885; his sale of it at that time to the grantor of complainant's lessor, no one in the mean time having been in actual possession; the immediate sale to complainant's lessor, possession being taken at the same time by complainant as lessee, and retained until ousted under judgment in ejectment in favor of P., on March 5, 1890; no adverse claim having been advanced by P. prior to March 4, 1887, from which time complainant was in good faith, as alleged by the bill, asserting its rights in a court of law.

Appeal from chancery court, Escambia county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Suit by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company against J. D. Philyaw and M. F. Brooks for specific performance and an injunction. From a decree dissolving a preliminary injunction complainant appeals. Affirmed.

The bill sought the specific performance of a verbal contract of sale of certain described lands, and to enjoin the prosecution of a suit in the circuit court against the complainant to recover damages for the entry upon and use of the said lands, and an action on the supersedeas bond in an ejectment suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for said land by J. D. Philyaw. The bill alleged that the said Philyaw was the owner of the land in controversy, and that in 1872 he made a verbal contract to sell the land to one George B. Milstead; that he put him in possession, but did not deliver to him any deed, the agreement being that upon the payment of the purchase money a deed should be made to said Milstead; that in 1873 said Milstead paid the purchase money, as is evidenced by a receipt set out in the bill, alleged to have been signed by J. D. Philyaw; that Milstead remained in possession of the land for seven or eight years, and then moved to Florida; that in 1885, while said Milstead still claimed said land, but was not in possession of the same, and had no written title thereto, he sold it by deed to one Barrett, and on the same day said Barrett conveyed it by deed to the Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company, which company took possession, and put the complainant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, into possession; that complainant occupied said land as tenant of the Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company until August 13, 1888, when the said Philyaw brought an action of ejectment against the complainant for the recovery of said land; that said railroad company, in defense of said suit in ejectment, relied upon adverse possession, but said suit resulted in a judgment in favor of Philyaw, which judgment was afterwards affirmed by this court on appeal in December, 1889. Thereafter, on January 8, 1890, Philyaw brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to recover damages for the entry upon and use of said land; and on January 2, 1890, M. F. Brooks, for the use of said Philyaw, brought suit against said company and its sureties on the supersedeas bond given by said company, to secure the appeal in the ejectment case. The bill then prayed that the said J. D. Philyaw be enjoined from prosecuting his said suit to recover damages against the railroad company for said land, and also that the said M. F. Brooks be enjoined from further prosecuting the suit brought by him for use of said Philyaw, to recover damages upon the supersedeas bond; and that the said J. D. Philyaw be ordered to make a deed conveying the said lands to the Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company. Both the respondents filed answers to the bill, and denied all the material allegations as averred therein. The said J. D. Philyaw denied that Milstead had ever paid the purchase money for the land, or that he had ever given him a receipt therefor, and stated positively that he did not sign the receipt set out in the bill. Upon the denials to the answer, the respondents moved to dissolve the injunction; and also demurred to the bill on the ground of laches on the part of the complainant, and those through whom it claimed title, and for the want of equity. The respondents also moved to dismiss the bill for the want of equity.

Jones & Falkner, for appellant. Watts & Son and J. W. Posey, for appellees.

MCCLELLAN, J. This cause was submitted for decree below on demurrers to the bill, motion to dismiss for want of equity, and motion to dissolve the injunction. Something is said in the opinion of the chancellor upon the matters involved in the demurrers, and also upon the general sufficiency of the bill; but no decree was passed either upon the demurrers or upon the motion to dismiss the bill. The only decree rendered went solely upon the motion to dissolve, and dissolving, the injunction, and the chancellor's conclusion and action in that regard alone can be reviewed on this appeal.

We think the injunction was properly dissolved on the denials of the answer of Philyaw. The case made by the bill depended upon the fact of payment, as therein alleged, of the purchase money of the land, the subject-matter of the litigation, by Milstead to Philyaw. This is the pivotal fact in the complainant's right; and this fact, as we read the answer, is, over and over again, denied circumstantially and directly, and without, to our minds, any evasion or equivocation. The receipt made a part of the bill purports to be signed by Philyaw in person, and to evidence the payment of purchase money for land by Milstead to him. The averment is that its execution was by Philyaw. The answer roundly denies that he executed it, and, further, as we have seen, sets forth that Milstead had not paid the purchase money or any part of it. We cannot concur with counsel, in view of all these denials, that Philyaw's failure to negative the execution of the receipt by another, authorized thereto for him, excites suspicion, and stamps his answer as evasive. He met and denied the averment as made, and he alleged the fact of non-payment throughout in such way as to preclude the idea, not only that payment had been made to him personally, but also that payment had been made by Milstead to another for him.

The contract between Milstead and Philyaw, as laid in the bill, is brought within the exception to the statute of frauds, with respect to the sale of land, by the averments that Milstead was let into possession at the time of the sale, and soon afterwards paid the purchase money in full. We do not understand that the statutory exception contemplates or requires a payment of purchase money contemporaneous with the letting into possession. Code, § 1732; Powell v. Higley, 90 Ala. 103, 7 South. Rep. 440.

The bill, in our opinion, was not open to the objection of staleness, as seems to have been supposed by the chancellor. It alleges a contract of sale in 1872, possession taken under it, and full payment of the purchase money; that the vendee remained in actual possession for six or seven years, and then removed from the state, and continued to claim the land and to pay taxes on it until 1885, when he sold and conveyed it to a third party, no one in the mean time being in actual possession of the land; that his vendee at once sold and conveyed the land to the Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company, and that complainant, as the tenant of said company, immediately took possession of it, and retained it until ousted under judgment in ejectment in favor of Philyaw on March 5, 1890. This bill was filed March 24, 1890. It appears that no claim adverse to the equitable title of complainant and those through whom it claims was advanced by Philyaw prior to March 4, 1887. Until such claim was made no laches short of a delay of 20 years can be imputed to the vendee or those succeeding to his equity. The delay subsequent to the assertion of the claim by Philyaw was only for about three years; and during all this time the complainant was in good faith, it is alleged, asserting its rights in a court of law. We are clear to the conclusion that the bill is not open to the objection of staleness. This and the preceding point have been considered because the conclusion of the chancellor on the motion to dissolve the injunction appears to be rested upon them as well as upon the denials of the answer. The decree can be supported only on the last consideration. The objections to the bill are without merit. Affirmed.

HAWES v. RUCKER.

EXECUTION SALE — EJECTMENT — DEFENSES — INSTRUCTIONS—RES JUDICATA.

1. A sheriff's deed of land sold on execution after the return-day of the execution under which the levy was made is void.

2. The evidence for defendant in ejectment showed that the land was bought in 1857, and occupied up to 1867 by defendant's grandmother, when his father went into possession under direction of the grandmother, who claimed and exercised acts of ownership over it; that she afterwards put defendant in possession, and in 1888 conveyed the same to his father. Held that, as the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, defendant's request for a general affirmative charge in his behalf should have been granted.

3. A judgment of ejectment in a prior action against defendant's father while holding under direction of the grandmother would not estop defendant from claiming title, where neither he nor his grandmother was a party to such prior action.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; JOHN B. TALLEY, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Thomas G. Rucker against Monroe Hawes. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The evidence for the defendant tended to show that the land sued for was purchased from one Monday about the year 1856 or 1857, and was thereafter occupied by Jefferson Hawes, the grandfather of defendant, and his wife, Mary Hawes, who was afterwards Mrs. Marshall; that they occupied the land "off and on" from the time of the alleged purchase up to the time of Mrs. Marshall's death; that about the year 1867, under the direction of Mrs. Marshall, George W. Hawes went into the possession of the property, but that Mrs. Marshall still claimed and exercised acts of ownership over the property, and that a short time before her death Mrs. Marshall moved back upon the land, and remained in possession until she was dispossessed by the writ of possession at the instance of the plaintiff in this suit; that, after being so dispossessed of the land, she again moved back upon the premises, and placed the defendant to this suit in possession, and that the defendant remained in possession under her until June, 1888, when she executed a deed of gift of the property to George W. Hawes; and that the defendant, at the time the present suit was instituted, held possession under G. W. Hawes.

Martin & Bouldin, for appellant. J. E. Brown, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. Plaintiff, who is appellee, derives title to the land sued for by purchase at a sale made by the sheriff under execution issued on a judgment rendered in his favor against George W. Hawes in March, 1879. The execution under which the sale was made was issued April 5, 1884, and levied on the 16th of July thereafter, on the land in controversy by Thomas Robinson, then sheriff of Jackson county. His term of office having expired, the execution came to the hands of his successor, by whom the land was sold, and deed made to plaintiff. The only evidence of the sale consists of the recitals in the sheriff's deed. From these recitals it appears that the land was sold under the execution November 3, 1884, at which sale plaintiff became the purchaser, to whom the sheriff executed a conveyance on the same day. The sale was made after the return-day of the execution. If conceded that when an execution is levied on real estate by a sheriff whose term of office expires before a sale of the property the sale may be legally made by his successor, such sale must be made before the return-day of the writ. It is well settled in this state that a sheriff has no power to sell land under an execution after the return-day of the writ. If he makes a sale afterwards, without a revival of his authority by some new process, such sale passes no title to the purchaser. Whatever may be the rule as to the authority of the sheriff to sell personal property after the return-day of the execution which he had levied when it was in force, in respect to real estate the rule above stated has been too firmly established to be controverted or doubted. Morgan v. Ramsey, 15 Ala. 190; Smith v. Mundy, 18 Ala. 182. This rule has become a rule of property in this state, from which it would be unwise to depart.

Plaintiff also offered in evidence the record of an action instituted by him against George W. Hawes and others in the circuit court of Jackson county to recover the land sued for, in which action he recovered judgment against the defendants therein, and was put in possession under a writ of possession issued on the judgment. Plaintiff contends that these proceedings and the judgment estop defendant, who is the son of George W. Hawes, from setting up title to the lands in suit. Neither defendant nor his grandmother, Mary Marshall, under whom he claims to hold possession, was a party to this suit. The settled rule at common law is that a judgment in ejectment does not confer title upon the party in whose favor it is given, and is not evidence in a subsequent action even between the same parties. Camp v. Forrest, 13 Ala. 114. Section 2714 of the Code provides: "Two judgments in favor of the defendant in an action of ejectment or in the nature of an action of ejectment between the same parties, in which the same title is put in issue, is a bar to any action for the recovery of the land, or any part thereof, between the same parties or their privies, founded on the same title." Except as thus changed by statute, the common-law rule prevails. A judgment in ejectment against a tenant is not evidence against the landlord, unless he was admitted to defend, or joined with the tenant in making defense, notwithstanding he may be subject to be dispossessed by the writ of possession against the tenant if he receives possession from the tenant pendente lite. Smith v. Gayle, 58 Ala. 600. Neither the sale of the land under the execution and the sheriff's deed nor the recovery in the former action of ejectment conferred or passed any title to plaintiff. As in ejectment, or in the corresponding statutory real action, the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of defendant's, when no relation exists creating an estoppel of defendant's denial of plaintiff's title, the affirmative charge requested by defendant, on the undisputed evidence, should have been given. This conclusion renders unnecessary consideration of the other questions involved. Reversed and remanded.

COLLIER et al. v. DAVIS et al.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—APPOINTMENT OF AGENTS—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS.

1. Act Ala. Feb. 28, 1887, provides that no foreign corporation shall do business within the state unless it has a known place of business therein, and an agent thereat, and makes it a penal offense for any agent of such corporation, which has not complied with the act, to act as agent for such corporation. Held, that to bring an agent within the inhibition of the statute the act of agency must be done within the state.

2. Plaintiffs sought to recover for services rendered in negotiating a loan for defendants. The complaint did not show where the agreement with defendants was made, nor from whom the money was to be obtained. Defendants pleaded that the loan and contract of borrowing were to be made with a foreign corporation, which had no known place of business within the state, with an agent thereat, and that plaintiffs were the agents of such corporation. Held, that the plea was bad in not averring that the contract with plaintiffs was made in Alabama. Dudley v. Collier, 87 Ala. 431, 6 South. Rep. 304, distinguished.

Appeal from circuit court, Lowndes county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Action by Collier & Pinckard against Davis Bros. to recover on a contract for services in negotiating a loan. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Roquemore, White & McKenzie and W. R. Houghton, for appellants. Watts & Son, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. On February 28, 1887, the act was approved "to give force and effect to section four of article fourteen of the constitution of the state of Alabama." Sess. Acts, 102. Under that statute it is required that "every company, corporation, or association now organized under the laws of Alabama," before engaging in any business in this state, shall have at least one known place of business, and an agent thereat. The statute prescribes in what manner the place of business and the name of the agent shall be made known. The statute then makes it a penal offense for any agent of a foreign corporation, which has not complied with this constitutional and statutory provision, to do any act of agency for such corporation. Of course, to fall within this statutory inhibition, the act of agency must be done within the state of Alabama, for otherwise neither the corporation, nor the agent, nor any act done by either, could be amenable to our laws. The complaint in this case, while it sets forth that the agreement sued on was entered into after February 28, 1887,—the date of the statute,—does not state where the alleged agreement was made; nor does it show from whom they undertook to obtain the money which Davis Bros. engaged them to borrow for them. Neither does it show from whom or where they succeeded in obtaining the promised loan. There is nothing in the complaint which gives notice that the constitutional provision and statute referred to above exert any influence in the decision of the questions presented in this record. Plea marked "K," interposed by Davis Bros., and demurrers to it, interposed by Collier & Pinckard, raise the only question presented. The circuit court overruled the demurrer. Plea K sets up in bar of the action that the loan and contract of borrowing were to be made with a foreign corporation; that such corporation had no known place of business in Alabama, with an agent thereat; that the corporation from which the money was to be obtained was "The American Freehold Mortgage Company of London, Limited," and that Collier & Pinckard were in fact the agents of the corporation. If the complaint or plea had averred or shown that the agreement between Collier & Pinckard, on the one side, and Davis Bros., on the other, was entered into in Alabama, then it would have been shown that a foreign corporation, through its agent, or the agent of a foreign corporation, had engaged in business, or transacted business, in Alabama, without a compliance with our constitution and statute. This would have made the agreement illegal and non-enforceable. There is nothing, however, to show that such was the case. It is perfectly consistent with every averment of the pleadings that the agreement declared on was executed outside of the state of Alabama; and if Collier & Pinckard were not agents of the corporation, then there is nothing stated that is incompatible with the idea that the loan was to be negotiated outside of Alabama's limits. The situs of the security offered is not necessarily determinative of that inquiry, although it may be a factor to be considered. We are referred to the fact that the plea we have pronounced faulty is a copy of the one decided by this court to be sufficient in Dudley v. Collier, 87 Ala. 431, 6 South. Rep. 304. That suit was on a contract similar to the one declared on in this case. The report of that case does not inform us what were the averments of the complaint. It may have shown on its face that the agreement declared on was executed in Alabama. If it did, the ruling was clearly correct. With the exception of what we have stated, we reaffirm all that was said in Dudley v. Collier. Reversed and remanded.

SEABOARD MANUF'G CO. v. WOODSON.

MASTER AND SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER —PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Code Ala. § 2590, subd. 1, which makes a master liable for an injury to a servant occasioned by defective machinery, provided that such defect arose from or was not discovered by reason of the master's negligence, a complaint which alleges that plaintiff's injury was occasioned by a defect which was "known" to the defendant, or which could have been known by the exercise of reasonable diligence, is not sufficient, in the absence of any further allegation of negligence, for the reason that the defendant, after discovering the defect, must have had a reasonable time to remedy it before it could be said to be negligent.

2. Under said section 2590, subd. 2, which makes the master liable when the injury is occasioned by reason of the negligence of any other servant who has any superintendence intrusted to him, a complaint which alleges that the plaintiff, while engaged as a fireman on one of defendant's engines, was injured by reason of the negligence of the foreman, who was intrusted with superintendence over the plaintiff and over the said engine, in allowing it to be and remain in the defective condition therein described, is sufficient.

3. Plaintiff, a railway fireman, alleged, in an action against the company for personal injuries, that the engine on which he was engaged was in a defective condition, and that D. was defendant's foreman, having charge and control thereof. Defendant denied the allegations. Held, that an instruction that "if the foreman, D., knew the engine was out of order as shown in the complaint, then the plaintiff would not be required to inform the defendant, if the jury believe that D. was a foreman," was not objectionable in assuming the existence of the said facts.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

Action by Abe Woodson against the Seaboard Manufacturing Company to recover for personal injuries. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

This action was brought by the appellee, Abe Woodson, against the appellant corporation, and sought to recover damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff was fireman on the engine operated by the defendant at the time of the accident. The engine was stopped, the brakes put on, and a chock put under the wheels of a car attached to it, and the engineer went off to assist some construction hands working on the road. The plaintiff, while left alone with the engine, went under it to clean it, and while under the engine it, in some way, moved backward, and mashed and mangled plaintiff's arm so badly that it was necessary to amputate it. The complaint contained six counts, but the assignments of error in this case make it necessary to notice only the rulings of the court upon the first and second counts. The first count alleges that the appellant was operating a railroad, and appellee was a fireman in its employment, and was run over while obeying and observing the rules and regulations of appellant; that his injuries were caused by defects in the engine, "known to the superior officers of plaintiff, and known to defendant, or it might have known of said defects by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable diligence." The language in italics was inserted by amendment. There was no allegation (either of fact or conclusion) that defendant, or any of its officers or employes, were guilty of any negligence. This count was demurred to on two grounds: (1) Because there was no sufficient allegations of negligence on the part of defendant; (2) because it is not alleged that the defect in said count mentioned arose from or had not been remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in the service of the defendant, intrusted with the duty of seeing that the machinery was in a proper condition. The second count recites the employment of appellee, substantially as in the first count, and then alleges that the injury was caused "by reason of the negligence of the foreman of the defendant, which said foreman was intrusted by the defendant with the exercise of superintendence over the plaintiff and said railroad, and its engines and cars; and plaintiff avers that the negligence of said foreman consisted in this: that he knowingly allowed a certain engine to be and remain in a defective condition." This count was demurred to on the grounds: (1) Because it is not alleged that the defect complained of in said engine mentioned in said count arose from or had not been remedied owing to the negligence of the foreman; (2) because it is not alleged that the defect complained of had existed prior to the accident; (3) because there is no allegation showing that the defect complained of had existed long enough to have allowed the foreman a reasonable opportunity to have remedied the same. The court overruled these demurrers to the first and second counts. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the lever of the engine was left in a backward position, and that the effect of a leak in the throttle valve, combined with the lever being in a back motion, might have been to move the engine backward. His evidence further tended to show that this leak had existed for some time, and this fact was known to the engineer in charge, and to a Mr. Du Mont, and that Mr. Du Mont was called a foreman, and had charge and control of the engine and cars of the defendant. The defendant's evidence tended to show that the throttle-valve of the engine did not leak; that the engineer left the lever in a forward position; and that, even if the throttle-valve had leaked, it would not, while the lever was in a forward position, have made the engine move backward. It further tended to show that, while the engineer was gone and plaintiff was in sole charge of the engine, the lever was moved from a forward to a backward position. Defendant's evidence further tended to show that Du Mont was not called a foreman at all, but was a train dispatcher, and that a Mr. Spootswood was the general foreman. The complaint alleges, as a defect in the engine, "that the throttle-valve leaked, and allowed the steam to pass through into the cylinder of the engine, and caused the engine to move off." At the plaintiff's request, the court charged the jury, in writing, that "if the foreman, Du Mont, knew the engine was out of order, as shown in the complaint, then the plaintiff would not be required to inform the defendant, if the jury believe that Du Mont was a foreman in charge and control of the locomotive, engine, and cars of the defendant." There was judgment for the plaintiff for $775 damages, as assessed by the verdict of the jury. The defendant prosecutes this appeal, and assigns as error the rulings of the court in overruling its demurrers to the first and second counts of the complaint, and in giving the charge requested by the appellee.

Gregory L. & H. T. Smith, for appellant.
B. B. Boone, for appellee.

WALKER, J. 1. The first count of the complaint alleges that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by reason of defects in the condition of the locomotive engine upon which he was serving as fireman, and the defect mentioned was that the throttle-valve leaked and allowed the steam to pass through into the cylinders of the engine, and caused the engine to move off without warning to the plaintiff, while he was under the same, oiling and wiping it off. The original first count alleged "that said defects were known to the superior officers of plaintiff, and known to the defendant." The manifest purpose of this count is to show such a state of facts as to render the defendant liable under subdivision 1 of section 2590 of the Code of 1886; the injury being attributed to a defect in machinery, and to no other cause. The demurrer raised the question of the sufficiency of the averments to charge the defendant with liability under that clause of the statute. The statute does not impose a liability upon the employer for an injury to an employe caused by reason of a defect in machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer or master, unless such defect "arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition." The description of the defect to which the injury is imputed must come within the specific limitations of the proviso just quoted. Liability is not imposed unless the defect has one or more of the features there particularly mentioned. A statement of a defect which does not come within the qualifying language of the proviso falls short of what is necessary to be shown. The allegations must state a case so as to bring it within the description of one of the particular phases of negligence for which a liability is imposed upon the employer by the terms of the statute. When the claim is made under the first subdivision of the section, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show by his complaint and by his proof that the injury resulted from a defect which either arose from, or had not been discovered, or had not been remedied, owing to such negligence as is specified by the statute. Railway Co. v. Bradford, 86 Ala. 574, 6 South. Rep. 90; Railroad Co. v. Davis, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 552. It is plain that the first count of the complaint in this case does not allege that the specified defect arose from the negligence of the defendant, or of any employe intrusted with a duty in that regard. There is no averment as to how the defect arose. Nor can it be claimed that this count shows that the injury was caused by the negligent failure to discover the defect, for the averment that the defect was known to the superior officers of plaintiff and to the defendant shows that it had been discovered prior to the injury. The inquiry, then, is narrowed to this question, does the complaint show that the defect had not been remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in its service, who was intrusted with the duty of seeing that the engine was in proper condition? There is no specific averment of any negligence. No more is shown than that the defect was known. The averment of the complaint in this regard would have been supported by proof that the defect in question was known to plaintiff's superior officers and to the defendant for any length of time prior to the injury, though such knowledge had been acquired so recently that it was impossible that it could have been availed of for the purpose of remedying the defect before the injury befell the plaintiff. Unless there had been a reasonable opportunity to effect a remedy, it could not be said that the failure to do so was negligent. The defendant must have had sufficient time to remedy the defect after its discovery before it could be chargeable with negligence in failing to effect such remedy. Mere knowledge, without the opportunity to act on it, would not constitute negligence. Wilson v. Railroad Co., 85 Ala. 273, 4 South. Rep. 701; Railway Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 133, 4 South. Rep. 146. The insufficiency of the first count of the complaint is disclosed by the application of the test which is afforded by ascertaining what proof would suffice to support its averments. The proof required for this purpose does not necessarily involve any showing that the alleged defect arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in its service, and intrusted by it with the duty of seeing that the engine was in proper condition. The demurrer was addressed to the insufficiency of the allegation of negligence, and should have been sustained. The defendant did not by pleading over waive the privilege of assigning the error in the judgment overruling his demurrer. Code 1886, § 2692. The count, as amended by the insertion of the alternative averment that the defect could have been known to the defendant, was capable of being supported by the same proof which would have sufficed for the original count, so that the defect in the pleading was not cured by the amendment.

2. The second count of the complaint is drawn under the second subdivision of section 2590 of the Code.[1] It alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff, while engaged as a fireman, was injured by reason of the negligence of the foreman of the defendant, who was intrusted by it with the exercise of superintendence over the plaintiff, and over defendant's railroad, and its engines and cars; that said negligence consisted in said foreman knowingly allowing a certain engine to be and remain in a defective condition; and that by reason of such defective condition of the engine the plaintiff was injured while in the performance of his duty as fireman. The particular defect is described as in the first count. Here there is an explicit averment of the negligence of a person intrusted with a superintendence by the employer. It is shown that he was guilty of such negligence while in the exercise of such superintendence, and that the injury was caused by reason of the omission of duty which was described as negligent. These averments brought the charge within the terms of the statute, and were sufficiently explicit. Railway Co. v. Lazarus, 88 Ala. 453, 6 South. Rep. 877; Hall v. Posey, 79 Ala. 84; Railroad Co. v. Coulton, 86 Ala. 129, 5 South. Rep. 458; Railroad Co. v. Propst, 85 Ala. 203, 4 South. Rep. 711. There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the second count.

3. Error is imputed to the charge given by the court at the request of the plaintiff, on the ground that it assumed the existence of the disputed facts as to Du Mont being the defendant's foreman and as to the engine being out of order, as shown in the complaint. We are not satisfied that the charge is fairly susceptible of this construction. When disputed facts are enumerated in a charge, they should be stated hypothetically, so that the jury may clearly understand that it is for them to determine from the evidence whether or not such facts are established. We are not prepared to say that this rule was not conformed to in the framing of the charge in question. It is the safe course, however, to avoid the possibility of the jury understanding from any instruction given them by the court that any disputed fact is assumed to be established. The possibility of any such misunderstanding may be removed on another trial by reframing the charge so that the facts, hypothetically stated, may be more clearly and distinctly left to the determination of the jury from the evidence. Reversed and remanded.

[1] This section makes a master liable for an injury to a servant occasioned by any defect in the machinery used in the business of the master, when the injury is occasioned by reason of the negligence of any other servant who has any superintendence intrusted to him.

ALABAMA M. RY. CO. v. NEWTON.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS — RES JUDICATA — APPEAL.

1. Under Code Ala. § 3216, relative to condemnation proceedings, providing that the order of condemnation, on payment of the sum assessed by the jury, shall vest in the applicant the easement proposed to be acquired; and Acts Ala. 1890-91, p. 1134, providing that the payment of the sum assessed shall be a condition precedent to the vesting of the easement; and section 3218 of the Code, providing that applicant may pay the damages and compensation assessed at any time within six months after the assessment thereof, but, if he fails to pay the same within such time, such assessment shall cease to be binding on the owner of the lands, and the rights of the applicant thereunder shall determine,—proceedings in which the damages assessed were not paid cannot be interposed in bar of new proceedings, commenced more than six months after the order of condemnation in the first.

2. Code Ala. §§ 3619, 3640, allow an appeal to the circuit or supreme court from any final decree of the probate court within one year from the rendition thereof. Section 3210, as amended by Act Gen. Assem. Feb. 28, 1889, provides that compensation for lands taken by eminent domain may be ascertained by a jury of six men in proceedings in the probate court. Section 3215 provides that in such cases either party may appeal by bill of exceptions to the supreme court within three months. Const. Ala. art. 14, § 7, entitles either party appealing from a preliminary assessment of compensation for condemned lands to have the damages "determined by a jury according to law." Held that, since a "jury according to law" is a jury of 12 men, section 3215 is unconstitutional, since, if an appeal by bill of exceptions were taken by either party directly to the supreme court, the other would be deprived of right to trial by such a jury. Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Alabama G. S. R. Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 555, followed.

Appeal from probate court, Montgomery county; F. C. RANDOLPH, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Alabama Midland Railway Company against Nancy Newton. A demurrer to defendant's plea of res judicata was overruled, and petitioner appeals. Appeal dismissed.

A. A. Wiley and Tompkins & Troy, for appellant.

COLEMAN, J. The pleadings show that prior to December 16, 1889, appellant began in the probate court of Montgomery county ad quod damnum proceedings to condemn certain lands of appellee to be used as a right of way; and on the 16th December, 1889, the day to which the hearing had been continued, the damages were assessed by a jury at $560, and the order of condemnation regularly entered by the court. Appellant did not pay the damages found by the jury, or take possession of the land condemned, or prosecute the condemnation proceedings further. In December, 1890, more than six months after the order of condemnation was made, appellant began the present proceedings in the same court against the same party for the condemnation of the identical lands, less 10 feet on the south side of the lot. The appellee interposed the former proceedings and order of condemnation in bar of the present petition. The court overruled the demurrer to the pleas of appellee, and held that the question was res adjudicata, and dismissed the petition of appellant. The question is a new one in this state, but the principle involved has been adjudicated by the supreme courts of several of the states of the Union. Appellee principally relies upon the authorities furnished by the court of appeals and supreme court of Missouri. In the case of Leisse v. Railroad Co., 2 Mo. App. 105, it was held that, when proceedings instituted to condemn private property for public use for railroad purposes are abandoned by the railroad corporation because it is dissatisfied with the price fixed by inquest, it will be liable to the owner of the property for all damages sustained in consequence of such proceedings. This principle was reaffirmed in 5 Mo. App. 585, and affirmed by the supreme court of the state in 72 Mo. 562. The rights of the parties in ad quod damnum proceedings of this nature must depend upon the constitution and statutes of the state under which they are instituted. The case cited and principally relied upon from Missouri does not quote or refer to the statute under which the decision was rendered. It does refer to and cite in support of the conclusion of the court the case of Railroad Co. v. Lackland, 25 Mo. 515, where the statute is set out under which the proceedings in that case were instituted. The language of the act as there stated is: "The court shall enter judgment in favor of such owner against such company for the amount of damages assessed, and shall make an order vesting in said company the fee-simple title to the land." The question before the court was to determine at what period of time the right to compensation became vested and the title to the land transferred; and it was held that no order transferring the title could be made until all the preliminary steps pointed out in the act had been taken, and until this was done, and the judgment of the court rendered, the company had the right to discontinue their condemnation proceedings. The statute of this state is in some respects very dissimilar to that of the Missouri statute. Code, § 3216, provides that "the order of condemnation, upon the payment of the sum ascertained and assessed by the verdict of the jury, shall vest in the applicant the easement proposed to be acquired," etc. The amendment to this section, found in Acts 1890-91, p. 1134, in no way affects the principle of law under consideration. The effect of the act is to provide that the payment of the sum ascertained and assessed by the verdict of the jury shall be made a condition precedent to the vesting of the easement under the order of condemnation; and, under the principle of law declared in the Missouri authority, until this was complied with the petitioner had the right to discontinue his proceedings.

Section 3218 of the Code further provides that "the applicant may pay the damages and compensation assessed at any time within six months after the assessment thereof," etc.; "but, if he fails to pay the same within such time, such assessment shall cease to be binding on the owner of the lands, and the rights of the applicant thereunder shall determine; and, upon such failure, the applicant shall be liable to the owner for all damages the latter may have sustained by the institution of such proceedings, and including a reasonable attorney's fee," etc. Under our system, not only must the compensation be paid as a condition precedent to the vesting of the title, but a time is fixed within which it must be paid, or the rights of the applicant will determine. It seems clear from the statute that its purpose was not to give to the verdict of the jury and the order of condemnation the force and effect of an absolute judgment, conclusive for all purposes and time upon the parties. It is conclusive for a period of six months, in so far as it adjudicates the amount of compensation to be paid by the applicant, and his right to the land condemned, upon its payment. It is also conclusive upon the land-owner for the same period of time, in so far as it fixes his compensation, and estops him from exercising any rights over or making any disposition of the property in conflict with the order of condemnation. It is the payment of the compensation, as provided by the statute, which transfers the property and gives the order of condemnation the attribute of a final and absolute judgment, conclusive upon the parties, and which may be pleaded as res adjudicata. The statute of Illinois provides that "the judge or court, upon such report, [the report of the jury,] shall proceed to adjudge and make such order as to right and justice shall pertain, ordering that petitioner enter upon such property, and the use of the same, upon payment of full compensation as aforesaid," etc. It was held under this statute that, until compensation was paid, there is no right to enter upon the premises; and that until that time the company seeking condemnation had the right to abandon the location, and adopt another; and that, until the selection became binding on the company, the owner of the land could do any act that an owner may do with his own, not materially interfering with the condemnation proceedings, and the object sought to be accomplished thereby. Schreiber v. Railroad Co., 115 Ill. 340, 3 N. E. Rep. 427. The case of Stacey v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 44, is very full to the point that, until payment was made, no right to the land vested in the company; and, if the company had no vested rights, the land-owner had none to the compensation awarded. As holding the same doctrine, see Graff v. Mayor, etc., 10 Md. 544; Hayes v. Railroad Co., 17 Ohio St. 103. In the case of Railway Co. v. Haas, 42 Ohio St. 239, it was held that the failure of the corporation to pay for and take possession of the land within six months (similar provision to our statute) after the assessment of compensation shall have been made is no bar to a new proceeding under the statute by the same corporation, after the expiration of the six months, for the appropriation of the same property for the same public use. We cite, as a further authority on this point, the case of Corbin v. Railway Co., 66 Iowa, 73, 23 N. W. Rep. 270. It is certain that appellant cannot enter upon and take possession of the land under the first condemnation proceedings, more than six months having elapsed since the rendition of the condemnation order; and, if the land cannot be condemned by proceeding de novo, then the land is forever released from liability to public use, however great a necessity may arise. Appellee may have sustained damage in consequence of the former proceedings, but the statute affords a remedy in behalf of the "owner for all damages the owner may have sustained by the institution of such proceeding, including a reasonable attorney's fee for defending the same." The court erred in overruling the demurrer of appellant to the defendant's plea of res adjudicata. In the case of Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Alabama G. S. R. Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 555, construing section 3210 of the Code, as amended by the act of February 28, 1889, (Acts 1888–89, p. 113,) and as further amended by act of February 18, 1891, (Acts 1890–91, p. 1131,) it was held that an appeal did not lie in condemnation proceedings from the probate court to the supreme court, but only to the circuit court. In the case of Iron Co. v. Cabaniss, 87 Ala. 328, 6 South. Rep. 300, construing section 3210 of the Code, as amended by the act of February 28, 1889, supra, in order to preserve the constitutional right of trial by a lawful jury, it was declared that an appeal would lie under section 3640 of the Code to the circuit court. We deem it unnecessary to repeat the argument, or fortify the conclusion reached in these cases by additional argument. The conclusion is that no appeal lies in ad quod damnum proceedings to the supreme court, and the appeal must be dismissed. We have considered this case upon its merits, and adjudicated the questions raised by the assignments of error and argued in briefs. We have done this merely to aid the lower court, if the parties see proper to prosecute the case by appeal to the circuit court. Our conclusion is, this court has no jurisdiction of the case, and the appeal must be dismissed.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE OF PEDIGREE—DESCENT—LIMITATIONS—BEYOND SEAS—SPANISH GRANTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where an instruction, as far as it goes, states a correct proposition of law, but is defective because it fails to qualify or explain the proposition it lays down in consonance with the facts of the case, such defect is cured if subsequent instructions are given, containing the required qualifications or explanation.

2. Where the exception in favor of persons "beyond seas" is made in a statute of limitation, the law is well-settled that such term is equivalent to "without the limits of the state;" and the exception inures to the benefit of foreigners who constantly reside abroad as well as to citizens who temporarily leave the state to return again.

3. The special limitation of one year within which to assail the validity of tax-titles acquired under the provisions of chapter 1865, Laws 1872, entitled "An act to quiet tax-titles to lands," is operative only upon, and applies only to, tax-deeds acquired under said act "that have been recorded."

4. A deed or any other instrument, though actually transcribed upon the public records, is not "recorded," within the legal acceptation of that word, where there has been no proper proof of its execution, as required by law, authorizing a record thereof.

5. Said chapter 1865, Laws 1872, requires the deeds thereunder made by the commissioner of lands and immigration to be witnessed by two subscribing witnesses. Any such deed not so witnessed is properly excluded from evidence, except for its value as color of title upon which to predicate an adversary possession.

6. Under the statute in this state limiting the time within which possessory actions shall be brought for the recovery of land, an adverse possession, in any case, to bar a person having the legal title, must be continuous and uninterrupted for the entire period of seven years.

7. An illegitimate child, under the statute here, inherits property through the mother the same as though such child were legitimate.

8. Instructions in a cause must be predicated upon some testimony adduced at the trial, and must be pertinent to the facts; otherwise they are abstract propositions, and there is no error in a refusal to give them, no matter how correctly stated the propositions therein may be.

9. The operation of the eighth article of the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain, for the cession of the Floridas, was to confirm as grants or purchases in præsenti all grants or purchases made of lands in Florida by or of the Spanish government anterior to the date fixed in said treaty, without further action on the part of the United States through its congress. Magee v. Alba, 9 Fla. 382, and Magruder v. Roe, 13 Fla. 602, cited and approved.

10. Where the plaintiffs in an action of ejectment predicate their claim to the land in dispute upon their inheritance therof as heirs at law of the original and last grantee thereof, and when a prima facie case of their relationship to the original grantee is established by proper proof, the onus probandi is thrown upon the defendant to disprove their identity as such heirs; and, if the defense shall fail in this, the fact of their identity must be held to have been established.

Error to circuit court, Clay county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Ejectment by Isabel Costa y Maestre de Enriquez and others against Henry Keech and T. A. MacDonell. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

T. A. & B. B. MacDonell, for plaintiffs in error. C. M. Cooper, for defendants in error.

TAYLOR, J. On the 21st of June, 1884, the defendants in error, Isabel Costa y Maestre de Enriquez and Carlos Enriquez y Lopez, her husband, Dolores Cortina y Maestre de Oruna, and Margarita Cortina y Maestre de Rufin, instituted their action of ejectment in the circuit court of St. Johns county against the plaintiffs in error, Henry Keech and T. A. MacDonell, for the recovery of possession of the following described land in St. Johns county, viz.: Section 39, township 9 S., of range 30 E.; being the grant of land confirmed by the United States to Bartolo M. Maestre, containing 597.30 acres. After issue joined upon a plea of the general issue, one of the defendants, Henry Keech, filed his petition in the circuit court of St.

Johns county for a change of venue of said cause, on the ground that the plaintiffs had an undue influence over the minds of the inhabitants of St. Johns county. On the 11th of March, 1886, the petition for change of venue was granted, and the cause removed for trial to Clay county, in the fourth judicial circuit. On the 24th of March, 1886, the cause was tried in Clay county before a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. Motion for a new trial was made upon the following grounds: (1) That the verdict of the jury was not sustained by the evidence adduced on the part of the plaintiffs; (2) that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the charges of the court; (3) that the court erred, in charging the jury, in giving the instructions asked by the attorney for plaintiffs, including 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6; (4) that the court erred in refusing defendant's instructions 1 and 2 and 7, as requested; (5) that the verdict of the jury is against the evidence. This motion was denied, and from this judgment the defendants in the court below have taken their writ of error to this court.

The errors assigned are: (1) The court below rejected proper evidence on the part of defendants; (2) the court below erred in giving improper instructions on behalf of plaintiffs; (3) the court erred in refusing to give proper instructions on behalf of defendants, (4) the court erred in overruling the motion of defendants to set aside the verdict of the jury and for a new trial, (5) the court erred in rendering a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the defendants. We will consider these assignments of error in the order in which they come.

After a careful scrutiny of the record, we are unable to discover where any evidence of any character was offered by the defendants at the trial below and rejected by the court. Neither can we find that any exception was taken or noted to any refusal of the court below to admit any evidence offered by the defense; consequently the first assignment fails for want of facts to constitute its subject-matter.

The second assignment of error is that the court erred in giving improper instructions on behalf of plaintiffs. This assignment we will consider in connection with the third ground of the motion for new trial, which, in substance, asserts the error of the court below to be in giving the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th instructions. These instructions, that we find from the bill of exceptions were excepted to in their entirety, are as follows: "(1) That if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs have proved the title to the land in question to be in them, they are entitled to recover it, (2) that if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiffs have been beyond seas during adverse possession under color of title of a deed, under chapter 1865, Laws Fla., the plaintiffs have the right to appear and contest the title within any time before coming to Florida, or within a year after coming to Florida; (3) possession of land is presumed to be in the legal owner at all times, when there is not actual adverse possession in some one else; (4) adverse possession, in any case, to bar a person having the title, must be continuous and uninterrupted for the entire time required by law, which, in actions for the recovery of real property or possession thereof, is seven years; whenever adverse possession is interrupted, the time must begin anew; (5) an illegitimate child can inherit on the mother's side as well as though legitimate; (6) if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiffs, their agent or tenant, were in the possession of the land in question at any time within seven years before the bringing of this suit, the statute of limitations will not run against them."

The first of these instructions, although stating a correct proposition of law, might have been confusing to the jury because of its failure to inform the jury that, although the legal right to the land might be in the plaintiffs, yet their remedy to secure that right might have been forfeited by lapse of time and an adverse possession by the defendant; but we think this defect in the first instruction was subsequently supplied by the first instruction asked for by the defendant and given by the court, so that no harm could have resulted from the broadness of this first instruction.

The second instruction above is predicated upon section 6, c. 1865, Laws 1872, entitled "An act to quiet tax-titles to lands," which statute provides, in brief, for the sale and conveyance, by the commissioner of lands and immigration, of all lands, after the expiration of six months after publication of lists thereof, that have accrued to the state by virtue of any tax-deed made or executed for the non-payment of any taxes due the state. Section 6 of said act provides that any deed made in conformity with its provisions, which shall have been recorded for one year, in the county where the land is situated, shall operate as a complete bar against all persons who might thereafter claim title to said land, in consequence of any informality or illegality of the taxes or proceedings, etc.; but provides that infants, persons of unsound mind, imprisoned or "beyond the seas," shall have the right to appear and contest such title to said lands within one year after their disabilities are removed. This charge, confined, as it was, to the special title acquired by the defendants under the provisions of this statute, we think was proper, as the title or color of title offered by the defendants in support of their claim was acquired under the provisions of this special law; and the plaintiffs, according to the proofs, being residents continually in the island of Cuba, which, according to the settled doctrine upon the subject, brings them within the meaning of the term "beyond seas;" the now well-settled meaning of that term in statutes of limitation being held to be equivalent to "without the limits of the state." Ang. Lim. § 200; Murray's Lessee v Baker, 3 Wheat. 541; Bank v. Dyer, 14 Pet. 141. The plaintiffs here were not only out of the limits of the state of Florida, but were beyond the limits of the United States, in a foreign territory. And it is further well settled that the exception in favor of "persons beyond seas" is not to be confined to subjects who may occasionally leave the country and return, but it is general, and extends to foreigners who are constantly resident abroad, as in the case of the plaintiffs here. Ang. Lim. § 204, and authorities there cited. We think, however, that this second instruction was unnecessary in the case from the fact that the special limitation provided in section 6 of said chapter 1865, for the institution of actions to assail titles acquired under said act, is operative only upon deeds acquired under said act "that have been recorded." The deed acquired by the defendants under this act, although appearing to have been spread upon the records of St. Johns county, has never yet been "recorded," in the legal acceptation of that word, because there has never been any proof of its execution authorizing a record thereof. Edwards v. Thom, 25 Fla. 222, 5 South Rep. 707; Hope v. Johnston, 27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 830, (decided June term, 1891.) The special limitation provided for in chapter 1865 could not apply in this case, because there has been no record of the defendants' deed acquired under that act. We think, too, that the court below ruled properly in excluding the defendants' deed acquired from the commissioner of lands and immigration under said chapter 1865, except for the purpose of showing color of title, because of the fact that said deed has no witnesses. This act, like all other statutes that undertake to confiscate the property of the citizen through the medium of sales thereof for taxes, must be strictly construed. Section 4 of this act provides with great particularity a set form for the deeds to be made under its provisions, and this prescribed form requires two subscribing witnesses. The deed offered by the defendants has none, and was properly confined to its value in evidence as color of title only. Paul v. Fries, 18 Fla. 573. The third instruction above is a correct proposition of law, and only needs for its support a reference to section 4, c. 1869, Laws 1872.

The fourth instruction above also states the law correctly. Not only is it the well-settled common law of this country, but section 5, c. 1869, providing periods of limitation of all kinds of actions, expressly provides that there shall be a continued adverse occupation and possession for seven years of premises included in any instrument held as a claim of title, in order to bar the true owner from its recovery. Tyler, Ej. p. 910 et seq., and authorities cited.

The fifth instruction above is also a correct statement of the law as contained in our statute, (section 8, p. 470, McClel. Dig.) which provides that illegitimate children shall inherit property in this state through the mother equally with legitimates.

We think the sixth instruction above did not state the law accurately or correctly. Though the plaintiffs may have acquired possession of the land at some time within seven years prior to the institution of their suit, still that possession may have been an unlawful one; and the statute of limitation may have already ripened the defendants' claim into a perfect possessory title prior to such unlawful interruption of his possession by the plaintiffs; but as there is no proof to show that the defendants had acquired a perfect title by possession anterior to the interruption thereof by the plaintiffs, and no proof to show when that interruption took place, the giving of this charge is error without injury.

The third assignment of error, to the effect that the court erred in refusing instructions asked on behalf of defendants, must be confined to the refusal of the court to give the third, eighth, and ninth instructions requested by the defendants, as these are the only ones refused to be given by the court, and the only ones to the discarding of which exceptions were in any manner taken by defendants at the trial below; though the fourth ground of the motion for new trial erroneously cites the first, second, and seventh instructions as being the ones refused. The instructions refused, numbered here as in the record, are as follows: (3) "In considering the time against the plaintiffs, you will put all the possessions together that were hostile to the plaintiffs that were in privity to the defendants, and through which they claim, and then ascertain if they make more than seven years' hostile adverse possession, and, if you ascertain that fact, the defendants are entitled to a verdict." (8) "If the jury find from the evidence that Keech, one of the defendants, entered upon the land in dispute under color of title, and held possession thereof adversely to the claim of the plaintiffs, seven years before the interruption of possession by plaintiffs, then such adverse possession comes within the statute of limitations, and the plaintiffs are therefore barred from re-entering, and you should find for the defendants." (9) "If the jury find from the evidence that Bartolo M. Maestre filed his claim to the Maestre grant in 1820, and that in 1824 the said Bartolo M. Maestre died, and that the claim of the said Bartolo M. Maestre was not confirmed until 1827, after his death, then the plaintiffs cannot recover, there being no one living by the name of Bartolo M. Maestre, to whom said grant could have been confirmed."

The third instruction, above asked for and refused, was not at all applicable to the facts in this case, as there was no attempt, even, by the defendants to prove that any one else, except Keech, the defendant, ever occupied or possessed this land, that were in privity with him in any other capacity than as his agent or tenant. The only possession attempted to be proved was by him or by his agents or tenants, whose possession was, of course, his. There were therefore no facts upon which to construct the theory of the "tacking of possessions" by different persons at different times in privity of title with each other, as is contemplated by this instruction, and there was no error in its refusal. Instructions in a cause must be predicated upon some testimony adduced at the trial, and must be pertinent to the facts; otherwise they are abstract propositions. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. Ry. Co. v. Peninsular Land Transp. & Manuf'g Co., 27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 661; Robinson v. Barnett, 19 Fla. 670.

There was no error in the refusal to give the eighth instruction above asked by the defendant, as we do not think it was warranted by the evidence in the cause. There was no proof as to what years Keech, the defendant, had held possession of the land, nor for how long a time he had possession of it; nor was it shown when his possession, if he ever had any, was interrupted by the plaintiffs. Neither was there any evidence to show that his right to the land had ripened into a complete possessory title by seven years' adverse occupancy thereof anterior to the interruption of that possession by the plaintiffs.

There was no error in the refusal of the court to give the ninth instruction above asked for by the defendants. The enunciation, as law, therein proposed, is directly in conflict with the decisions of this court in Magee v. Alba, 9 Fla. 382, and in Magruder v. Roe, 13 Fla. 602, in which it is properly held that the operation of the eighth article of the treaty of February 22, 1819, between the United States and Spain, for the cession of the Floridas, was to confirm as grants or purchases in præsenti all grants or purchases made by or of the Spanish government anterior to the date fixed in said treaty, without further action on the part of the United States through its congress. Under the law as announced in said two decisions, Bartolo M. Maestre, in 1820, when his grant was made to him by the Spanish authorities, became then vested with the title to the land embraced in said grant, in præsenti, without any further action on the part of this government.

The fourth and fifth assignments of error, the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, and the entry by the court of the judgment in the cause, we consider together. Without commenting at length or in detail upon the evidence in the cause, after careful consideration thereof, our conclusion is that the plaintiffs have established the fact by proper evidence that they are the sole heirs at law to the land in dispute of the original grantee from the Spanish government, Bartolo M. Maestre. They have, by proper evidence, at least, made out a strong prima facie case that they are such heirs at law, and entitled as such to the land in question; and, having done so, the burden was then thrown upon the defendants to prove the contrary. The defense having made no effort to break down the prima facie case thus made by the plaintiffs, the fact of their identity as such heirs must be held to have been established. Tyler, Ej. p. 488 et seq. to page 495, and authorities cited. Our conclusion, for the reasons heretofore given in commenting on the deed from the commissioner of lands and immigration to the defendant Keech, is that such deed was not sufficient to vest the title in Keech; and we conclude, further, that the evidence adduced by the defense as to adverse possession of the land was not sufficient to justify any other verdict than the one found by the jury in favor of the plaintiffs.

Discovering no errors in the record sufficient to disturb the judgment of the court below, the same is hereby affirmed.

MOULIE v. HUGHES et al.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Oct. 22, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—FINDINGS OF REFEREE—BREACH OF CONTRACT—SET-OFF.

1. In an action on a contract in which defendants agreed to take and pay for all the perfumes and beverages of plaintiff's manufacture during the period of one year, the breaches alleged were that defendants, after part performance of said contract, refused to take and pay for goods as therein provided; and defendants pleaded that they had kept and performed all matters and things specified in said contract to be kept and performed on their part. The findings of a referee on the issues of fact thus tendered accorded the same consideration as the verdict of a jury.

2. The acceptance of the finding of the referee as correct that defendants had not violated their contract with plaintiff, renders it unnecessary to inquire into the extent and measure of plaintiff's rights in the uncompleted portion of such a contract.

3. All debts and demands mutually existing between the parties at the commencement of suit are proper subjects of set-off, but the terms "debts and demands" refer to matters arising out of contract, express or implied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Action on a contract by E. Moulie against George Hughes and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Fletcher & Wurts, for plaintiff in error. John E. Hartridge, for defendants in error.

MABRY, J. The plaintiff in error was plaintiff in the court below. The action he brings is trespass on the case on promises, based upon a written contract, a copy of which is filed with the declaration. There are three counts in the declaration. In the first count it is alleged that defendants agreed to take and pay for, cash upon delivery, and at the prices mentioned in the contract, all the perfumes and beverages which plaintiff should produce of his own manufacture during the period of one year, beginning February 6, A. D. 1884. In consideration of this agreement on the part of defendants, plaintiff agreed not to sell his said goods to any other person or persons during said time, (with two exceptions mentioned;) and also agreed that defendants should have the privilege of extending said contract for the period of five years from the 6th day of February, A. D. 1885.

It is also alleged that the prices of a portion of the goods mentioned in the contract were reduced in consideration of an advance of $500 from defendant to plaintiff, said money to be repaid on the 21st day of April, A. D. 1885. That in pursuance of said contract, and with such facilities as plaintiff then had, and on the order of defendants, plaintiff manufactured and shipped to defendants goods, which were accepted and paid for by defendants according to contract.

Plaintiff further avers that thereupon defendants, saying that they desired a larger amount of said goods than the facilities of plaintiff enabled him to manufacture, urged him to increase his capacities for making such goods; and on the 21st day of April, A. D. 1884, advanced him money for the period of one year from said date, without interest, to enable him to produce a larger amount of such goods, and promised to take all that plaintiff would manufacture for one year at the prices stated and agreed upon between them.

Plaintiff further alleges that at great cost and expense to himself, to-wit, the sum of $1,500, he extended his facilities for manufacturing said goods; and on the 9th day of June, A. D. 1884, in pursuance of said contract, made defendants a further shipment of said goods to the amount of $265.26; and shortly thereafter defendants notified plaintiff that they would take no more goods, and declined to pay for the goods already shipped according to the terms of the contract.

It is further averred that with the facilities plaintiff then had for manufacturing said goods he could and was ready to produce, if defendants had continued to comply with their contract, goods to the amount of $20,082.50 during the year mentioned in said contract; and that the profits thereon to plaintiff, if said goods had been taken and paid for by defendants according to contract, would have amounted to the sum of $5,020.62.

Plaintiff further averred that the refusal of defendants to take and pay for any more of his said goods entailed further loss and damage on him, inasmuch as on account of the contract with defendants plaintiff neglected other means of disposing of such goods as he was manufacturing, and was obliged to dispose of at great loss the materials and appliances then on hand for manufacturing said goods, and also to suffer to decay plants, shrubs, and flowers used in the production of such goods, all to the great loss and damage of plaintiff in this respect, to-wit, the sum of $1,200, and plaintiff claims $8,000 damage.

In the second count it is averred that defendants owe plaintiff $8,000 for goods bargained and sold by plaintiff to defendants.

And in the third count it is alleged that defendants owe plaintiff $8,000 for work done and material provided for the defendants at their request.

To the first count in the declaration defendants pleaded that they had kept and performed all matters and things in said contract specified to be kept and performed on their part.

To the second and third counts in the declaration defendants pleaded that they never were indebted as therein alleged.

For a third plea to the declaration, defendants filed a plea of set-off, and alleged that plaintiff was at the commencement of the suit indebted to defendants in the sum of $1,500 for money advanced and goods sold and delivered, which sum defendants are willing to set off against the claim of plaintiff. This cause was then referred to J. C. Cooper, an attorney at law, as referee, for decision. By leave of the court the plea of set-off was withdrawn, and two additional pleas were filed. The first additional plea was a plea of set-off, with a bill of particulars. In this plea defendants alleged that at the commencement of the suit there was due from them to plaintiff the sum of $265.26 for goods, as charged in the account attached to the declaration, and that plaintiff was at that time, and still is, indebted to defendants in an amount largely in excess of $265.26 for money advanced and paid out on account of the plaintiff, and for goods sold and delivered by defendants to plaintiff at his request, to-wit, the sum of $1,618.97, which defendants are willing to set off against plaintiff's claim, and defendants claim judgment for the excess.

And in the second additional plea it is averred that it was understood and agreed by and between plaintiff and defendants that the said goods to be furnished by plaintiff to defendants were to be of good merchantable quality, but that the goods furnished were inferior, and not merchantable. Issue was taken upon all of the pleas.

Upon final hearing, the referee rendered a judgment in favor of defendants against plaintiff for $1,563.12 and costs of suit. In reaching this conclusion the referee decided that defendants had committed no breach of the contract set up in the declaration. The parties to the suit alone were examined as witnesses, the plaintiff in his own behalf, and defendants in their behalf.

The contract alleged in the declaration, that defendants were to take and pay for all the perfumes and beverages manufactured by plaintiff during the period mentioned, is not put in issue by any plea. Plaintiff contends that defendants refused to pay for a shipment of goods made June 9, 1884, of the value of $265.26, and by reason of their failure in this respect he lost the profits on all goods which he could have manufactured during the remainder of the year, and such profits would amount to $5,029.62. Defendants insist that they have not violated their contract with plaintiff, and have not refused to accept or pay for any goods made and tendered by plaintiff according to the terms of the contract. The decision of the referee is in favor of defendants on this point. The findings of a referee on questions of fact will be accorded the same considerations as the verdict of a jury Without going into any discussion of the evidence on this point, we will simply announce that, after a careful consideration of it, we accept the finding of the referee as correct. If defendants did not refuse to accept and pay for any goods mentioned in the contract, or, as found by the referee, were not guilty of any breach of the contract, it follows, of course, that it would be useless in this investigation to consider what would be the measure of plaintiff's right in the uncompleted portion of the contract. The contract here requiring the defendants to take and pay for all the perfumes and beverages which plaintiff could manufacture within a year, an unjustifiable refusal on their part, after a part performance of it, to take and pay for any more goods, would present an important question. In addition to the questions discussed in the cases of Brent v. Parker, 23 Fla. 200,[1] and Sullivan v. McMillan, 26 Fla. 543, 8 South. Rep. 450, the further question, whether or not the profits claimed by plaintiff are the proximate results in law of the breach alleged, would become involved. But the finding of the referee that defendants have not violated the contract, and the acceptance by us of this finding as correct, make it unnecessary for us to go into the question suggested. The referee not only decided against the plaintiff on his demand for future profits, but rendered judgment against him in favor of defendants for $1,563.12 on the plea of set-off. Under our statute, all debts or demands mutually existing between the parties at the commencement of the suit are the proper subjects of set-off. The terms "debt or demand," used in the statute, refer to matters arising out of contract, express or implied. The plea of set-off filed by defendants is for money advanced, and for goods sold and delivered by defendants to plaintiff at his request before the commencement of the suit. There is no doubt about the demand here sought to be set off arising out of contract. But it is very questionable whether or not such a demand can be set off against the cause of action set up in the first count of the declaration. See Robinson v. L'Engle, 13 Fla. 482; Hall v. Penny, Id. 621; Matthews v Lindsay, 20 Fla. 962.

The second and third counts in the declaration are for goods bargained and sold, and for work and material provided by the plaintiff for defendants; and under these counts we have no doubt defendants can set off their demand against any cause of action that plaintiff is entitled to prove under them, and such, we think, they intended. It is conceded that plaintiff shipped on June 9, 1884, to defendants, goods to the value of $265.26. At that time plaintiff was indebted to defendants in the sum of $1,618.97, but he insists that said sum was not due until the 21st day of April, 1885. The decision of the referee on this point is that on the 9th day of June, A. D. 1884, the plaintiff was due defendants for advances made by them the sum of $1,618.97, and that there was no breach of the contract by defendants, as, under the circumstances of this case, it was the clear intent of the parties that Hughes and Gill should be repaid their advances out of the proceeds of sale of plaintiff's manufacture. We accept as correct the ruling of the referee on this point, on the testimony before him. The conclusions here reached settle the entire merits of this case.

The other assignments of error have been duly considered. They relate principally to questions as to the admissibility of evidence tending to establish the measure of plaintiff's damages in the uncompleted portion of the contract. The referee found from the evidence—and we think the finding correct—that plaintiff had shown no right to any such damages for a breach of contract.

We notice that the judgment entered of record in the circuit court of Duval county is for $1,533.12, a sum less than the amount found due by the referee from plaintiff in error to defendants. This is probably a clerical error in the transcript before us.

Upon a consideration of the entire case, our conclusion is that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

JOHNS v. COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF ORANGE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Oct. 24, 1891.)

REWARDS BY COUNTY COMMISSIONERS — VALIDITY — MANDAMUS.

1. The county judge is the officer designated by statute to pass in the first instance upon the rewards allowed by chapter 3768, Laws Fla.; and until he has certified to the facts required by the statute the county commissioners will not be compelled by mandamus to issue a warrant for the amount of the reward to a claimant.

2. Before relator can invoke the aid of the writ of mandamus, he must show that all the requirements of the statute have been complied with, and that he is clearly entitled to the relief demanded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Orange county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Petition by Cornelius Johns, Jr., attorney, etc., for a writ of alternative mandamus. The writ was quashed, and relator appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hugh Murphy, for appellant. Beggs & Palmer, for appellees.

MABRY, J. Cornelius Johns, Jr., by his attorney, J. Hugh Murphy, filed in the Orange county circuit court, on the 24th day of May, A. D. 1888, a petition for an alternative writ of mandamus to be issued against the county commissioners of Orange county, Fla. In the alternative writ it is stated that the relator, Cornelius Johns, Jr., on the 5th day of March, A. D. 1888, exhibited the scalp of a wild cat to J. L. Bryan, county judge of Orange county, and that said scalp was presented within 10 days after the killing of said animal, and that said relator killed said wild cat in the county of Orange and state of Florida, and that the county judge aforesaid issued to relator the following certificate, viz.:

"State of Florida, county of Orange. I, J. L. Bryan, county judge in and for the county and state aforesaid, do hereby certify that Cornelius Johns, Jr., has this day exhibited to me the scalp of a wild cat, which he represented as having been killed in the county and state aforesaid, within the time prescribed by the statute. Witness my hand and seal of office at Orlando, Florida, this 5th day of March, 1888.

"J. L. BRYAN, County Judge."

Further, that relator, on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1888, at a regular session of the board of county commissioners aforesaid, presented the above certificate and his account properly approved by the county auditor for three dollars, the amount allowed by law for killing a wild cat, and requested said board to issue him a warrant on the county treasurer for said amount; and that said board refused a warrant for the same, and still refuses to allow and pay the same, assigning as ground of refusal that the certificate of the county judge is not made in accordance with law.

The respondents moved the court to quash the alternative writ on the following grounds, viz.: (1) Because the county judge has not made a proper certificate to entitle the relator to the relief sought; (2) because the statute requiring the payment of rewards for killing certain animals is unconstitutional; (3) because the relator does not show that the board of county commissioners had satisfactory evidence to authorize the payment of the claim; (4) because mandamus is not the proper remedy for the relief sought; and for other causes. On this motion the court quashed the alternative writ, and relator appeals from this decision.

By an act of the legislature (chapter 3763, Laws Fla.) a reward of three dollars is directed to be paid for killing a wild cat. The payment is to be made from the county treasury of the county in which the animal is killed, upon the warrant of the county commissioners. The third section provides that the person who kills a wild cat shall exhibit its scalp to the county judge of the county in which such animal is killed, within 10 days after the killing; and upon the certificate of said judge that the scalp has been exhibited in his presence, and within the time specified, the county commissioners shall issue their warrant upon the county treasurer for the payment of said reward. That the scalp of such animal was exhibited in the presence of the county judge, and within 10 days after the animal was killed, are facts required by the statute to be stated in the certificate upon which the county commissioners are required to issue the warrant. In the certificate presented to respondents the county judge certifies that relator presented to him the scalp of a wild cat which he represented as having been killed in Orange county, and within 10 days from the time the scalp was presented. In part, the judge certifies to what the relator represented to him in reference to the killing of the animal. Relator contends that, as a matter of fact, the county judge could not know that the animal was killed within 10 days from the time the scalp was presented, and the legislature could not have required him to certify to this fact. The legislature had the power to prescribe the conditions upon which this bounty should be paid, and the language of the act requires such a certificate. The county judge is the officer designated in the statute to pass in the first instance upon such claims, and to him personally the claimant must present the scalp of the animal, and within the time when its appearance will materially aid him in determining when the animal was killed. He must, in the exercise of a duty imposed by statute, make the certificate upon an inspection of the scalp, and on such information as will satisfy him that the animal was killed within 10 days of the time when the scalp was presented. The third section of the statute was evidently designed to protect the counties against false and illegal demands arising out of such matters, and to prescribe the way in which said claims shall be authenticated before the warrant is issued by the county commissioners. The county judge should not withhold his certificate when a party has in good faith complied with the law and earned the reward. The recital in the certificate by the county judge in the case before us, that relator represented that he had killed the animal within 10 days of the time when the scalp was presented, does not show that the county judge believed the statement to be true. We think the certificate presented was not sufficient to require the respondents to issue the warrant. Before relator can invoke the aid of the writ of mandamus, he must show that he is clearly entitled to the relief demanded. State v. Helmer, 10 Neb. 25, 4 N. W. Rep. 367. He has no right to compel respondents to issue the warrant in his favor until he has complied with all that the statute requires as conditions precedent to the accruing of his right to the warrant. Canova v. Commissioners, 18 Fla. 512; State v. Cooper, 20 Fla. 547. This he has not done, and hence the court did not err in quashing the alternative writ.

Without deciding upon the other points in the motion to quash, we think it proper to say that we do not impliedly concede that mandamus is the proper remedy in this case.

WATERMAN et al. v. HIGGINS et al.

CONVEYANCE TO WIFE—VALIDITY—NATURE OF ESTATE—MENTAL CAPACITY.

1. By the stringent rule of the common law a conveyance from a husband directly to the wife without the intervention of a trustee is void, but courts of equity refuse to follow in all cases this common-law rule. In equity the object to be accomplished and the considerations upon which such conveyances are made will be considered, and, if found good and meritorious, and free from imposition and fraud, will be sustained.

2. W. conveyed certain property, by deed, without the intervention of a trustee, to his wife by a second marriage for life, remainder to his minor son by such marriage, upon consideration of natural love and affection, and to provide a maintenance for them. At the time of the conveyance W. was advanced in age, and declared that his reason for making the conveyance was because he had given a due share of his property to his other children. There being nothing in the record to show the value of the property in the conveyance, or to rebut the statement as to the gift to the other children, held, in a contest between the children of the grantor by a former marriage and the widow and child by the second marriage, that the conveyance is good in equity, and will be sustained.

3. A conveyance to a wife for life, and at the termination of the life-estate to a child then in being, as tenant in common with any other heir or heirs of the grantor and the tenant for life, and, in default of any other such heirs, to the said child in fee, creates a vested remainder in such child.

4. Mere mental weakness will not authorize a court of equity to set aside a deed if it does not amount to inability to comprehend the effect and nature of the transaction, and is unaccompanied by evidence of imposition or undue influence.

5. A decree of a chancellor solely on questions of fact will not be disturbed unless the evidence clearly shows that it was erroneous.

Appeal from circuit court, Orange county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Bill by Aden E. Waterman and others against Reola A. Higgins and others to set aside and cancel a deed. The bill was dismissed, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Hodge and Foster & Gunby, for appellants. Andrew Johnson, for appellees.

MABRY, J. The heirs of Aden Waterman, deceased, by first marriage, filed a bill in the Orange county circuit court against his widow and son by a second marriage to set aside and cancel a certain deed executed by said decedent to his second wife for her life, and remainder in fee to the son. The second wife, Reola Waterman, to whom the deed was executed during coverture, subsequently married Elijah M. Higgins, and the name of the son by the second marriage is Lewis P. Waterman. The allegations of the bill which set forth the grounds for canceling the deed are as follows, viz.: "That about the 12th day of June, A. D. 1876, said Aden Waterman, in alleged consideration of the natural love and affection that he had to his wife, Reola A. Waterman, and in order to provide a sure maintenance for her and the issue of her and his bodies, did sell and convey to the said Reola A. Waterman all of his right, interest, claim, or title, either at law or in equity, to what is known as the 'Clay Springs Property,' lying and being in Orange county, Florida, whether such interest be several or joint, divided or undivided, said place being more particularly described as the 'place bought by Eliza Waterman from Dr. Hackney;' also all of his real property situate in Orange county, Florida, and described as the 'N. E. ¼ of the S. E. ¼ of section 36, township 20 south, of range 28 east, containing forty acres;' also the S. W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼, and the N. W. ¼ of S. W. ¼, of section 31, township 20 south, of range 20, containing in the aggregate one hundred and fifty-eight acres; to have and to hold the said lands to the said Reola A. Waterman for and during the term of her natural life, and, after the termination of said life-estate, then to the said Lewis P. Waterman in default of other heirs of the bodies of the said Aden E. Waterman and Reola Waterman, and to his heirs forever, in absolute fee-simple; and in case of the death of the said Lewis P. Waterman without heirs, then to the right heirs of Aden E. Waterman and their heirs forever; and which said deed was recorded in Marion county, Florida, on the 12th day of June, A.D. 1878, and in Orange county, Florida, on the ——— day of ———, A. D. 18—, all of which will more fully appear by reference to the certified copy of said deed herewith filed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and prayed to be taken as a part of this bill of complaint. And your orators allege and aver that said conveyance was invalid and inoperative for vagueness and uncertainty, and was in violation and disregard of the laws in force in the state of Florida regulating the transfer and conveyance of title to property, and was in violation and disregard of the rights of your orators as heirs at law of Aden Waterman, and is a cloud on the title of your orators as heirs at law of Aden Waterman to said property. And your orators further allege, aver, and so charge the fact to be, that at the time of the making of said conveyance the said Aden Waterman, from bad health, mental trouble, and old age, was utterly, totally, and entirely non compos mentis, insane, and without mind or freedom of will, and was incapable of making any contract whatever, or of judging of the proper disposal of his property. And they further aver and charge that he was entirely under the influence and mental control and volition of his said wife, Reola, and that by her exclusion of him from the society of his children by his first wife, and unfair and persistent efforts on her part to benefit herself, and by concealing her machinations from all the rest of his family, she induced him to execute said conveyance in fraud of the just rights and claims of your orators; much of the said property having been inherited by their said father from a deceased daughter, who derived her title from the deceased mother of complainants. Complainants aver and charge that said conveyance was not the voluntary and free act and deed of Aden Waterman, but was procured from him by the fraudulent representations and wicked influence and persecutions of the defendant Reola, and ought to be taken and held as inoperative, null, and void, and be canceled on the record." There are three grounds stated in the foregoing allegations for canceling the deed. The first is that the deed was executed in violation and disregard of the laws of the state in force at the time of its execution; the second is that the grantor, at the time he executed the deed, was non compos mentis, and incapable, on account of mental imbecility, to execute the deed; and, in the third place, that the deed was not voluntarily executed, but that the same was obtained by the fraudulent representations and wicked influence of the wife, Reola Waterman, now Reola Higgins. In connection with the allegation that the deed was executed in violation of law, it is averred that the deed is inoperative for vagueness and uncertainty, but wherein the vagueness or uncertainty exists is nowhere pointed out. The allegations of the bill above set out are not entirely correct in reference to the deed in question. From the deed introduced in evidence we are advised that it is a deed-poll, made direct, without the intervention of a trustee, from Aden Waterman to his wife, Reola A. Waterman, for and during her natural life. The consideration expressed in the deed is love and affection, and to provide a sure maintenance for the wife and the heirs of her body begotten by the grantor. The description of the land is: "All my interest, right, title, and claim, either at law or in equity, in what is known as the 'Clay Springs Place,' situate, lying, and being in Orange county, Florida, whether such interest be several or joint, divided or undivided, said place being known more particularly as the 'place bought by Eliza Waterman from Dr. Hackney,'" and other land in Orange county, described as in the foregoing portion of the bill. The habendum clause of the deed is as follows: "To have and to hold the aforesaid lands, tenements, and hereditaments unto the said Reola A. Waterman for and during the term of her natural life, without impeachment of or for any manner of waste in the use or disposal of the same, or of the rents, issues, or profits thereof; and after the determination of said estate for life, then to my infant child, Lewis P. Waterman, as tenant in common with any other heir or heirs of the body of the said Reola by the said Aden Waterman to be begotten, and to their heirs and assigns forever; and in default of other heirs of the body of said Reola A. Waterman by said Aden Waterman, then to the said Lewis P. Waterman, his heirs and assigns forever; and in case of the death of said Lewis P. Waterman without heirs, then, after the determination of the life-estate, in default of heirs of the bodies of the parties hereto, to the right heirs of Aden Waterman." We think there is no uncertainty as to the intention of the grantor in executing this deed. His purpose was to convey to his wife a life-estate, the remainder in fee to his son Lewis, then in existence, and such other children as might be born to him by the life-tenant. If no other child or children of the life-tenant by the grantor should be born, then the son Lewis was to take the entire remainder in fee, upon condition that if he died without heirs the estate should revert to the other heirs of the grantor in absolute right. At the time of the execution of the deed it was certain that Lewis would take a part of the remainder if he survived the life-tenant, and in the event of no subsequent issue he would take the entire estate. Aden Waterman died about three months after the execution of this deed, and Lewis Waterman is the only issue of the marriage of the grantor with Reola. Under the deed in question Lewis P. Waterman now has a vested estate in remainder. Paul v. Frierson, 21 Fla. 529.

It is alleged first that the deed in question was executed in violation of the laws of Florida. Counsel for appellants say "that the deed was a joint conveyance from husband and wife, and no statute of Florida authorizes it, while the common law expressly prohibits it." As a matter of fact the deed does not purport to be a joint deed from husband and wife, but it is a deed from the husband direct to the wife. The question then presented is whether or not a deed executed during coverture by the husband direct to the wife, without the intervention of a trustee, is of any validity. The conveyance of the homestead is not involved. An examination of the authorities on this subject has conducted us to the following conclusions: According to the stringent rules of the common law a conveyance from a husband directly to his wife, without the intervention of a trustee, is void. This results from the unity of husband and wife as established and maintained by the common law; but, while such deeds are void at common law, courts of chancery have from an early period refused to follow, in all cases, this common-law rule. In equity, an examination will be made into the motives, considerations, and objects to be accomplished by such conveyances. If made upon good or meritorious considerations, and free from imposition or fraud, they are looked upon with favor, and upheld in chancery. In the decision of this case it is not necessary to point out all the cases in which courts of equity will sustain deeds made by husbands directly to wives. It has been stated by some courts that whenever a contract would be good at law when made to a trustee for the benefit of the wife, a court of chancery will sustain the contract when made directly to the wife without the intervention of trustees. Certainly it would be a reproach to a court of chancery to suffer a good and meritorious conveyance to fail simply on account of the absence of a trustee. In order to promote justice and equity the court will provide in such cases a trustee, if necessary. The deed before us was made in consideration of love and affection, and to provide a maintenance for a wife and a minor child. The grantor was advanced in years, and in feeble health. For some time before the execution of the deed he declared his intention to give the property described therein to his wife and child; and repeatedly stated to his wife, and also to his near neighbors, that the reason why he wished to do so was because he had given a due share of his property to his other children. The proof does not show the value of the property in question, and there is nothing in the record to rebut the repeated statement of the grantor that he had made liberal donations to his other children. It is said in the case of Moore v. Page, 111 U. S. 117, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 388, that "it is no longer a disputed question that a husband may settle a portion of his property upon his wife, if he does not thereby impair the claims of existing creditors, and the conveyance is not intended as a cover to future schemes of fraud. * * * His right to make the settlement arises from the power every one possesses over his own property, by which he can make any disposition of it that does not interfere with the existing rights of others. As he may give it, or a portion of it, to strangers, or for objects of charity, without any one being able to call in question either his power or right, so he may give it to those of his own household,—to his wife or children. Indeed, settlements for their benefit are looked upon with favor, and are upheld by the courts. * * * In all cases where a husband makes a voluntary settlement of any portion of his property for the benefit of others who stand in such relation to him as to create an obligation, legally or morally, to provide for them, as in the case of wife or children or parents, the only question that can properly be asked is, does such a disposition of the property deprive others of any existing claims to it? If it does not, no one can complain if the transfer is made matter of public record, and be not designed as a scheme to defraud future creditors. And it cannot make any difference through what channels the property passes to the party to be benefited, whether it be by direct conveyance from the husband or through the intervention of others." The following authorities are referred to on this point: 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1380; Shepard v. Shepard, 7 Johns. Ch. 57; Hunt v. Johnson, 44 N. Y. 27; Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. 181; Dale v. Lincoln, 62 Ill. 22; Deming v. Williams, 26 Conn. 226; Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 225; Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638; Maraman's Adm'r v. Maraman, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 84; Burdeno v. Amperse, 14 Mich. 91; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 189 et seq.

Not only will a court of chancery refuse to cancel a deed direct from the husband to the wife, where he is in a situation to make a gift to her, and conveys a reasonable portion of his property for her maintenance, but such conveyances are regarded in equity with favor, and are sustained where they do not interfere with existing rights, or constitute a scheme for future frauds. It is not contended that the conveyance in question had the effect or was designed to defraud creditors of the grantor. The contention is between the children of the grantor by his first marriage and his widow and child by a second marriage. Our conclusion is that the deed from Aden Waterman to his wife will be sustained in chancery unless one of the other grounds alleged for setting it aside be sustained. The result here reached is based upon the doctrines of a court of chancery applicable to such case, and independent of any statutory enactment in this state. The second section of the act of 1845 provides that married women may hereafter become seised or possessed of real and personal property during coverture, by bequest, demise, gift, purchase, or distribution, subject to the provision that such property shall remain in the care and management of the husband. This was an enabling statute, passed to secure certain rights to married women, and there are no restrictions expressed in it as to the persons from whom the married women may acquire property. A question may arise, even in a court of law, whether or not the incapacity of a married woman to accept a deed direct from her husband has not been removed by this statute. But the proceedings here are in chancery, and, as before stated, our conclusions are based upon the rulings of such a court, independent of any statute.

The other grounds for setting aside the deed present questions of fact. Reversing the order in which they are stated above, we will first consider the third ground, namely, that the deed was not the voluntary act of Aden Waterman, but was obtained from him by the fraudulent practices and wicked influence of his wife, Reola. From the testimony before us we have no hesitancy in deciding that this ground is not sustained. Mrs. Higgins says that her husband told her before they were married that he intended to give her the Clay Springs place; and upon the birth of their child, Lewis, he promised to give his property to both of them. Several of Waterman's neighbors testify that he often declared his purpose to convey this property to his wife and child. There is no testimony in the record that will authorize us in concluding that Mrs. Higgins (then Mrs. Waterman) used improper influences in securing the deed from her husband.

The remaining ground alleged for setting aside the deed is that the grantor was, "from bad health, mental trouble, and old age, utterly, totally, and entirely non compos mentis, insane, and without mind or freedom of will, and was incapable of making any contract whatever, or of judging of the proper disposal of his property." We have already reached the conclusion that in a court of chancery the consideration for the conveyance from Aden Waterman to his wife is meritorious, and looked upon with favor by this court; and, further, that no fraud or undue influence is shown to have been practiced upon him to obtain the deed. The case, therefore, is not affected by considerations of undue influence practiced upon a person of weak mind, or where a deed is obtained from such a person upon a grossly inadequate consideration. The sole question is, did Aden Waterman, at the time he executed the deed, have sufficient intelligence to understand fully the nature and effect of the transaction? And in the determination of this question it must be kept in mind that mere mental weakness will not authorize a court of equity to set aside an executed contract if it does not amount to inability to comprehend the contract, and is unaccompanied by evidence of imposition or undue influence. Greer v. Greers, 9 Grat. 330; Aiman v. Stout, 42 Pa. St. 114; Graham v. Pancoast, 30 Pa. St. 89-99; 1 Devl. Deeds, §§ 68, 69. The burden, then, was upon appellants to show that there was no intelligent execution of the deed in question by their father, Aden Waterman. The proof shows that the deed was executed on the 12th day of June, A. D. 1878. It does not appear how old Mr. Waterman was when he executed the deed, though enough is shown from which we can reasonably infer that he was an old man. It is quite evident that he was at the time in feeble health, and died about three months after the deed was executed. Four witnesses were examined for complainants, and 14 for respondents. Robert Bullock testified for complainants that he had known Aden Waterman for 35 years before his death, and that during the months of May, June, July, August, and September, 1878, his mind was exceedingly weak, almost totally impaired. During said period, at times, his mind was more active than at others, but at no time during said months was he capacitated to transact business of importance, or contract judiciously with reference to the disposition of property. At the time of his death (which is shown by the testimony to have occurred on the 8th day of September, 1878) he was an absolute imbecile, wholly incapacitated to transact or attend to business of any kind. This witness testified further that Aden Waterman and his wife visited his home in Ocala, Fla., the day on which the deed was executed, but they concealed from him their purpose in reference to the execution of the deed. That the day following the execution of the deed Waterman's wife returned to her home, 20 miles from Ocala, and left her husband in town, and that he, in attempting to return to the house of witness at night, lost his way by reason of his mental weakness, and was brought in by a guide; and that witness' house was only 1,000 yards from the public square, and that Waterman was as familiar with its location and surroundings as with his own premises, when in sound mind. That when he was brought into the house, on being asked about his wife, said he had no wife, and that it was with difficulty he could be convinced that he was married. He further testified that Waterman remembered nothing of his old friends in Ocala with whom he had lived from boyhood, and, in the opinion of witness, he was a total mental wreck, and did not remember executing the deed to his wife on the preceding day. That Waterman remained at witness' house several days, and during this time was childish, incoherent, and seemed to have no lucid intervals. The special acts and conduct of Mr. Waterman about which the witness speaks occurred on the day after the deed was executed. A. J. White, one of complainants' witnesses, testified, in substance, that he had known Aden Waterman about 20 years, and intimately for 12 years. That during the months of May, June, July, and August, 1878, he had no mind, and was nothing more than a child. That he had business with Waterman, and found that he could not understand or comprehend at all. At various times for several years before his death, when he would go to Mr. Waterman's house, he would frequently not know witness; and that on Waterman's return from Ocala the time the deed was executed witness heard unusual blowing of the boat-whistle, and, on going to the landing, found Waterman in charge of the captain of the boat. That the captain asked witness to take care of Waterman, and witness found him crazy, and seeming to have no mind. This witness did not consider Waterman capable of executing the deed. Jeff. Driggers, another witness for complainants, testified that he had known Waterman for six or seven years before his death, and that he would at times during the months of May, June, July, and August, 1878, recognize witness when he saw him, and at other times he would not know him. His mind during this time was very much impaired, almost wholly gone. At the time of his death his mind was about gone. This witness says that he accompanied Mr. Waterman and his wife to Ocala the time the deed was executed, and on the way he seemed to have no judgment or reason. That when he passed the residence of Dr. Myers, his family physician, who had known him intimately, he asked who Myers was, and seemed to be unable to comprehend that he ever knew him; and that many other such acts occurred on the way, to show his weak mental condition. That when they got to Ocala Mrs. Waterman asked witness to go up town and get some whisky for Mr. Waterman, and on his return to the residence of Col. Bullock, where they stopped, Mr. Waterman did not know witness, and took him for a colored man who worked at Col. Bullock's. This witness further testifies that he lived near Mr. Waterman before he died, and had many opportunities to see him, and from frequent intercourse with him he did not hesitate to say that he was almost wholly incapacitated to attend to any business for some time before his death, or to make any disposition of his property that would require the exercise of judgment or discretion. Dr. T. J. Myers, the fourth witness for complainants, testified, in substance, as follows: That he had known Aden Waterman for over twenty years, and for four or five years before his death he was his family physician. That during the months of May, June, July, August, and September, 1878, Waterman was non compos mentis, and unable to attend to business or make disposition of his property. This witness says he visited Mr. Waterman frequently during the months of May, June, July, and August, 1878, and invariably found him without mental capacity, and that his weakness of mind dates from an attack of congestion of the brain in 1874. That when Waterman and wife were on their way in Ocala to execute the deed they and Driggers remained all night at his house, and Waterman's mind was no better then, and he regarded him as non compos mentis. That in the months of August and September, 1878, he found Mr. Waterman in a room in his house, by himself, with no clothes on, and so weak that he could not get back into the bed on falling out. That he would tear his clothes off his person; seemed to have no reason; and was perfectly helpless. There is a conflict as to a portion of Dr. Myers' testimony. Mrs. Higgins, formerly Mrs. Waterman, says that Dr. Myers did not attend her husband professionally during the year 1878, was at her house but once in that year, and then to see the child, Lewis. She produces a medical bill made out by Dr. Myers against Aden Waterman, and on it visits are charged for 1876 and 1877, but none for 1878. Mrs. Pendarvis, who lived with Mr. Waterman during the months of May and June, 1878, testified that Dr. Myers was at the house of Mr. Waterman but once while she lived there, and then to see the child, Lewis. Driggers, who accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Waterman to Ocala, says nothing about staying all night with Dr. Myers, but does say that when they passed the residence of Dr. Myers, Mr. Waterman asked who Myers was. For the respondents the attorney who drafted the deed, the officer who took Mr. Waterman's acknowledgment, a physician who specially examined his physical and mental condition, and many of his near neighbors, who were intimate with him, and who transacted business with him, were examined. We will not undertake to give a synopsis of the testimony of all these witnesses, as it would extend this opinion a considerable length. It appears from the evidence that Mr. Waterman formed the purpose to give the property in question to his wife some time before any question arose as to his mental condition. Mrs. Waterman and one other witness testify that he stated before his last marriage that he intended to give this property to his wife in the event of marriage. Several witnesses say that Mr. Waterman stated in their hearing, not long before the deed was executed, that he intended to convey this property to his wife and child, and the reason he assigned for doing so was because he had already made liberal donations to his other children. There is nothing in the record to show that he had not done so. For some time before his death, and up to the time the deed was executed, Mr. Waterman was engaged in a mercantile business, and conducted it without the aid of a clerk. When he was sick his wife says she helped him. Some eight or ten of his near neighbors, who traded with him and exchanged country produce for goods, testify that he transacted business in an intelligent way. Some say, at times he was out of his mind, but at other times he was as rational as any one. One witness, Robert Fort, who had known him for 22 years, says that "a few days before going to Ocala to make over his property to his wife and child, he asked me, with good sense, who was a careful person that he could get to go with him to Ocala; that his animal was wild, and he was afraid he could not manage her. I recommended Jeff. Driggers, who did go with him. Capt. Waterman said to me that he was going to give his property that he then owned to his wife and baby; that his baby was not raised nor educated, and he wanted them to have it for that purpose." He rode 20 miles in a conveyance to the county-seat; stopped at the residence of Col. Bullock, who married his daughter; sent for an attorney, and gave him specific instructions about preparing the deed. The attorney says that at the time Aden Waterman gave instructions about how to draw the deed he seemed to be very feeble, and lay on a bed, but he saw nothing to indicate a want of mental capacity. The deed was prepared, and the next day Mr. Waterman went before the clerk of the circuit court and acknowledged it. The clerk says that while Mr. Waterman appeared physically weak, he readily answered all questions properly asked him about the acknowledgment of the deed, and there was no apparent defect about his mind at the time. Dr. T. P. Gary, who knew Mr. Waterman for 20 years before his death, testified that he examined his physical and mental condition, he thinks, in the month of June, 1878. Mrs. Higgins says the examination by Dr. Gary was made in July, 1878. Dr. Gary says that physically he (Waterman) was rather debilitated; mentally he was strong and intellectual. In the opinion of this witness he was fully able at that time to discharge any ordinary business, and dispose of any property he desired. This purpose of Aden Waterman to convey his property to his wife and child, formed undoubtedly when his mind was clear and vigorous, he carries out in an intelligent way by directing a deed to be drawn in accordance with his wishes, and then executes it in the usual way before the proper officer. On final hearing the chancellor dismissed the bill. A decree solely on questions of fact will not be disturbed unless the evidence clearly shows that it was erroneous. Fuller v. Fuller, 23 Fla. 236, 2 South. Rep. 426. On the evidence before us we are unable to say that the decree was erroneous.

The decree dismissing the bill is therefore affirmed.

TAXATION—COLLECTION.

A revenue agent cannot sue for taxes due from a delinquent tax-payer on property which was subject to taxation if the taxes have not been assessed and put upon the assessment roll in the manner and by the officer provided by the statute.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county; JOHN D. GILLAND, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Wirt Adams, revenue agent, against the Vicksburg Bank, to collect taxes alleged to be due on its capital stock. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleged that defendant failed to make out its assessment, and turn it over to the assessor, and that, by reason of such failure, no taxes had been collected from it during certain years, being the years for which the taxes sued for were alleged to be due. Defendant demurred to the declaration on the ground that it was not alleged, and did not appear, that defendant refused to give in its taxable property to the assessor, on demand, or that it prevented the proper officers from assessing its property, as provided by law, when it had escaped assessment; that plaintiff did not show or allege any assessment by the proper officers for any of the years mentioned, but that it did show and aver that defendant's property was not assessed by the proper officers for such years, in consequence of which no obligation on the part of defendant to pay the taxes sued for existed.

Calhoon & Green, for appellant. Dabney & McCabe, for appellee.

WOODS, J. To reverse the judgment of the court below, it will be necessary for us to hold that the revenue agent may sue for taxes due from a delinquent tax-payer on property subject to taxation, which taxes, though required to be assessed in the usual method by the ordinary officer, and put upon the assessment rolls, have never been so assessed or so placed on the rolls. The recovery is sought for taxes alleged to be due on property which, as is charged by the declaration, has escaped taxation. The property, on the averments of the complainant, should have been placed on the assessment roll, as directed in section 498, Code 1880. If there was such failure on the part of the president and cashier of the bank as is denounced in the said section, then the whole capital stock authorized by the charter should have been assessed by the ordinary officer charged with that duty in the usual method. Though the revenue agent may not collect, (the property never having been assessed,) yet the loss alleged to have been sustained by the state by reason of the dereliction of the tax assessor, if such there was, may now be recovered by suit on the delinquent officer's bond. The remedies provided by law are ample to protect the interests of the state from detriment if the law be only executed in accordance with its plain requirements. Bearing in mind what we have already said in the case of State v. Thibedeaux, 10 South. Rep. 58, (at the present term,) further remark will appear to be superfluous. Affirmed.

CANCELLATION OF DEED—FRAUD.

A conveyance by defendant, an aged woman, while very sick, to plaintiffs, who had been for years her confidential advisers in business affairs, by which she conveyed to them all her property to collect rents, etc., and out of the proceeds to keep the property in repair, pay taxes, etc., and pay the residue to defendant during her life, and at her death the remainder to be divided between them, will be set aside where plaintiffs' statements to defendant, at the time of making the instrument, as to the effect thereof, were that, as proposed by her, in consideration of the instrument, they were to support her during her life.

Appeal from chancery court, Etowah county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Bill by R. B. Kyle and others against Augusta E. Perdue and others to foreclose a mortgage, of which they claim to be owners under an instrument alleged to have been executed by defendant Mrs. Perdue. Decree ordering the delivery of the mortgage to defendants by the complainants, and the cancellation of the same. Complainants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Denson, for appellants. Dortch & Martin, W. L. Whitlock, and Amos E. Goodhue, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The original bill in this case was filed for the foreclosure of a mortgage, the ownership of which was claimed by the appellants R. B. Kyle and Sam Henry under a certain instrument alleged by them to have been executed by Mrs. Augusta E. Perdue on the 9th day of August, 1886. The case was in this court at a former term on an appeal from a decree sustaining demurrers to the bill. It was then held that, so far as the title to the mortgage and the right to sue on it were concerned, the instrument was not testamentary in character, but operated as a deed. It was decided that the demurrers had been improperly sustained. Kyle v. Perdue, 87 Ala. 423, 6 South. Rep. 296. After the remandment of the cause Mrs. Perdue interposed an answer and cross-bill, wherein she denied the rights set up by Kyle and Henry under the instrument of August 9, 1886, and asked that it be canceled, on the grounds (1) that her signature to it was made at a time when she was physically and mentally incapable of transacting business of any kind, so that in signing the instrument she knew nothing of its contents or of its import; and (2) that in the alleged execution of said instrument she did not act freely and understandingly, but that her signature to the same was procured by the fraud and undue influence of Kyle and Henry, who had long been her confidential friends and business advisers, and as such had great influence over her, which they abused by getting her to convey all her property to them at a time when she was prostrated by a serious illness, and when she did not understand the terms or effect of the instrument which she signed. That instrument cannot stand if either of the above-mentioned grounds of attack upon it is sustained by the evidence. The testimony of several witnesses, whose credibility does not seem to be affected by any improper bias, tends strongly to show that on the 9th of August, 1886, Mrs. Perdue was in no condition, mentally or physically, to attend to the disposition of her property. Two colored women who waited on Mrs. Perdue during her sickness described her condition at and about the time the paper was signed as one of extreme illness. It appears from their testimony that she was physically helpless, was out of her head, and was unable to transact any business. Mrs. Hosmer, who was a near neighbor of Mrs. Perdue, and was present when the instrument in question was signed, describes her as completely prostrated mentally and physically at that time, and says that her mind was not then strong enough to enable her to know and understand the business she was engaged in. Mr. Mower, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, states that he had known Mrs. Perdue since 1850, and was for many years a friend of her deceased husband, who was a minister of the same church. He testifies that as minister he called to see Mrs. Perdue on the day the paper was signed, and that at that time her mind was seriously impaired, and that she was neither mentally nor bodily in a condition to attend to any business relating to the disposal of her property. Mr. Dortch, an attorney, states that on Sunday, the 8th of August, 1886, he was asked by R. B. Kyle to go to Mrs. Perdue's residence, Kyle stating that Mrs. Perdue wanted to dispose of her property, and wished the witness to draw the papers. Mrs. Perdue was found in a condition of such prostration that the business was postponed until next day. On the next morning Mr. Kyle again asked the witness to go to Mrs. Perdue's residence. The witness refused to go, at the same time telling Mr. Kyle that he had determined not to go back there, as it was his judgment and opinion that Mrs. Perdue was unable to dispose of her property, and that he would have nothing to do with drawing the papers. There was other evidence to support the allegation that Mrs. Perdue was at that time physically and mentally unfit to attempt the transaction of business. On the other hand, the witnesses introduced by the defendants to the cross-bill, including the physician who regularly attended upon Mrs. Perdue during her sickness, stated that she was competent to transact business, and that she was able to understand the instrument when she signed it. We are thus confronted with irreconcilable conflicts in the testimony upon the issue as to Mrs. Perdue's mental competency at that time.

In considering the evidence bearing upon the charge that Mrs. Perdue, in signing the instrument, was unduly influenced by Kyle and Henry, who abused the confidence which she reposed in them as her trusted friends and business advisers, it is material to ascertain at the outset the truth as to the relations existing between the parties. Kyle and Henry admit that they were on terms of intimate friendship with Mrs. Perdue, but deny that they occupied towards her any relation of special trust or confidence. From their own account of this matter the following state of facts is disclosed: Kyle and Henry were men of wealth, actively engaged in business pursuits. For many years prior to his death they were intimate personal friends of Dr. Perdue, who was a clergyman and a school-teacher. He frequently advised with them as to his business affairs. His means were invested in a residence in Gadsden, in railroad stocks and bonds, and in notes and mortgages. He had no children, and bequeathed all his property to his wife A few weeks before his death he told Mr. Henry that he wanted him to look after and care for his wife. This conversation Henry repeated toMrs. P erdue after her husband's death. After she became a widow both Henry and Kyle frequently advised her in regard to her business affairs. She had such confidence in them that she requested them to use money she had on hand, and pay her interest on it, as she preferred that disposition of it to any other investment. To satisfy her, each of them accepted some of her money in this way, giving their notes and paying the interest as it accrued. The box containing her valuables was kept in Mr. Henry's vault. He attended to getting the securities which her husband had left her transferred to her name, and looked after collections for her. She was an old woman, and it is plain that she regarded Kyle and Henry as her trusted friends; that she was in the habit of applying to them for advice in all business matters or troubles; and that they advised and assisted her whenever the occasion to do so was afforded. She had been quite ill for several weeks when, on August 8, 1886, Mr. Kyle called to see her in response to a message to the effect that she wished to see him on business. When he entered her room she said that she wanted to see him about her business. In the course of the conversation she said that she was very sick, and wanted to arrange her business before she got worse. She did not on that occasion state what disposition she wished to make of her property, but requested Mr. Kyle to bring Mr. Dortch to draw the papers. Kyle returned with Mr. Dortch during the afternoon of that day. At that time Mrs. Perdue was greatly prostrated, and stated that she was unable to attend to the business. She requested Mr. Kyle to bring Mr. Henry with him when he came again. Henry states that on the morning of August 9th Kyle said to him that Mrs. Perdue wished them to come to her house; that she wanted to make some disposition of her property. They accordingly went to her house that morning. Mr. Dortch having refused to go with them, they decided to take another attorney. The attorney who accompanied them had never spoken to Mrs. Perdue before that day. When her attention was called to his presence, and he spoke to her, she asked him if he was a lawyer. Both Kyle and Henry say that when they went to Mrs. Perdue's residence that morning they did not know what disposition she proposed to make of her property. From their own version of the circumstances attending their visit, it is plain that they understood that Mrs. Perdue wished to make some deposition of her property, and that she desired them to be present to see that the business was properly attended to. Mr. Henry says that when the instrument which she signed was read over to her she asked him if it was right. She sought and relied upon his advice, as she had often done before. In considering the transaction then had between Mrs. Perdue on the one hand, and Kyle and Henry on the other, due regard should be had to their attitude towards her as shown by their previous relations with her, and by the circumstances which led to their presence in her house on that occasion.

There are well-established rules to be applied in passing upon transactions between persons whose relations are such as to suggest that in dealings between them confidence is reposed and accepted to such an extent that one of them is subject to the influence or ascendency of the other. When such a relationship is shown to exist, if the one who was in a position to exert the influence claims the benefit of a contract with the person bestowing the confidence, the burden is cast upon the former to show affirmatively that the influence of his position was not unduly exerted; that the utmost good faith was exercised; and that all was fair, open, voluntary, and well understood. This rule as to the burden of proof is of familiar application to contracts by which benefits are conferred by a cestui que trust upon his trustee, by a ward upon his guardian, by a child upon his parent, by a client upon his attorney, by a patient upon his physician, or by any one upon his priest or spiritual adviser. Noble v. Moses, 81 Ala. 530, 1 South. Rep. 217; Dickinson v. Bradford, 59 Ala. 581; Malone v. Kelley, 54 Ala. 532; Boney v. Hollingsworth, 23 Ala. 690; Johnson v. Johnson, 5 Ala. 94; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Huguenin v. Baseley, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. 1156. The relations here mentioned are but instances in which the principle is applicable. It is not essential that any formal or technical relationship of a fiduciary character has been established between the parties. It suffices that they stand in such a relation to each other that, while it continues, confidence is justifiably reposed by one, and the influence which naturally grows out of that confidence is possessed by the other. When the parties are merely friends of each other, and deal upon terms of equality, the burden of showing the invalidity of any transaction between them is upon the one who assails it. But where their situation is such that, as a matter of fact, confidence is reposed on one side, and there is superiority on the other side, resulting from the influence acquired by the acceptance of the confidence bestowed, there is a presumption of undue influence to be rebutted by the superior party. Transactions between such persons may be entirely valid, but the one who is in a position to influence the other must show that the duty which he assumed by the acceptance of the confidence has been fully performed. Voltz v. Voltz, 75 Ala. 555; Shipman v. Furniss, 69 Ala. 555; Waddell v. Lanier, 62 Ala. 347; Ferguson v. Lowery, 54 Ala. 510; Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 99; Billage v. Southee, 9 Hare, 534; Tate v. Williamson, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 55; Kerr, Fraud & M. (Bump's Ed.) 183; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 956, 963; 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 647-654. In the present case it appears from the testimony of the beneficiaries in the instrument which is assailed that the grantor therein had long been in the habit of seeking and relying upon their advice and assistance in reference to her business affairs; that the circumstances leading to their visit to her on the occasion when the instrument was signed were such as to make it plain that she looked to them to see that the disposition of her property which she desired was properly made; and that by the arrangement which she then suggested, and to which they fully assented, they formally assumed the position of trustees of all her property, with powers implying her unlimited confidence in their fidelity to her interests. It does not often happen that any of the familiar relations of a fiduciary character between adults beget in fact more of trust and confidence than the statements of Messrs. Kyle and Henry show that they were the recipients of on the occasion in question. We are satisfied that it is incumbent upon them to show that Mrs. Perdue signed the instrument voluntarily, deliberately, and advisedly, with full knowledge of its nature and effect; that there was an absence of all undue influence, advantage, or imposition; and that they did not in any way mislead her as to the meaning or operation of the paper prepared for her signature. Balkum v. Breare, 48 Ala. 75; Jackson v. Harris, 66 Ala. 565; Haydock v. Haydock, 34 N. J. Eq. 570; Gillespie v. Holland, 40 Ark. 28; Baker v. Monk, 4 De Gex, J. & S. 388; and authorities cited supra. Mr. Kyle states that Mrs. Perdue said to Mr. Henry: "I wanted to see you and Col. Kyle about the disposal of my property. They want me to give it to the church, but I do not want to do it. I know what I want to do with it. I want you and Col. Kyle to take charge of all my property, and take care of me while I live, and when I die I want you to pay all my debts, if any, and put a tombstone like the one over my dear husband's grave over my grave, and then I want the balance of my property divided equally between you and Col. Kyle, reserving to Bookie and Zeebie the lots set apart to them. Can I do it?" Col. Henry replied very promptly, "You certainly can, madam, if you desire to do it." Henry says: "When I went into her room I went up to her bed. I asked her how she felt. After answering me, she told me that she had sent for Mr. Kyle and me; that she wanted to give him and me everything she had in trust; that we were to look after her business and attend to her business. I won't be certain what other word she used. She said that she wanted to give it to me and Kyle square out, the property to be held by us during her life in trust for her support. This is all that I recollect now that she said before the paper was written." As to what occurred when the paper was signed, he says: "Capt. Cunningham read over the paper to her. She remarked that she wanted to give Kyle and me the property in trust. She seemed not to have grasped the idea of its being given in trust in the paper. It was then re-read to her. She then asked me if that was right, and I told her, if what she told me just before the paper was written was right, it was. She then took pen in hand, as above stated." And also, in reply to an inquiry as to what explanation was made by Cunningham: "The explanation given by him was that she gave her property to Kyle and Henry, but that they were to have it for her support." Henry called to see Mrs. Perdue after her recovery, and she then asked him as to the contents of the instrument which she had signed during her illness. He testifies: "I told her that in the paper she had given everything she had to Kyle and me; that we were to look after her and support her, and have the property in trust for that purpose; and that in the paper she authorized us to make a deed each to Bookie and Zeebie of an eighth of an acre each, with the houses where they lived. She asked me then if the interest on her papers would not support her, or, if she was to get sick again, how was she to be provided for. I told her that it was Kyle's and my duty under the deed to take care of her and support her." It is plain from the testimony of both Kyle and Henry that they understood that, by accepting the benefit of the instrument, they became bound to provide for the support of Mrs. Perdue during her life, without regard to the sufficiency of the income to be received by them from her property. They are careful to state that the money and supplies which they have furnished her were from their own means, and were not derived from the trust-estate. The instrument which was signed by Mrs. Perdue does not provide for such a disposition of her property as the statements of Kyle and Henry show was proposed and was understood to be effected. There is nothing in the instrument to impose upon the grantees any duty to care for or support the grantor during her life. They are only required to pay her so much of the income from the property as may be left after deducting all expenses for repairs and for all charges, taxes, and assessments. No provision is made for the payment of the grantor's debts, or for the erection of a tombstone over her grave. The trust for her support during her life does not extend to the property conveyed, but only to the income therefrom. Yet the trustees do not intimate that they understood that her claim upon the trust-estate for a support was to be limited to the income. That, however, is the extent of the provision in her favor. The effect of the instrument which was prepared and signed is that Mrs. Perdue strips herself of all beneficial interest in her property except as to the net income therefrom during her life, and that the grantees do not undertake to contribute one cent to her support, either from their own means or from the corpus of the trust-estate. If Mrs. Perdue signed the instrument on Henry's assurance that it was right, and that it conformed to her directions, it is plain that she acted under an entire misapprehension of its real meaning and effect. A comparison of the contents of the instrument with the statements by Kyle and Henry as to what was proposed and understood, leads inevitably to the conclusion that in signing the instrument Mrs. Perdue did not understand its contents. Henry's own statement shows that he misled her, whether he intended to do so or not. The grantees acquired greater benefits than were intended to be conferred, and they did not assume the obligations to which they consented. The disposition of her property which Messrs. Kyle and Henry say Mrs. Perdue expressed a desire to make was not effected by the instrument which she signed after being assured by Henry that the paper conformed to her directions. If that instrument is allowed to stand, the grantees thereby acquire all of the grantor's property, of every description, without becoming liable to secure to her the substantial advantages which were contemplated to be provided for in her favor by the arrangement which was proposed. The testimony of the grantees themselves shows that the grantor never intended to make such a disposition of her property as is embodied in the instrument which she signed. In view of the relations of trust and confidence existing between the parties, and of the evident reliance by the grantor on the false assurances of one of the grantees, an instrument, the provisions of which fall so far short of the grantor's understanding of its operation in her favor, cannot prevail against her impeachment of it. The result is that, accepting the version of the transaction as detailed by the parties who assert its validity, it must, upon their own statements, be pronounced invalid. It is therefore unnecessary to pass upon the conflicts in the testimony upon the issue as to Mrs. Perdue's mental competency at the time she signed the instrument. It is urged that, by accepting money and supplies from Kyle and Henry, Mrs. Perdue ratified the invalid instrument. It is plain that she had no intention to ratify it. She was asserting its invalidity in the courts. Her adversaries, by the active assertion of their claim, had succeeded in cutting her off from the enjoyment of the income from her property. She received their contributions towards her support during the pendency of this suit, and while she was under the stress of want, caused by the withdrawal of her accustomed means of livelihood. On one of the receipts which was presented for her signature she wrote, "I take this money because I am starving." Receipts given in such circumstances are entitled to no weight as evidence of a free consent to confirm the voidable transaction. The evidence by no means shows that the alleged acts of ratification were free, voluntary, and well understood. Voltz v. Voltz, 75 Ala. 567; Thompson v. Lee, 31 Ala. 292; Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus. Eq. 651; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 964. We discover no error of injury to the appellants in the decree of the chancery court. Affirmed.

ADAMS v. STATE.

HOMICIDE — INDICTMENT — PLEADING — CHANGE OF VENUE — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — CONDUCT OF TRIAL.

1. In an indictment for murder it is essentially necessary to set forth particularly the manner of the death and the means by which it was effected; but in stating the facts which constitute the offense no technical terms are required, and an averment of the manner and means by which the deceased came to his death, in concise and ordinary language, and in such a way as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended, is sufficient.

2. It is within the discretion of the trial court to allow a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn for the purpose of pleading in abatement.

3. A plea in abatement alleging that two members of the grand jury that found an indictment against an accused were not legally registered voters, and that the illegality of their registration consists in the fact that they were not registered within the time prescribed by the general election law, but were registered, or their names placed upon the registration books, within the time prescribed by chapter 3577, Laws Fla., being an act to provide for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention held in 1885, held, that the plea is not good, for the reason that persons duly registered under said act were as duly-registered voters of the county as those who registered under the general election laws.

4. An application for a change of venue is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and its ruling refusing the change will not be disturbed, unless it appear from the facts presented that the court acted unfairly, and abused a sound discretion.

5. The refusal of the court to grant a change of venue, where the application is based upon the grounds that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in a county, and that the accused is odious to the inhabitants thereof, and supported by the uncorroborated affidavit of the accused, although the facts therein stated, if true, are sufficient to require the change, will not be reversed on writ of error, in the absence of anything to show that the decision of the court was not based upon the insufficiency of the proof of the facts alleged in the affidavit, and that the accused was not prevented from getting corroborative evidence by hostile public sentiment.

6. A party has no right to cross-examine a witness, except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination; and if he wishes to examine the witness as to other matters he must do so by making the witness his own.

7. An accomplice, jointly indicted, and as to whom the indictment has not been disposed of, can testify on behalf of the state against his co-defendant on a separate trial; and in such case the wife of the accomplice is a competent witness for the state.

8. A map, diagram, or picture, whether made by the hand of man or by photography, verified as a correct representation of physical objects about which testimony is offered, and which does not contain thereon indications of matters and things in question before the jury, and not a part of the physical objects when the map, diagram, or picture was made, is admissible in evidence for the use of witnesses in explaining their evidence, and to enable the jury to better understand the case.

9. Under the defense of an alibi it is sufficient if there is enough evidence to produce in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the prisoner at the scene of the killing. The evidence of an alibi need not make it impossible for the prisoner to be present at the killing, nor is it required that such evidence be absolutely clear; but it is sufficient if it raises a reasonable doubt in the mind of the jury, from all the circumstances of the case, whether or not the accused was present at the killing.

10. It is the province of the court to pass upon the admissibility of the evidence, but, when admitted, its credibility and weight are questions for the jury. The trial judge, under our system, is prohibited from intimating to the jury his views as to the effect, weight, or credibility of any testimony before him.

11. A charge to the jury that, "when proof of an alibi is attempted, and proven to the satisfaction of the jury, it is conclusive of the case. When it is attempted, and the proof to sustain it is not satisfactory, the failure to prove it satisfactorily is a circumstance unfavorable to the defendant, but it is no more so than an attempt to clear himself by any other false or fabricated testimony,"—held to be erroneous.

12. It is not proper for a trial judge to state in his charge to the jury the facts of a case decided by our supreme court, and then submit to them the question whether or not that case and the one under consideration are parallel. Such a course would not be giving the law of the case, but would leave the jury to form notions of the law by a comparison of the two cases.

13. Under an indictment for murder in the first degree, the question of premeditation is one of fact, to be ascertained by the jury from the facts and circumstances of the case. The law does not presume malice or premeditation from the fact of killing, but such state of mind is to be ascertained by the jury from the circumstances surrounding the killing.

14. In a capital case the prisoner must be present during the trial, and no steps can be taken by the court in his absence.

Error to circuit court, Columbia county; JOHN F. WHITE, Judge. Reversed.

Indictment of William Adams for murder. From a conviction of murder in the first degree defendant brings error.

B. B. Blackwell and A. J. Henry, for plaintiff in error.

MABRY, J. William Adams, the plaintiff in error, Ike Spanish, and T. P. Bethea, were jointly indicted on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1891, at a term of the circuit court for Columbia county, Fla., for the murder of James Moore. Adams was indicted as principal in the first degree, Spanish as principal in the second degree, and Bethea as accessory before the fact.

It is charged in the indictment (the formal parts omitted) "that William Adams, Ike Spanish, and T. P. Bethea, late of said county, laborers, on the 19th day of January, A. D. 1891, at and in the county, circuit, and state aforesaid, with force and arms did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and of their malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of a human being, make an assault upon one James Moore. And the said William Adams, with a certain double-barrel shotgun, then and there loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, commonly called 'buckshot,' and by him, the said William Adams, then and there had and held in his two hands, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of him, the said James Moore, shoot off and discharge at, to, against, and upon the body of him, the said James Moore, thereby and by thus striking the body of him, the said James Moore, with the said leaden bullets, commonly called 'buckshot,' so shot off and discharged out of the double-barrel shotgun aforesaid, unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of him, the said James Moore, inflicted then and there in and upon the chest and belly of him, the said James Moore, three mortal wounds, each of the depth of six inches and of the breadth of one-quarter of an inch, of which said mortal wounds the said James Moore then and there instantly died.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further say that the said Ike Spanish then and there unlawfully and feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of the said James Moore, was then and there present, aiding, abetting, helping, comforting, assisting, and maintaining the said William Adams, the murder of him, the said James Moore, in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further say that the said T. P. Bethea did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of him, the said James Moore, incite, move, aid, counsel, hire, abet, assist, procure, and command the said William Adams, the murder of him, the said James Moore, as aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit.

"And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said William Adams, Ike Spanish, and T. P. Bethea, the said James Moore, then and there, in manner aforesaid, and by the means aforesaid, unlawfully, feloniously, and of their malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design to effect the death of him, the said James Moore, him, the said James Moore, then and there did kill and murder, against the peace and dignity of the state of Florida, and contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided."

Adams and Spanish were in custody when the indictment was presented in court, and, so far as the record shows, Bethea has not been arrested.

On motion of the state a severance was granted, and William Adams, the plaintiff in error, after arraignment and plea, was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree. Motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial were overruled, and by judgment of the court the sentence of death was passed upon this accused. From this judgment a writ of error was taken to this court.

The first and second assignments of error call in question the sufficiency of the indictment, are in substance the same, and will be considered together. Before arraignment and plea the plaintiff in error moved to quash the indictment, (1) "because it alleged a premeditated design to effect the death of a human being, without naming the deceased as the person whose death was intended to be effected through the premeditated design alleged; (2) because said indictment is argumentative, and states a conclusion, and does not allege in positive terms that the deceased was struck and penetrated by the means alleged to have caused his death; (3) because said indictment is vague, indefinite, and uncertain, and calculated to embarrass the defendant in his defense." The overruling of this motion is the first error assigned. After verdict, a motion in arrest of judgment, alleging substantially the same defects in the indictment, was denied, and this is presented as the second error. We do not think the court committed any error in overruling the motions to quash the indictment and in arrest of judgment. As will be seen by reading the indictment, the principal allegations of which are given above, three persons are jointly indicted,—one as committing the felonious act, a second as present, aiding and abetting, and a third as inciting, counseling, hiring, and procuring the commission of said act. It is true, as contended, that the indictment states that the three persons named did, with the intent and in the manner alleged, with the design to effect the death of a human being, make an assault upon one James Moore; but, taking the indictment together, we think it is clear that the person whose death was designed to be effected was James Moore. If the words, "to effect the death of a human being," be discarded as surplusage, the averment would be positive and direct that the accused, with force and arms, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and of their malice aforethought, and from a premeditated design, make an assault upon one James Moore. Another objection urged to this indictment is that it is argumentative, and does not allege in positive terms that the deceased was struck and penetrated by the means alleged to have caused his death.

It is essentially necessary in an indictment for murder to set forth particularly the manner of the death and the means by which it was effected. The facts which constitute the offense must be stated with such certainty and precision that the defendant may be enabled to judge whether they constitute an offense or not, and also the character or species of offense they do constitute, to enable him to prepare his defense, to plead a conviction or acquittal in bar of another prosecution for the same offense, and that there may be no doubt as to the judgment which may be given in case of conviction. In alleging offenses created by statute the language of the statute, of course, must be employed. In stating the facts and circumstances which constitute the offense no technical terms are required to be employed, but an averment of the means and the manner by which the deceased came to his death, in concise and ordinary language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, is sufficient. In the case of Pittman v. State, 25 Fla. 648, 6 South. Rep. 437, the indictment charged that the defendant, "in and upon one George H. Hughes, with a certain deadly weapon, to-wit, an open knife, which he, the said Edward F. Pittman, was then and there armed, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought did make an assault, and the said George H. Hughes in and upon the right side of the neck of him, the said George H. Hughes, then and there with the knife aforesaid, and by cutting, stabbing, and wounding, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, to kill and murder;" and it was held that, while the indictment was not artistically drawn, there was in it enough to show that Pittman was the party doing the cutting, and that Hughes was the party cut, and that the indictment shows by whom the assault was made, how it was made, and upon whom it was made. The averments in the indictment before us are not as direct and positive as they could be made, still we think they are sufficient to show that the plaintiff in error did unlawfully, feloniously, and with a premeditated design to effect the death of James Moore, shoot off and discharge at, to, against, and upon the body of the said James Moore, a certain double-barrel shotgun held by the accused, and loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, and by striking the body of the said James Moore with said leaden balls, so shot out of the gun aforesaid, inflicted three mortal wounds upon the body of the said James Moore, at the place mentioned, and in the manner alleged, in the indictment, and of which said mortal wounds the said James Moore did then and there instantly die. The allegations here are sufficient to inform the accused of the nature of the offense intended to be charged, and the manner of its commission. In the event of conviction or acquittal the accused would find no difficulty in pleading successfully the judgment in bar of a second prosecution.

The action of the court in overruling the motion of defendant, Adams, to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and plead in abatement, is assigned as error. The indictment was presented in court on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1891, during a regular term of court, but the trial was not had until a special term of the court, beginning on the 23d day of March, A. D. 1891. Before the adjournment of the regular term the state's attorney moved for the arraignment of the defendant, Adams, to which he objected, for the reason that, as the case had to go over until the special term, he desired until that time to examine the record, and ascertain as to the legality of the organization of the grand jury that found the indictment; his counsel also stating that they were not then prepared to plead to the indictment. The court ruled that the defendant should then be arraigned, which was done, and he pleaded not guilty. At the special term the defendant, Adams, moved the court to allow him to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and to be allowed to interpose a plea in abatement of the indictment, at the same time presenting his plea, properly sworn to before the clerk of the circuit court of Columbia county. The court refused this motion. The action of the court requiring defendant, Adams, to plead at the regular term, and the refusal to allow him to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and plead in abatement at the special term, are both assigned as error.

It is within the discretion of the circuit court to allow a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn for the purpose of pleading in abatement. This court has recognized this right in the case of Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909, and it is unnecessary for us to cite the numerous authorities sustaining the position. In the Savage Case it is said by Chief Justice RANDALL: "It may have been within the discretion of the court to permit the accused to withdraw the plea of not guilty for the purpose of pleading abatement, but such discretion should never be reviewed or set aside." It would seem from this language that the exercise of the discretion of the court in such matters is not subject to review. It does appear, however, that the court in the same case looked into the merits of the plea in abatement tendered, and held that the court did not err in refusing the motion to withdraw the plea in bar, and for leave to plead in abatement. Without stopping to settle the question whether or not the decision in the Savage Case precludes a review of the discretionary powers of the circuit court in such matters, we proceed to inquire into the merits of the plea in abatement tendered. It follows, of course, that, if the plea is not good, no harm has been done the plaintiff in error in forcing him to plead before an opportunity was given to look into the validity of the indictment. The plea sets up the fact that two members of the grand jury that found the indictment were not legally registered voters of Columbia county, and the illegality of their registration is alleged to exist in the fact that the registration books of Columbia county show the parties to have been registered, or their names placed on the registration books, on the 14th and 23d days of April, A. D. 1885. It is contended by the plaintiff in error that the two jurors named in the plea did not register within the time prescribed by the general election law, but they did register within the time prescribed by the special act of the legislature, (chapter 3577, Laws Fla.,) providing for the calling of a constitutional convention. The second section of this act provides that "there shall be held throughout the state, under the provisions of the election laws of the state, on the first Tuesday in May, a general election for delegates to said convention, which shall consist of one hundred and eight members, apportioned among the several counties and senatorial districts, in accordance with the present representation in the legislature; that the registration books of the several counties be opened in the various precincts for the registration of voters not now legally registered from the first Monday in April, 1885, to ten days next preceding the election; and that the clerk of the circuit court appoint registration officers for such precincts." The effect of this act was to open the general registration books within the time mentioned for the registration of all voters legally entitled to registration and not already registered; and when persons were registered, and their names placed upon the general registration books, under and by virtue of this act, they were as much legally registered voters as any others whose names appeared upon the books. The legislature had the power to direct the opening of the books for general registration at any time, and it was the purpose of the act of 1885 to open the general registration books from the first Monday in April, 1885, to 10 days preceding the first Tuesday in May, 1885. The fact that the registration permitted at that time was for the purpose of voting for delegates to the constitutional convention makes no difference. The election for such delegates was held under the provisions of the general election laws, and the registration books used for this election were the same used for all general elections. There was nothing in the plea to show that the jurors named were not legally registered voters of Columbia county; and, conceding that we have the power to review the action of the court in refusing to allow the plea to be interposed, it follows that the court did not err in so doing. There is nothing in the case of State v. Commissioners, 20 Fla. 859, in conflict with the conclusion here reached.

The refusal of the court to grant a change of venue to the defendant, Adams, is assigned as error.

The accused, Adams, before the beginning of the trial at the special term, made a motion for a change of venue on the grounds that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in Columbia county by reason of extreme prejudice of the inhabitants of that county against him, and because he was odious to such inhabitants. In support of this motion the accused presented to the court his own affidavit, uncorroborated by the affidavit or sworn testimony of any other person. In his affidavit the accused stated that the murder for which he was indicted was an assassination, the deceased having been shot down in his own house in the presence of his family; that several days after the killing, one Ike Spanish was arrested on suspicion, and under threats of his life if he did not confess and implicate others, and also under promises of protection if he would divulge, he confessed to a participation in said murder, and implicated accused, as principal in the crime, and one T. P. Bethea, as accessory before the fact; that thereupon the accused, Adams, was arrested on said charge, and bound and held in chains, and a large and excited crowd of people, with rifles, shotguns, pistols, and other weapons, assembled around him and threatened to lynch him; that accused verily believed from the demonstrations of violence on the part of said people that he was in imminent danger of being lynched, and that he would have been lynched with said Spanish but for the fact that the other person implicated had not been arrested; further, that in February, 1889, one Keene was assassinated in Columbia county by some unknown person, in a manner similar to the way in which the person was killed for which he now stands indicted, and that he was suspicioned of the murder of said Keene, but which was without foundation, except said accused at the time of Keene's death was in a controversy with him; that at the fall term, 1889, of the circuit court for Columbia county, said accused was indicted for the murder of Keene, and at the said term of the court eight other indictments were presented by the grand jury of said county against him, one of which was for personal violence on said Keene in his lifetime; that of the said nine indictments against him four were tried and verdicts of acquittal rendered, and the others were dismissed on the part of the state; that while said accused was entirely innocent of either of the crimes charged against him, nevertheless the finding of said indictments, all at one term of court, and the arrest and arraignment of said accused thereon, had the effect to greatly prejudice the public mind against him throughout the county, and render him extremely odious. The accused further states in his affidavit that the confession of the said Ike Spanish, implicating him, was published in two newspapers in Columbia county, and this had the effect to further prejudice, excite, and irritate the public mind against him. Copies of the papers giving an account of the confession made by Ike Spanish and the arrest of the accused, Adams, are attached to the affidavit as a part of it. The publications in the newspapers give an account of the killing of James Moore, the public indignation manifested over it in the neighborhood where it occurred, and a determined purpose on the part of the people by diligent search and investigation to find out the perpetrators of such a crime. From the newspaper accounts it appears that there was much excitement in the neighborhood of the deceased, and for miles around, over his death. In the accounts published there is no advice given to deny the parties implicated a fair and impartial trial in the courts of the country. One of the papers particularly cautions the people to act deliberately, and to give the accused a right to be heard, and a fair and impartial trial. The accused further states in his affidavit that, by reason of the newspaper publications and the other matters stated in his affidavit, the public mind was inflamed against him, and that by reason thereof, at the request of the governor of the state, he was transferred from Columbia county to Duval county in this state, to prevent his being lynched; that at the last term of the court, which was about three weeks prior to the presentation of the application for a change of venue, when the accused asked for a continuance of the prosecution against him, there were many rumors afloat that, if said continuance was granted, accused would be lynched, and but for the fact that a special term of the court was ordered to convene in a short time for the trial of the accused he is satisfied that said threats would have been put in execution; that since the assembling of the court it has been made known to the counsel for accused that there is an organization now in force for the purpose of lynching him in the event of his acquittal or conviction, claiming as a justification for their unlawful purpose that, if the accused be acquitted, it will be a wrongful acquittal, and, if he is convicted, instant execution should take place in order to prevent an appeal to a higher court; that by reason of such matters the public mind is greatly prejudiced against the accused, and it will be impossible to secure a jury in said county to try him uninfluenced thereby.

The state made no counter-showing, and on the motion and affidavit of the accused the court refused to change the venue. We have duly considered this application of the accused for a change of venue, and have reached the conclusion, on the showing made, the verity of the facts stated appearing only by the uncorroborated affidavit of the accused, that we cannot disturb the action of the court. It is true that the constitution guaranties to every person under a criminal prosecution a trial by an impartial jury, and by statute it is provided that when it shall appear to the satisfaction of the trial court by affidavit that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the offense is committed the court shall direct that the accused be tried in some other county, where a fair and impartial trial can be had. It is said in the decisions that the principles which should guide the trial court in such matters are simple. If it be shown to the reasonable satisfaction of the court that an impartial trial and an unbiased verdict cannot be reasonably expected, the venue ought to be changed. Posey v. State, 73 Ala. 490. To grant an accused less than this would deprive him of a right given, under our system, both by the constitution and statute. As has been well expressed in the case of Seams v. State, 84 Ala. 410, 4 South. Rep. 521: "These provisions have in view not only the object of securing a just verdict, but a just mode of procedure in obtaining it." In Florida, however, such matters are, to a large extent, committed to the trial court; not absolutely so, because its decision is subject to review here. An application for a change of venue is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and its ruling refusing the change will not be disturbed unless it appear from the facts presented that the court acted unfairly, and was guilty of a palpable abuse of sound discretion. McNealy v. State, 17 Fla. 198; Irvin v. State, 19 Fla. 872. Before us there is nothing to overrule the action of the court in refusing the change, except the uncorroborated affidavit of the accused. If we consider the extracts from the newspapers in connection with the affidavit, they do not show, independent of what the accused swears, that the public prejudice against him is such that he cannot obtain a fair trial in the county. Neither do we think that because there was applause in the court-room during the argument of the state's attorney it is shown that a fair and impartial jury had not been obtained in the county. The application here for a change of venue, based, as it is, on the ground that the public mind was so prejudiced against the accused, and that he was so odious, that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in Columbia county, if sustained, must be upon the unsupported affidavit of the accused. We think it would be unsafe to announce such a rule on such a showing. Counsel for plaintiff in error have referred us to no case, and we have been unable to find any, where the discretionary action of the trial court has been set aside on such showing. In the affidavit before us it is shown that the accused has been in custody, and most of the time out of the county, since he was suspected, and hence his means of knowing the public sentiment in the county must be by information derived from others. Nor does it appear that he has made any effort to get corroborative evidence of his statement, and had been prevented from getting it by reason of hostile public sentiment. We do not intimate that what he has stated, if true, is not sufficient to entitle him to a change of venue, but we do say that in a case like this we are unwilling to disturb the decision of the trial court, which may have been based upon the insufficiency of the proof of the facts alleged, without further showing than the uncorroborated affidavit of the accused. To hold otherwise would permit every accused to obtain a change of venue at his pleasure, or force the trial judge, on such ex parte showing, however groundless the application may appear to him, to suspend the regular business of the court, and inquire into the public sentiment in the county in reference to the accused.

It is alleged for error that the court sustained the state's objection to the question propounded to Mrs. Moore, the wife of the deceased.

The ruling of the court was based upon the ground that the question was not in cross-examination of anything brought out by the state on the examination in chief. The rule stated by Greenleaf, that a party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination, and, if he wishes to examine him as to other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, is recognized in this state. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 445; Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909. In the examination in chief of Mrs. Moore she was asked about the killing of her husband, but stated nothing in reference to the defendant. She knew that her husband was shot down in his house just after dark, but she did not see the person who shot him. There is nothing in her examination which, under the rule, entitled the defendant to examine her on the cross as to the relations between her husband and the defendant, and the court did not err in sustaining the objection. In this connection we will consider the assignment of error based upon the ruling of the court sustaining the objection of the state's attorney to the question asked the witness Andrew Spanish, who was introduced as a witness for the state, and testified that in the evening of the night the deceased was killed he was in the field with his father, mother, and sister, and that the accused, Adams, came in the lane, and called him and his father; that they went to the accused in the lane, and the witness gave him a gun; and that the accused and witness' father went towards the river. On cross-examination the witness was asked if he knew where his father went that evening, and the court excluded the question, on the ground that it was not in cross of anything brought out in chief. This ruling was not correct. The father had testified that he and the accused went to Moore's house that evening, and just after dark the accused shot Moore. Andrew Spanish was put on the stand to corroborate the father in his testimony. He says that he saw his father and the accused together in the lane, and saw them go towards the river. It was proper on the cross to prove by this witness, if he knew, where his father went that evening, and the inquiry as to his knowledge of this matter was preliminary to such examination. Savage v. State, supra.

Another ground of error is that the court erred in permitting the witness Hanks to testify as to statements made to him by the accused.

It appears from the record that the witness Hanks was present when the accused was arrested, and heard him say where he was at the time Moore was shot. Hanks was not an officer, and no threats were made against the accused, or promises held out to him, at the time of his statement. The court ruled that the statements of the accused as to his whereabouts at the time of the homicide could be proved by the state. In this, we think, the court was correct. Newton v. State, 21 Fla. 53.

It is assigned for error, and contended here, that the court erred in allowing Ike Spanish, an accomplice, and jointly indicted with the accused, Adams, to testify against him.

As has already been stated, Adams and Spanish were jointly indicted—the one as principal in the first degree, and the other as principal in the second degree—for the murder of James Moore.

After a severance, procured at the instance of the state, Spanish was tendered as a witness on the part of the prosecution against Adams, and was permitted to testify over his objection. We do not understand that the objection goes to the extent that no accomplice can testify under any circumstances against his associate in crime, but that an accomplice, jointly indicted, and as to whom the indictment has not been disposed of, cannot testify as a witness against his co-defendant, whether the trial be joint or separate. It has been announced in several cases decided by this court that an accomplice is a competent witness against an accused on trial. Sumpter v. State, 11 Fla. 247; Keech v. State, 15 Fla. 591; Bacon v. State, 22 Fla. 51; Tuberson v. State, 26 Fla. 472, 7 South. Rep. 858. In Tuberson v. State, supra, although it is said that an accomplice is a competent witness, and a conviction upon his testimony may be sustained, yet there was no such evidence in the case. In Sumpter v. State, supra, the accomplice who testified was not under indictment; and in Bacon v. State, supra, although the accomplices who testified were jointly indicted, no objection was made by the defendants on trial to such testimony. In Keech v. State, supra, the accomplice who testified for the state was jointly indicted with the party against whom the evidence was given, and it appears from the record that the defendant objected to the accomplice testifying. It is contended that at common law a party to the record was incompetent as a witness for himself, or for or against a co-defendant, and that in criminal cases such disability has not been removed in this state by statute. At common law, when two persons were jointly indicted, neither was admissible as a witness for his co-defendant, and this rule obtained whether they were tried jointly or separately. If during the trial no testimony should be developed against a defendant, and the state refuses to dismiss as to him, the court has the power, and it would be its duty, to submit his case first to the jury, and after acquittal he can testify for the other defendant. State v. Roberts, 15 Mo. 28; Shay v. Com., 36 Pa. St. 305; State v. Jones, 51 Me. 125; Moss v. State, 17 Ark. 327; People v. McIntyre, 1 Parker, Crim. R. 371; State v. Bruner, 65 N. C. 499; Rex. v. Rowland, Ryan & M. 401; Com. v. Marsh, 10 Pick. 57; People v. Bill, 10 Johns. 95; Foster v. State, 45 Ark. 328; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 1020, 1021. As parties jointly indicted in the same record cannot be called as witnesses to testify for each other, whether tried jointly or separately, it is contended that an accomplice jointly indicted with another cannot be used by the state as a witness against his co-defendant until the case has been disposed of as to the accomplice who proposes to testify. The case of Edgerton v. Com., 7 Bush, 143, sustains fully this position. The decision in the case of State v. Chyo Chiagk, 92 Mo. 395, 4 S. W. Rep. 704, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, is based upon a statute. Section 1079, 1 Bish. Crim. Proc., at first glance, seems to sustain this view. It is here stated that, "if two persons are jointly indicted, neither of the defendants can be a witness for or against the other, even though not tried together, until the case is disposed of, either by the conviction or acquittal of the defendant whose testimony is to be used, or by the entry of nol. pros. as to such defendant. One method of procedure, therefore, when there is pending such a joint indictment, and one of the defendants is to be admitted as state's evidence against the other, is to let such defendant plead guilty; then, before sentence, he is a competent witness." This author is stating one method of procedure in obtaining the testimony of accomplices, but he does not say this is the only method. In considering this question it is important to distinguish between the weight or effect of such evidence, and the admissibility of it, and also the difference between the right of either the state or the defense to compel a party to testify and disclose what he knows not criminative of himself, and the testimony of a party who criminates himself and also furnishes evidence for the purpose of bringing others to justice. The true view of the matter, we think, is that the right of the state to examine a party who volunteers testimony not only against himself, but others, is founded upon an exception to the common-law rule excluding parties to the record. Mr. Greenleaf, in section 379, says that "the admission of accomplices as witnesses for the government is justified by the necessity of the case, it being often impossible to bring the principal offenders to justice without them. The usual course is to leave out of the indictment those who are to be called as witnesses; but it makes no difference, as to the admissibility of an accomplice, whether he is indicted or not, if he has not been put on his trial at the same time with his companions in crime." It is stated in 2 Hawk. P. C. p. 603, § 91: "It hath been often ruled that accomplices who are indicted are good witnesses for the king until they be convicted." Vide, also, 1 Rosc. Crim. Ev. p. 198; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 439; Wixson v. People, 5 Parker, Crim. R. 119; Carroll v. State, 5 Neb. 31; Best, Ev. § 170. The rule stated by Mr. Greenleaf in the section mentioned above we think is the correct one at common law, and that the witness Ike Spanish is competent to testify against the accused; his testimony to be weighed as that of an accomplice. It was held in the case of Keech v. State, supra, that a principal in crime before conviction of felony was a competent witness against his associate on a separate trial. We think that conclusion was correct, according to the principles of the common law. The right of the accomplice to testify at common law was not absolute, but rested within the discretion of the court to admit him or not, as was deemed proper. Rex. v. Rudd, 1 Cowp. 331; Charge of ABBOTT, C. J., Trial of Thistlewood, 33 State Tr. (1817–1820,) 683–690; People v. Whipple, 9 Cow. 707. Judge RANDALL says in the Keech Case that "the act of March 15, 1843, (Thomp. Dig. 335,) provides that 'no person shall be deemed an incompetent witness by reason of having committed any crime unless he has been convicted thereof in this state;' and it follows that it is not within the discretion of the court in this state to admit or reject the witness, for he is by express statute a competent witness." If the statute mentioned has made an accomplice jointly indicted a competent witness before conviction, then it would seem that all defendants are competent witnesses before conviction,—a result which we do not concede without further consideration. We follow the decision in the Keech Case, because we think it correct, according to common-law practice.

It is also contended that Charity Spanish, wife of Ike Spanish, is an incompetent witness.

The ground urged for her exclusion is that she is the wife of Ike Spanish, the person jointly indicted with the defendant, Adams. We have just seen that Ike is a competent witness. If he is competent, she is also competent, and there was no error in permitting her to testify. Wixson v. People, 5 Parker, Crim. R. 119; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 391.

Another assignment of error is that the court permitted the map made by one Brown to be exhibited to the jury and put in evidence on the part of the state.

A map, plan, or picture, whether made by the hand of man or by photography, if verified as a true representation of the subject about which testimony is offered, is admissible in evidence to assist the jury in understanding the case. They are frequently formally admitted in evidence, and, in so far as they are shown to be correct, are proper for the consideration of the jury, not as independent testimony, but in connection with other evidence, to enable the jury to understand and apply such evidence. In State v. Lawlor, 28 Minn. 216, 9 N. W. Rep. 698, diagrams of the premises where a homicide was committed, made from actual measurements, and verified by the party who made them as correct, except that the position of certain chairs, tables, and movable objects in the house on the night of the homicide was indicated thereon upon information given him by the keeper of the house, were used on the trial. These diagrams were not formally offered in evidence, but the witnesses in giving their evidence were allowed to refer to them to explain their testimony. Held, that there was no error in this. Maps or diagrams, shown to be correct representations of physical objects about which testimony is given, can be exhibited before the jury, and witnesses will be permitted to use them in explaining their evidence. Blair v. Pelham, 118 Mass. 420; Shook v. Pate, 50 Ala. 91; Vilas v. Reynolds, 6 Wis. 214; Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 687; Udderzook v. Com., 76 Pa. St. 340; Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213; State v. Knight, 43 Me. 11, 130. In section 545 of Wharton's Criminal Evidence, it is stated that authenticated plans or diagrams of the locus in quo are admissible. But such a plan ought not to contain any references to matters before the jury when such matters were not existing when the survey was made. The map introduced in evidence in the case before us was made by John V. Brown. He testified that he was familiar with the country and locations indicated on the map, and that the measurements were correct. So far as being a diagram of the country, including the roads, houses, fields, and fixed objects between the residences of the deceased and the accused, we think the map was sufficiently verified to admit it in evidence. There are some indications on the map which we think are improper, and the state should not have introduced it in evidence with these indications on it. The witness Ike Spanish testified that the accused killed Moore, and that he, Spanish, was present. In his testimony he gave a description of the route traveled by himself and the accused to where Moore was killed. On this map is traced distinctly in large lines a route, and there is written along it, "Ike Spanish's route." Another witness, Sandy Sheffield, testified that on the evening that Moore was killed he was splitting rails at a point near where Ike Spanish said he and the accused passed, and that he (witness) saw the accused going that way. There is marked on the map the words, "Sandy Sheffield was here," and also a designation on the map of where "Will Adams" was. Ike Spanish did not take the map and trace the route in explanation of his testimony; neither did Sandy Sheffield mark on the map where he was, and where he saw Will Adams passing along; but it appears that Mr. Brown put these indications on the map. It also seems that the map was introduced in evidence after Spanish and Sheffield had testified. We think a map or diagram of the country in its physical condition at the time can be put in evidence, and any witness, in giving testimony as to localities, can indicate on the map the relative position of things or persons. But for a person who knew nothing of these matters, except what he heard from others, to designate the movements of persons on the map would be testimony of a secondary character, and improper to be admitted.

On the subject of an alibi the judge charged the jury as follows, viz.: "If you find from the evidence and are satisfied the defendant was not present when the deceased was killed, you must find him not guilty. To make the defense of an alibi available as defense the evidence of its existence must cover the whole time when the presence of the defendant was required. You must determine from the evidence whether the defendant has proven that he was not present when Moore was killed or not. If you have a reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether he was present at the time Moore was killed, you should find him not guilty. When the defense of an alibi is clearly proven by reliable and truthful evidence it is, of all others, the most decisive, because it is impossible for a man to be in two separate places at the same time. The evidence must be such as to render it impossible that the crime could have been committed by the person that claims that he was not present, and that he could not be guilty as charged. The evidence in support of it and against, as well as all the other evidence in the case, demands your most careful and thoughtful consideration." The portion of the charge in italics was excepted to by the accused.

We think the proposition of law stated in the first clause of this charge is proper; that is, to the effect that, if the jury have a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was present at the scene of the homicide, he is entitled to the benefit of such doubt, and should be acquitted. But we think that the subsequent portion of the charge, from its phraseology, may have a tendency to mislead the jury, and to obliterate from their minds the idea that a reasonable doubt, arising out of the evidence as to the locus of the prisoner at the time of the killing, must work an acquittal. We think that the evidence in support of an alibi need not be absolutely clear. It is sufficient if there is enough to produce in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the prisoner at the scene of the killing. Neither do we think that the evidence of an alibi should in any case make it absolutely impossible for the prisoner to be present at the killing. It is sufficient if it raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury, from all the circumstances, whether he was present or not. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 81*b;* State v. Waterman, 1 Nev. 543; Turner v. Com., 86 Pa. St. 54; People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253, 28 Pac. Rep. —; Landis v. State, 70 Ga. 651; Pollard v. State, 53 Miss. 410; Means v. State, 10 Tex. App. 16; State v. Lewis, 69 Mo. 92; People v. Pearsall, 50 Mich. 233, 15 N. W. Rep. 98; Houston v. State, 24 Fla. 356, 5 South. Rep. 48; Kerr, Hom. §§ 512, 522.

In addition to the portions of the charge above referred to, the judge further instructed the jury on the subject of an alibi that, "when proof of an alibi is attempted and proven to the satisfaction of the jury, it is conclusive of the case. When it is attempted, and the proof to sustain it is not satisfactory, the failure to prove it satisfactorily is a circumstance unfavorable to the defendant, but it is no more so than an attempt to clear himself by any other false or fabricated testimony." In Turner v. Com., 86 Pa. St. 54, the trial judge instructed the jury on the subject of an alibi: "If proved, it constitutes a complete defense; if not proved, and you think it has not been proved, the attempt to manufacture evidence is a circumstance which always bears against the person. No innocent person is driven to manufacture evidence." Of this instruction it is said that it was clearly wrong, in this: "that the jury are told that the defendant, having undertaken to defend himself on the ground of alibi, must produce evidence sufficient to work his acquittal, or, if not, his failure is in itself evidence of guilt. This is adding a penalty to what may be, not the defendant's crime, but his misfortune,—a result that we cannot sanction. Were the defendant detected in an attempt to corrupt witnesses, or to manufacture evidence, it would certainly weigh heavily against him; but his failure to prove a given point in his defense is no evidence of such attempt, and it ought not to have been submitted" as having any bearing on the case. Here the jury are told that a failure to prove the defense of alibi satisfactorily is a circumstance unfavorable to the defendant, but no more so than an attempt to clear himself by any other false or fabricated testimony. The failure to prove satisfactorily the alibi is placed upon the same basis as an attempt to fabricate testimony. We cannot accept this as correct. The defense of an alibi may be true, and the evidence fail to establish it, or the defendant may put in all the evidence which he has to prove his alibi, and it may not be satisfactory to the jury, yet the unsuccessful attempt does not prove that the evidence introduced by him was false or fabricated. If the attempt to prove the alibi is by means of fabricated evidence, and this fact should be disclosed, it would be unfavorable to the accused. Its unfavorableness would consist in the fact that the accused was attempting to shield himself by corrupting the administration of law, and by relying upon what he knew to be without foundation. Toler v. State, 16 Ohio St. 583.

The judge further says in this portion of his charge that if the accused fails to prove satisfactorily to the jury his defense of alibi it is a circumstance unfavorable to him. The jury should consider all the evidence, and they have a right to draw therefrom conclusions favorable or unfavorable to the accused; but it is not within the province of the court to do this for the jury. A further discussion of this phase of the charge will be found under the next assignment of error.

Again, the court instructs the jury that, "if there have been circumstances proven tending to show that the defendant was connected with the homicide, and the knowledge to explain such circumstances is plainly shown to have been in the possession of the defendant, and if you are satisfied from all the evidence that he has willfully declined or intentionally omitted to explain such circumstances, then such omission is a further circumstance unfavorable to the innocence of the defendant." This portion of the charge was excepted to by the defendant.

It will be noted that, while the judge informs the jury that they are the sole judges of all the evidence, he proceeds to tell them that, if there have been proven circumstances tending to show that the accused was connected with the homicide, and the knowledge to explain such circumstances is in his possession, and that he has willfully declined or intentionally omitted to do so, such omission is a further circumstance unfavorable to the accused. If the circumstances tend to show that the accused was connected with the homicide, he is required, under this instruction, to explain, or, in default, it is counted against him. It is also said that, if he have the knowledge to explain under the circumstances, and fail to do so, it is unfavorable to him. The word "knowledge," in the connection in which it is found, would seem to be used as synonymous with "ability." A knowledge to explain would not be of much value to the accused, unless he was possessed of the ability to explain the circumstances. The objection, however, to this portion of the charge is that the judge is not charging upon the law of the case, but is within the province of the jury. In Newberry v. State, 26 Fla. 334, 8 South. Rep. 445, it was held that an instruction of the court to the jury in this language: "Always remembering that every variance or contradiction is not of itself an indication of any design to evade the truth on the part of those testifying,"—was improper, as being a charge on the facts of the case. In Gibson v. State, 26 Fla. 109, 7 South. Rep. 376, it was said that a charge of the court to the jury that "it is the privilege, as well as the duty, of counsel to argue to the best advantage in behalf of their clients. It is the study of a life-time that they learn how to distort, change, color, and discolor facts, in order that they may use them to the best advantage of their clients,"—was in violation of the statute which forbids a judge to charge on the facts. In Garner v. State, 27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 843, it is said by the court: "It is the province of the court to pass upon the admissibility of evidence, but, when it is in, its credibility and weight are questions for the jury. The guaranty which our statute gives against the court throwing the weight of its opinion as to any question of fact when charging a jury would be of little or no benefit to litigants if judges were at liberty to intimate the same opinions, making rulings or otherwise, in the progress of a cause. The policy of our jurisprudence is that a jury shall decide all such questions of themselves, and entirely liberated from the influence of an intimation of the judge's impressions." In Pinson v. State, 27 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 706, it is said that "not only is the trial judge prohibited from charging the jury directly as to the sufficiency or weight of the evidence, or from assuming in his charge that certain facts in issue are proven, but he cannot draw an inference or presumption of fact from the evidence. He may charge as to the presumptions which the law, by settled rule, draws from given facts; but an inference of fact, or the conclusion of the existence of a fact from some other fact or facts, is always drawn by the jury, who are triers of questions of fact." Tested by these decisions, the instruction under consideration was wrong.

In his motion for a new trial the accused excepted to the following portion of the charge to the jury, to-wit: "As to whether the case at bar and the Coffee Case, he himself being on trial, are parallel cases, and as to what extent the witness Ike Spanish may have been influenced to tell a lie on the defendant, Adams, and himself, by reason of fear, or by hopes held out to him, you alone are the judges from all the evidence." This is not all that the court charged in reference to the Coffee Case. The other portion of the charge on this subject, and which immediately preceded the portion excepted to, is as follows: "The opinion of our supreme court, read and commented on to the court by the counsel, in the case of Coffee v. State, 25 Fla. 501, 6 South. Rep. 493, was delivered upon an appeal taken by Coffee himself after he had been convicted of murder in the first degree on his own confession of guilt, extorted from him through fear of his life, with a rope around his neck, placed there by an excited crowd, and who made him promise to tell the same things the next day, and to stick to it in court, and which confessions were afterwards used against him on his trial, and which were admitted as evidence over the objection of his counsel, because his said confessions had been obtained by threats, violence, and fear, and because his said confessions were not his free and voluntary act. The law, as laid down by our supreme court in that case, has been the law for ages in all civilized countries. Judge MITCHELL, speaking for the court, and showing that such confessions could not be used against Coffee on his trial, used the following language, and asked, 'Does the evidence clearly show that the confession made at Martel was freely and voluntarily made?' and then goes on to say as follows: 'But the day before, the prisoner, who was accused of a most atrocious crime, was taken by the guard, under whose protection he should have been, from the very presence of the officers of the law, including the justice of the peace, carried to the woods near by, with a rope around his neck, and there swung up to a limb, and before the muzzles of shotguns and Winchester rifles, and being told it was his last hour, was forced to confess that he was guilty of the crime with which he was charged, forced to promise that he would stick to the confession he had made, and forced to promise that he would stick to what he then confessed in court.'" The portion of the charge excepted to contains two propositions, viz., to what extent the case at bar and the Coffee Case are parallel, and to what extent the witness Spanish was influenced in his testimony by reason of hope or fear. One of these propositions, viz., as to what extent Spanish was influenced by hope or fear, is unquestionably correct, and under the rule in reference to exceptions we might decline to consider this assignment of error; but, as this case must go back for another trial, it is not improper for us to express our opinion in reference to the portion of the charge on the Coffee Case. Under our judicial system the trial judge instructs the jury only on the law of the case. In doing this he informs them what is the law applicable to the case under consideration. To state to the jury the facts of a case already adjudicated by our supreme court, and then submit to them the question whether or not that case and the one under consideration are parallel, would be improper, and would not be giving them the law of the case, but would be leaving the jury to form notions of the law by a comparison of the two cases. The principle of the law in reference to the admission of voluntary confessions was applied in the Coffee Case, and the same principle must be applied in every case coming up for adjudication where the facts make it applicable. The question discussed in that portion of the Coffee Case submitted by the judge to the jury has reference to the admissibility of the confessions in evidence,—a question exclusively within the province of the court. In the Coffee Case the trial court erred in permitting to go before the jury the confessions of the accused, but in the case before us no objection was made to the evidence of Ike Spanish on the ground that it was not voluntary. It is true that some testimony was introduced tending to show that, before Spanish made a former statement implicating the accused, threats were made against him, and inducements were held out to him, to make the statement; but these were matters properly laid before the jury, in order that they might arrive at a correct verdict as to whether or not his testimony on the trial was false. The jury have nothing to do with the questions as to the admissibility of evidence, and we think the court erred in instructing them as it did in reference to the Coffee Case.

A further exception to the charge of the court is based upon the following portion, viz.: "Malice is implied from any deliberate, cool, injurious, and unlawful act against another, which shows an abandoned and malignant heart; and if one person, without apparent provocation, willfully and intentionally and unlawfully shoots another with a deadly weapon, although he had no previous malice or ill will against the party slain, yet he is presumed to have had such malice at the moment of the shooting, and, unless the evidence shows that he was acting from some innocent or proper motive, or that he was justified or excusable, such killing would be murder. (It is a presumption of law that every sane man intends the natural and reasonable consequence of his own free and voluntary acts, and if a sane person willfully and intentionally fires a load of buckshot into the body of another person in close proximity to him, it is an inference of the law that he intends thereby to cause great bodily harm or death; and, unless such shot was fired under circumstances showing justification or excuse, then it is an inference of law and the law presumes that it was maliciously done.) And if the evidence shows that such shot was fired in pursuance of a well-formed purpose to kill such person unlawfully, or to kill a human being unlawfully, and the person shot dies from the effect of the wounds then and there given, then the person firing such shot is guilty of murder in the first degree, even though prior to such killing the relations of the slayer and the slain might have been friendly, or apparently friendly, and even though the motive for such unlawful act be not fully proven, or, if proven, it appears totally inadequate to you."

Prior to the enactment of the statute on the subject of homicide in 1868, the common-law rule in reference to presumptions of malice from the act of killing a human being obtained in this state. By this rule the offense of murder was established by proving the fact of killing, and then it devolved upon the accused to show the facts and circumstances reducing the crime to a lower degree, or showing that the killing was justifiable or excusable, unless such facts and circumstances appeared from the proofs on the part of the state. Holland v. State, 12 Fla. 117; Gladden v. State, 13 Fla. 623; Dixon v. State, Id. 637. It was held in Dukes v. State, 14 Fla. 499, that this common-law rule was essentially changed by the statute, and that this legal presumption of malice arising from the fact of killing no longer existed. The interpretation placed upon the statute by the previous decisions of this court has wrought a decided change in the law of felonious homicide, and one necessary to be observed in laying down the law on this subject. Dukes v. State, supra; Ernest v. State, 20 Fla. 383. This change is so radical as to require a departure from the common-law indictment in alleging the offense of murder. Denham v. State, 22 Fla. 664; Wiggins v. State, 23 Fla. 180, 1 South. Rep. 693. In fact the common-law offense of murder no longer exists in this state, and in lieu thereof we have the statutory crime of premeditated killing. Under our adjudications the law does not presume malice or a premeditated design from the mere fact of killing. The statute declares murder in the first degree to be a killing with a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, or a human being. The act of killing is only part of the offense, and, in order to be complete, it must be done with a premeditated design to effect death. The animus with which the killing was done must be ascertained from the facts and circumstances of the case. In every case the question of a premeditated design is one of fact, like every other fact in the case, to be ascertained by the jury from the testimony. Savage v. State, 18 Fla. 909. In charging the jury on the subject of premeditation the court cannot draw conclusions from the facts any more than it can upon any other branch of the case. The portion of the charge now under consideration contains some correct statements of the law on this subject, but mixed along with these statements are some propositions that are not correct as to the presumptions of the law on the subject of premeditation or malice. In this charge it is asserted that it "is a presumption of law that every sane man intends the natural and reasonable consequence of his own and free voluntary acts, and, if a sane person willfully and intentionally fires a load of buckshot into the body of another person in close proximity to him, it is an inference of the law that he intends thereby to cause great bodily harm or death." So far there is no objection, but immediately following it is said: "And unless such shot was fired under circumstances showing justification or excuse, then it is an inference of law and the law presumes that it was maliciously done." This clause asserts that the law presumes malice from the mere fact of killing, in the absence of any other showing; and in this respect it is wrong. The law does not imply or presume malice or premeditation from the fact of killing. This must be shown by the facts and circumstances of the case; and the jury, and not the court, can infer malice or premeditated design from the facts. To state the matter briefly, under our adjudications the court must submit the question of premeditation just as it would any other question of fact arising in the case. On the facts of the case before us, we do not commit ourselves to the proposition that the accused would be entitled, for the error mentioned, to a reversal of the judgment, in the absence of other errors. However erroneous the judge was in charging the jury that malice or premeditation was a presumption of law, yet, if they believed the accused shot the deceased under the circumstances of this case, the fact that it was done with premeditation was irresistible.

The accused assigns as error the following other portion of the charge of the court to the jury, viz.: "It is natural and human for you to sorrow when you contemplate the fact that young Moore was suddenly struck down in the morning of life, and sent into the presence of the eternal judge, with no time for preparation; nor can humanity refuse to show its tears with, and to sympathize with, his young wife and her little babes; and it is equally natural, and our humanity cannot help sympathising with a fellow-being on trial for his life, and for his faithful wife and her innocent children, for his weeping mother and devoted brother; but you were not sworn to try the case by your sympathies, but by the evidence as delivered to you by the witnesses on the witness stand under their oaths." Immediately preceding this portion of the charge the judge had stated to the jury that much had been said about the consequences to society and the accused growing out of their verdict. It is not objectionable for the court to call the attention of the jury to the fact that they are to try the case by the evidence given to them, and not by their sympathies. No doubt the able judge who sat at the trial of this case thought it proper to caution the jury against being led astray by their sympathies. The language of the charge employed to accomplish this object, however, is calculated to impress the mind with the idea that the very condition against which the judge was seeking to guard was likely thereby to be produced, to-wit, an undue excitement of the sympathies of the jury.

Another assignment of error is "that the defendant, during the progress of the trial, was carried from the court-room against his consent, and locked up in jail."

The bill of exceptions shows that an objection was made by the counsel for the accused to the competency of Ike Spanish as a witness for the state, and pending the discussion of this question before the court the jury was sent from the court-room. The officers who had the custody of the defendant, Adams, through mistake took him also from the court-room, and carried him to jail. Counsel for the defendant then proceeded to discuss before the court the competency of Ike Spanish as a witness, and had proceeded about 10 minutes with the discussion in the absence of the prisoner, when his presence was missed. The state's attorney called the attention of the court to the absence of the prisoner, and thereupon the court requested the counsel for defendant to suspend his argument, which he did, at the same time excepting to the removal of the prisoner from the court-room without his consent, and of his being deprived of a right guarantied by the constitution. On the return of the prisoner to the court-room the judge requested his attorney, in order to save any difficulty that might arise by reason of the inadvertence, to commence anew his argument, and that the court would hear his views and authorities anew. Defendant, by his counsel, declined to say anything further, but insisted that his objection to taking the accused from the court-room be noted. Without any argument further, either from defendant or the state, the court decided that the witness was competent to testify against the accused. It was early decided in this state, and has been rigidly adhered to in later decisions, that the prisoner has the right to be and in fact must be present during the trial of a capital case, and no steps can be taken by the court in his absence. Holton v. State, 2 Fla. 476, 500; Gladden v. State, 12 Fla. 562; Irvin v. State, 19 Fla. 872. There is no doubt about the fact that the accused here was taken from the court-room and remained out for at least 10 minutes during the discussion of the competency of a witness against him. He has the right to be present and to hear questions of law as well as questions of fact discussed, and in fact no steps can be taken in the case in his absence. The court must see in capital cases that the accused is present before any proceedings are taken in the case. The fact that the court directed the argument to be gone over again could not possibly restore the accused to the position of hearing what had already been said in his absence.

The last ground of the motion for a new trial is "that the jury received whisky during the progress of the trial."

The brother of the accused made an affidavit stating that he learned from the bailiff that he had taken jugs of whisky from the express office for several members of the jury, and that whisky was conveyed to them, from time to time, during the progress of the trial. The bailiff J. C. Marcum filed an affidavit, in which he states that he took from the express office for the jury a half-gallon jug of whisky, and that during the trial four of the jurors were sick, and, under instructions from the court, he gave the jury small portions of said whisky at a time, as medicine; and that at no time was any one of said jury under the influence of said liquor, but they were sober, thoughtful, and very discreet, both in and out of the court. The other bailiff makes an affidavit corroborating Marcum's statement. There is nothing to show that the jury received any whisky except what the court permitted to be given to them as medicine; and it is made affirmatively to appear, and there is nothing to the contrary, that there was no misbehavior on the part of the jury in consequence of the whisky. The court did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground that whisky was given to the jury. Bird v. State, 18 Fla. 493.

There are some other assignments of error in the record, and one involving a grave question of misconduct on the part of the bailiff in charge of the jury and one of the jurors. As the case has to go back on other grounds for a new trial, and these assignments of error present questions that are not likely to arise again, we will not prolong this opinion by discussing them. In a case like this, where human life is involved, the verdict of the jury should not be influenced by any improper considerations, and no avenue of improper approach should be left open. We feel that we can rely upon the circuit judge to guard against an opportunity to improperly influence the verdict of the jury.

For the errors herein pointed out the judgment in this case must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

STATE ex rel. FLEMING, Governor, v. CRAWFORD, Secretary of State.

MANDAMUS TO SECRETARY OF STATE — ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATOR—DUTIES OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

1. The performance of a clear ministerial duty may be required of the secretary of state by mandamus.

2. Neither the secretary of state nor the supreme court of Florida has power to pass upon the legality of an election of a United States senator by the legislature, or of an appointment of a senator by the executive of the state. The power is in the United States senate alone.

3. The commission of a United States senator appointed by the governor should be signed by the governor, and sealed with the great seal of state, and countersigned by the secretary of state, in accordance with section 14, art. 4, of the constitution of this state.

4. Where there has been an election of a United States senator by the legislature, and afterwards the governor, holding that there is a vacancy in the office on account of the illegality of such election, signs an appointment or commission of a United States senator, and requests the secretary of state to seal the same with the great seal of state, and to countersign it, it is the duty of the secretary to do so, and he has no right to refuse because he deems the governor's action illegal. If he refuses the performance of the duty, it may be required by mandamus.

5. A commission is not complete until it has been signed, countersigned, and sealed in accordance with section 14 of article 4, nor is a copy of an uncompleted commission, or of the record thereof, evidence of any appointment to office.

6. Affixing the seal of state to an executive appointment of a United States senator, and countersigning the same, does not commit the secretary of state to the legality of such appointment. It implies no opinion as to the legality of either such appointment or of a previous election of another person to the same place by the legislature.

7. The commissioning of a United States senator or other public officer is a matter of public interest, and it is the duty of the executive to see that his commissions of persons appointed to office are completed; and as the chief magistrate, charged with seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, he is a proper relator in a proceeding by mandamus to require the sealing and countersigning of a commission.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition for mandamus by Francis P. Fleming, governor of the state, to compel John L. Crawford, secretary of state, to seal and countersign the appointment and commission of Robert H. M. Davidson as United State senator.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by RANEY, C. J.:

The alternative writ, the declaration in causes of this character, states in substance that, on the 22d day of September of the present year, the relator, Francis P. Fleming, the governor of this state, he having ascertained and determined that a vacancy existed in the office of United States senator from this state, did, in exercise of the power conferred upon him by law, proceed to appoint Robert H. M. Davidson, a citizen of the state, having all the legal qualifications for such office, to be United States senator from Florida, to fill such vacancy until the meeting of the next legislature; and that, to evidence and give effect to such appointment, the petitioner prepared and signed an appointment or commission in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"In the name of the state of Florida. To all whom these presents may come, greeting:

"Whereas, the term of office of Wilkinson Call, as United States senator from Florida, expired on the third day of March, A. D. 1891, during the recess of the legislature of said state, whereby a vacancy then happened in the office of United States senator from Florida during such recess as aforesaid; and whereas, a senator has not been chosen by the legislature of the state of Florida to fill such vacancy; and whereas, the legislature of the state of Florida is not now in session, and a recess thereof exists at this time:

"Now, therefore, I, Francis P. Fleming, governor of the state of Florida, by virtue of the authority in me vested by the constitution of the United States, have appointed, and by these presents do hereby appoint, Robert H. M. Davidson to be United States senator from the state of Florida, until the next meeting of the legislature of the state of Florida.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the state to be affixed, at Tallahassee, this twenty-second day of September, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety one, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and sixteenth year.

"FRANCIS P. FLEMING,
"Governor of Florida.

"Attest: ————,
"Secretary of State."

That thereupon the said governor caused the said appointment or commission to be transmitted to the defendant, John L. Crawford, secretary of state of this state, and instructed and directed him to seal it with the great seal of the state, and to countersign the same as a due and proper attestation of the executive act of such appointment, to be delivered to said Davidson as his full and complete appointment to be such United States senator, and the evidence thereof; but that the said Crawford, secretary of state, in disregard of his duty in the premises, failed and refused to seal the said appointment or commission with the great seal of the state, and to countersign the same, and has failed and refused, and still refuses, so to do, to the great prejudice and injury of the people of the state.

That afterwards, on or about October 13, 1891, the said governor required and instructed William B. Lamar, the attorney general of the state, to institute proceedings in this court to procure the writ of mandamus to require the said secretary of state to seal such appointment or commission with such seal, and to countersign the same, but the attorney general has failed and refused, and still refuses, to institute the proceedings.

The writ then recites the prayer of the petition: That, in order to protect and secure the public interests in the premises, and to enforce and carry into effect his said executive act as such governor, the writ may issue, and, in compliance with such prayer, directs the secretary of state to seal and countersign the said appointment or commission, or to show cause, on the day and at the time mentioned therein, why he had not done so.

On the 29th day of October, at the time stated in such writ, the secretary of state made return to such writ, stating in effect:

(1) That this court has no jurisdiction of the respondent on the case made by the writ in respect to the specific act sought to be enforced.

(2) That the relator, the governor, has no such interest in or relation to the specific act sought to be enforced, upon the allegations of the writ, as authorizes or justifies him in instituting this proceeding.

(3) That the state has no such interest in or relation to the specific act sought to be enforced, upon the allegations of the writ, as authorizes the institution of the proceeding by the state, or on its behalf, or by or on relation of the governor of the state.

(4) That there is no law enjoining upon this respondent the performance of the specific act sought to be enforced.

(5) That it does not appear that the performance of the specific act therein sought to be enforced is necessary to make effectual the alleged appointment.

(6) That the allegations of the writ are not sufficient to show that the relator has a right to enforcement of the specific act sought to be enforced.

(7) That the petitioner is now, and was on September 22, 1891, governor of the state; that defendant has no means of knowing, and does not know, whether, on or before the day mentioned, the petitioner claimed to have ascertained and determined there was a vacancy in the office of United States senator from the state of Florida, nor the several grounds, methods, and processes upon and through which such alleged ascertainment and determination was had, other than as proclaimed by said petitioner to the people of Florida, under a writing made and published by him on the 4th day of August of the present year, a copy of which writing is annexed as a part of this return, for the purpose of showing merely the claim therein set up, and the alleged grounds and the reasoning upon and by which the alleged ascertainment and determination was reached.

That no vacancy in the office of the United States senator existed on the said 22d day of September; that "theretofore" the vacancy created by the expiration of the term of office of Wilkinson Call, United States senator, had been filled by the legislature of the state, by whom Wilkinson Call was duly and constitutionally elected United States senator," as shown by a duly-certified copy of said legislative proceedings," filed as a part of the return; and that Wilkinson Call applied for and obtained from the respondent a duly-certified copy of said proceedings, to be presented to the senate of the United States, as the due and legal evidence of his election as such senator.

That it is true that the governor did prepare and sign "the document in writing," a copy of which is set out in the alternative writ, and thereupon caused the same to be transmitted to respondent, with instructions to him to seal with the great seal of state, and countersign the same, and that this respondent refused so to do.

That the communications and transactions by and between the governor and the attorney general, constituting the former's alleged demand, and the latter's alleged refusal, to institute proceedings to procure from this court the writ of mandamus for the purposes alleged, were conducted in writing, and a copy of the same is annexed as a part of the answer.

All of this return, except the paragraphs numbered from 1 to 6, inclusive, was demurred to as not setting up facts sufficient in law to bar the writ, and the six paragraphs were treated as a demurrer, and the demurrer joined in.

Fred. T. Myers, for plaintiff. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for defendant.

RANEY, C. J., (after stating the facts.) That the writ of mandamus lies to require the performance of a clear official duty, not involving discretion, by any one of the "administrative officers of the executive department" of this state, (sections 3, 17, 20, 26, art. 4, Const. 1885,) is a settled proposition of law in Florida, (Towle v. State, 3 Fla. 202; State v. Gamble, 13 Fla. 9; State v. Board, Id. 55; State v. Board, 16 Fla. 17; State v. Board, 17 Fla. 29; State v. Drew, Id. 67; State v. Barnes, 25 Fla. 298, 5 South. Rep. 722.) To hold that the mere fact of these officers belonging to the executive department of the government should exempt them from this judicial process, as to a plain ministerial duty, or where they are given no official discretion, would be in irreconcilable antagonism to a consistent line of judgments running back over 40 years. There is, moreover, nothing in the five cases specially called to our attention in behalf of the defendant, and noticed in the next paragraph of this opinion, to cause us to doubt the correctness of the conclusion reached by our predecessors, even though the conclusion was arrived at in the face of conflict of authority,—a condition not unfrequently confronting appellate courts.

The case of Com. v. Wickersham, 90 Pa. St. 311, holds that the writ did not lie in the court of common pleas against the defendant, who was superintendent of public instruction, as that court had never been given power to issue it against state officers. It is stated, however, in the opinion of the judge of the common pleas, which opinion is adopted by the supreme court, that by an act of May 22, 1792, which continued in force until abrogated by a convention held in 1872-73, for forming a new constitution, (Com. v. Hartranft, 77 Pa. St. 154,) such power had existed in the supreme court, and that no inconvenience was ever felt from its exercise by that tribunal; but the convention limited the power, as an exercise of original jurisdiction, to cases against inferior courts, and that the legislature had not given to any inferior court the power now invoked. The decision in State v. Hobart, 12 Nev. 408, is that the office of state comptroller, which Hobart held, was one of public trust, and conferred upon the individual for the benefit of the public; and if the acts which he refused to perform concern the public interests, and are such as the law requires to be performed by him, the writ of mandamus should issue to compel the performance of the duty. The writ was issued. In State v. Hayne, 8 S. C. 367, it was decided that the supreme court has jurisdiction by mandamus over the executive officers of the state, as, for instance, the secretary of state, and might by such writ supervise, control, and direct their duties, the duty in the particular case being ministerial. The conclusion reached in Bledsoe v. Railroad Co., 40 Tex. 537, in so far as the comptroller was concerned, was that the duty in question was not a mere ministerial duty, but it was his duty to see that preliminary work proper to be done had been performed; and that the district court had not power under the constitution to compel an officer of the executive department of the government to perform an official duty; and that whereas, under the former constitution, the supreme executive power was vested in the chief magistrate, under that then in force it was vested in the entire body of magistry, composing the executive department, with the powers of each separately defined. The remaining one of the particular cases cited in behalf of defendant (Dane v. Derby, 54 Me. 95, 89 Amer. Dec. 729) does not involve the question of a mandamus against a state officer, and need not be noticed; and of the Texas case, the only one requiring comment, it is necessary to say merely that in Florida the "supreme executive power is vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the 'Governor of Florida,'" (section 1, art. 4, Const.,) and that two of the judges dissented from the conclusion reached by the other three.

It is not within the possibilities of any one opinion to review all the authorities referred to in the note to Dane v. Derby, in the eighty-ninth volume of the American Decisions. This court long ago decided the question, and in doing so, and in adhering consistently in past years to that decision, it has followed in the footsteps of MARSHALL and his associates, and others who have rested their conclusion upon the ground that ours is "a government of laws, and not of men," and that where there is no right to exercise discretion in the premises any officer less than a governor, acting as such, (as in State v. Drew, 17 Fla. 67, and cases therein cited,) is not exempt from this process of the law; and upon this theory it was held in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, that the secretary of state would be the subject of a mandamus to compel him to deliver a commission which had been signed and sealed, and upon the same principle peremptory writs of mandamus have been awarded against other secretaries of departments of the general government, (Kendall v. U. S. 12 Pet. 524; U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378.) See, also, Butterworth v. Hoe, 112 U. S. 50, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25. In Com. v. Hartranft, 77 Pa. St. 154, the supreme court deplored the limitation, referred to above, upon its former jurisdiction, as a result which deprived the people of one of the forms of remedy essential to the interests of a republic; and we feel assured that it will not be denied that the history and practical utility of the writ in Florida entitles it to the highest consideration for effectually securing the performance of public official duty and establishing public right. It is the character of the duty, and not the nature of the office, which must, as long as the law is regarded, always control a court in deciding whether or not it will award a peremptory mandamus against an officer of the character of the respondent, (Marbury v. Madison, supra; U. S. v. Windom, 137 U. S. 636, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 197; U. S. v. Blaine, 139 U. S. 306, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 607;) and this would be a late day for the supreme court of Florida to depart from this rule.

II. It appears that on the 4th day of August last the governor issued an address to the people of Florida, announcing as his judgment and conclusion that the action of the joint assembly of the legislature taken on the 26th of May last, at which Mr. Call received the votes of 14 senators and of 37 representatives, and Mr. Mays received the vote of one representative, and at which the president of the joint assembly announced that, Mr. Call having received a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, was duly elected United States senator for the term beginning March 4, 1891, was not an election of Mr. Call; and the reason, as is shown by the return before us, is that a majority or quorum of the senate was not present at, and did not participate in, such election. In this paper the governor also announced that he could not, "in the discharge of his duty," certify that Mr. Call was elected, and gives a full statement of the grounds upon which his conclusions are based. On the 22d day of September the governor prepared and signed the appointment of Mr. Davidson, set out in the preceding statement of the case before us; and it will be observed that this appointment recites that a term of office of United States senator held by Mr. Call had expired on the 3d day of March last, during a recess of the legislature, and that thereby a vacancy happened in such office, and that no senator had been chosen by the legislature to fill such vacancy, and that the legislature was not in session, but, on the contrary, a recess thereof existed at the time; and, upon these premises so recited, the governor, by virtue of the authority vested in him by the constitution of the United States, appoints Mr. Davidson to be United States senator from Florida until the next meeting of the legislature.

The election mentioned is set up by respondent as a bar to the allowance of a peremptory writ. He says that, by virtue of this action of the joint assembly on the 26th day of May, Mr. Call was duly and constitutionally elected United States senator, and that consequently no vacancy existed when the governor made the alleged appointment, the vacancy occurring on expiration of Mr. Call's previous term having been filled by such election. The respondent also supplements this defense with the statement that Mr. Call applied to and obtained from him, as secretary of state, a duly-certified copy of said proceedings, to be presented to the senate of the United States as the due and legal evidence of his election as such senator.

The constitution of the United States provides that the senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof, and (after directing how they shall be classified as to length of terms) ordains that, if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any state, the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies, (section 3, art. 1;) and that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof, but congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators, (section 4, art. 1;) and that each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, (section 3, art. 1.)

The constitution of the United States has not elsewhere given to this court the power to pass upon the question of the legality of the election of a United States senator, but by the last of the provisions quoted above it has expressly excluded from it the right to do so. The constitution of the state has not attempted to confer any such power upon us, nor has congress, nor our own legislature, nor is it to be imagined that any such attempt would be made. Whether Mr. Call was legally elected by the legislature is not for us to say. Our predecessors, when asked in January, 1869, under the power given the governor by the constitution to require their opinions "upon any point of law," whether the election of Mr. Abijah Gilbert, as senator, in 1868, was legal, replied, in effect, that the senate of the United States was the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and whether an election of a senator by a state legislature was in conformity with such regulations as are prescribed by congress, or whether, for want of strict conformity therewith, it was illegal and void, were questions which the court had no jurisdiction to decide. Advisory Opinion, 12 Fla. 686. That we have not jurisdiction to entertain the question of the legality or illegality of Mr. Call's election is palpable, and that anything we might decide about it, should we so far forget ourselves as to enter upon its consideration, would be inexcusable usurpation, and of no effect whatsoever, cannot be denied. Whether the legislature has in its action so far complied with the true intent and meaning of the statute of the United States governing such election, or whether the statute, if it contemplates legal action in the absence of a quorum of either of the houses where the organic law makes a quorum essential to the transaction of business, is constitutional, are questions for the senate alone to decide.

The question occurs to us, however, that, admitting we cannot decide upon the legality of the election, is it not a sufficient answer to the application for this writ that the joint assembly is shown to have done what it in fact did, and as it was constituted, and to have announced through its presiding officer the same to be a legal election? It is, we find, after the most careful consideration, impossible to pursue this course without usurping the functions of the senate. As shown above, the executive of a state may, if a vacancy happens during the recess of the legislature, make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill the vacancy; and it is unquestionably the primary function of the executive, subject solely to the judgment of the United States senate, to decide when any such vacancy exists. The correctness of his decision, and the legality of his action in making an appointment, are matters entirely beyond our jurisdiction. Whether the constitution gave the governor power, after the adjournment of the legislature, to appoint, was a question which addressed itself primarily to the governor, and, however erroneous may be the conclusion which he has reached, he has in fact made a decision in favor of his power, and has proceeded, to the extent indicated by this record, in making an appointment to fill what he holds to be a vacancy, within the meaning of that clause of the constitution which confers upon him the power of appointment. We cannot close our eyes to this fact as an existing feature in the case before us, any more than to the action of the legislature or any other fact shown by the record. It cannot be said that, as between the governor and this court, it was not a matter for his decision. We cannot hold, then, that the simple fact of the legislature having taken the action set up constitutes a bar to the proceeding sought at our hands, without usurping the power to decide that this action, however illegal or ineffectual it may be held by the senate, precluded any action by the governor, or, in other words, deprived him of the power to act. To decide the question would be to do what the constitution has devolved upon the senate exclusively. It is a question as to the relative validity of legislative and executive action, of which we have no jurisdiction. What we cannot do the secretary of state cannot do; and for the same reason that the power has not been placed in him, unless it is implied by the imposition upon him of the duty to seal and countersign this commission, if such duties have been put upon him,—questions to be hereafter considered. He cannot, unless the power to do so is implied by the imposition of the stated duties, decide that the appointment of Mr. Davidson is illegal, or that it is so because the election of Mr. Call was legal, and no vacancy existed, and consequently the governor had no power to appoint. The erroneous exercise of power by either the governor or the legislature confers no power on either the secretary of state or us, and in our conduct we should leave the action of each to be judged of by the senate, and perform such duties as the law has placed upon us, without assuming any responsibility not imposed upon us. Knowledge on our part of what may have been the decision of the senate in any analogous case does not create power or jurisdiction in this court. Unless there is, in the nature of the act of sealing and countersigning, the implied power of passing upon the legality of the governor's action, the secretary has no more power to do so, and refuse to attest the governor's act, than he would have had to refuse Mr. Call a certified copy of the proceedings of the legislature, of whose records he is, under section 21, art. 4, of the constitution, the keeper, had it been his judgment that the election by the legislature was illegal and void. In certifying and giving such copy he performed a duty imposed upon him, which in no wise involved or implied what his personal judgment of the validity of that election is, and the law does not give him any official judgment as secretary of state in the premises.

III. It is, however, contended, in effect, that the right to have this writ issued is dependent upon the right of Mr. Davidson to the office of senator; or, in other words, the legal right of the governor to make the appointment. In support of this contention, counsel for respondent cites the case of Clarke v. Trenton, 49 N. J. Law, 349, 8 Atl. Rep. 509, which was an application by Clarke for a mandamus to compel the board of health of the city of Trenton to admit him as a member of such board. It was a proceeding to put him in physical possession of an office. Clarke had been nominated by the president of the council, who had assumed to act as mayor when he understood the mayor was absent from the city, and his nomination had been confirmed by the city council to succeed one Cloke, whose term of four years had expired, but who, under the law, was authorized to hold until his successor should be appointed and qualify. Cloke still held his seat on the board, and was recognized by it as a member; and it was contended by the board, the defendant, that the president of the council had no authority to make the nomination, as the mayor was not, at the time it was made, really absent from the city, such absence being a contingency necessary to the president's power, and the one which was assumed by him to exist and authorize the action taken. The court held that, as it was shown that the mayor was not absent, there was no power in the president of the council to nominate, or in the council to recognize it, and that the nomination and confirmation were not proof of such absence, and that a mandamus would not issue. It was held that, as the charter of the city had not provided that any particular certificate of appointment should be evidence of title to the office, therefore the case differed from those where the law provides that the certificate of an election board shall be evidence of the result of an election; but, if the charter had provided for issuing a commission evidencing a right to membership in the board, the contention that the nomination by an acting mayor, and confirmed by the council, would make out a conclusive title, on an application of this kind, might be sustained.

It is true that mandamus will lie to compel the surrender of books and papers and buildings to one possessing certain prima facie evidence of title to the office; and this, even though quo warranto may be pending to test the real title to the office; and the award of the writ of mandamus will have no effect upon the other proceeding, for mandamus is not the proper proceeding to determine the title to office as between contestants; and, where the party seeking the latter writ has not muniments of title to the office which the law has made prima facie evidence, relief, even to the extent indicated above, will not be given if his right to the office is even doubtful. High, Extr. Rem. §§ 70, 73, et seq.; State v. Dusman, 39 N. J. Law, 677; State v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 792, 796, 6 South. Rep. 858. It is, however, established, by the overwhelming current of authority, that where an office is already filled by an actual incumbent, exercising the functions of the office de facto and under color of right, mandamus will not lie to compel the admission of another claimant, or to determine the disputed question of title, and for the reason that an adequate and specific remedy at law exists, which is quo warranto, (High, Extr. Rem. §§ 49, 67;) and in the New Jersey case relied on by respondent it is admitted that the relief in such cases is usually sought by quo warranto. See, also, State v. Gamble, 13 Fla. 9, 28; People v. Mayor, 3 Johns. Cas. 79.

The distinction between the New Jersey case and the one before us is unmistakable. There the claimant to an office was seeking to oust one holding possession of it, and obtain possession himself, not in the ordinary way, but by a remedy never available except under peculiar circumstances, not then existing, and, when available, not conclusive of the question of title to the office. Here there is no question of the right of possession to the office. Besides our not having jurisdiction to try this question of title, neither of the parties who may claim the office of senator, under the election or the appointment, is before us; and whatever we may decide can in no wise affect the decision of the right to the office by the only tribunal which has any power or jurisdiction to decide that question. The contest before us is between the governor, as governor, and the secretary of state. The governor, claiming that he has, as the "executive" of the state, the right to appoint a senator, has exercised that power to the extent of signing an appointment, and placing it with the secretary, and requested him to seal and countersign it. We have shown that the power to review the legality of the governor's act is beyond our jurisdiction, as it is beyond that of the secretary of state. In the case of State v. Board, 17 Fla. 9, it was contended that this court had no jurisdiction to award the writ of mandamus to compel the board of canvassers to canvass the returns and declare the result as shown by the precinct returns, because the particular office as to which the relator sought the relief was that of representative in the congress of the United States. Replying to this objection, the court, after remarking that it was not pretended by the relator that the canvassing of the votes determines his right to this office, said: "That must be determined by the house of representatives. But the relator says that the law of the state under which the election was held entitles him, if he shall appear to have a majority of the votes according to the election returns, to a certificate of that fact." The relator was seeking to lay the basis for getting a certificate of election by having the county canvassers canvass the precinct returns, and to transmit to the capital their own returns, to be canvassed by the state board with other county returns. All he could get as even the remote result of his litigation was a certificate of his election. The legality of that election could not be passed upon by the court, and this was the real substance of the board's objection, but it was held to be no reason for refusing the writ. The legality of the election could not be considered, but the evidence of the result of an election held under the laws of the state, and by its authority could be enforced; and this, although it is the constitution of the United States, and not the state constitution, which provides that "the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature," (section 2, art. 1;) and that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for * * * representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof, but congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations," (section 4, art. 1.) Again, in State v. Board, 17 Fla. 29, where the relator was seeking a canvass by the state board, it was objected that he did not show that he had the requisite age for a member of congress, and the court replied: "This proceeding seeks only to procure such certificate as the candidate voted for may be entitled to under the laws of this state, which certificate is a property which the person obtaining the most votes is authorized by law to demand. Upon this inquiry the right to take and hold the office is not in question, and a slight examination of the rules laid down in the books does not show that such a question has ever been entertained by the courts. Whether the relator possesses all the qualifications necessary to entitle him to a seat in congress can only be inquired into by the house, in which he may present a certificate of election." Thus again the court does not permit its jurisdiction, and the right of the relator in procuring the evidence of an actual election, to be defeated or interfered with by its inability to consider questions of the legality of such election.

That there can be any reason why the inability to inquire into the legality of the appointment of a senator should bar the power to award a mandamus to require the perfection of the evidence of the actual appointment of a senator, when it does not do so where evidence of election as a member of the other branch of the national legislature is concerned, or why in the one case it should be necessary to pass upon the legality of the appointment before the relief can be granted, and not on the legality of the election in the other, and this, too, when the authority to appoint is to be found in the same article of the same constitution of the general government, is something which is not only beyond the comprehension of the court, but for which no explanation has even been attempted.

The case of People v. Forquer, 1 Breese, 104, is also relied upon in behalf of respondent. A careful consideration of it will disclose that the commission of one as paymaster general, which it was sought to have the secretary seal and countersign, had been signed by the lieutenant governor after the return of the governor to the state. The lieutenant governor had, upon notice from the governor that he would be absent from the state, assumed the duties of governor, and, although the governor had returned and resumed the duties thereof, the lieutenant governor was still claiming to be the lawful executive of the state, upon the theory that the governor had by his absence from the state forfeited his office. It was held by the court that, even assuming the lieutenant governor to be the rightful governor, the constitution did not authorize him to make the appointment, as the office had never been filled or occupied. In answer to this, it was contended by the relator that the secretary was still compelled to affix the seal and countersign it. The court met this by relying upon the language of the statute, which was that "all commissions required by law to be issued by the governor shall be countersigned by the secretary of state," and holding that the secretary was "only required to countersign those commissions 'required to be issued by law.'" This language was, in effect, held to vest a discretion in the secretary of state, yet not without the court's suggesting that, if it was wrong on the point, there was still ground for refusing the mandamus.

The marked distinction between this case and the one at bar is that neither we nor the secretary of state have the power to pass upon the legality of the governor's act. It is a question between him and the United States senate. The Illinois court, by assuming that the lieutenant governor was rightfully the executive, could, as against the relator applying for relief, decide that the relator's appointment was illegal, there being no other person occupying the office of paymaster general, (State v. Gamble, 13 Fla. 9, 21, 28;) but we cannot say that the governor's act is illegal without usurping the jurisdiction of another tribunal.

If it is the legal duty of the secretary of state to seal and countersign the appointment of Mr. Davidson, we are entirely satisfied, both upon reason and authority, not only that the liability of the court to inquire into the legality of the appointment is not a reason for refusing the writ, but also that a decision upon the legality of the appointment is not necessary to an adjudication of the question of awarding the writ.

IV. The foregoing conclusions bring us to the question whether or not, under the law obtaining in this state, it is the duty of the secretary of state to affix the seal of state to this commission, and countersign the same.

The declaration of the constitution (section 12, art. 16) that "the present seal of the state shall be and remain the seal of the state of Florida," implies that there is such a seal, as does the provision that "the secretary of state * * * shall be the custodian of the great seal of the state," (section 21, art. 4.) It is not denied that there is such a seal, nor that the respondent is the actual and legal custodian of it. There can be no doubt that the purpose of a seal of state is to authenticate or prove the genuineness of charters, grants, and other public instruments emanating from the state. England, from whom we inherit governmental customs of law not peculiar to ourselves, first adopted a great seal in the eleventh century, and its general use for authenticating grants and charters and other public instruments became established about the middle of the thirteenth century. The United States and every state has a great seal, and the adoption of one by the government is for the purpose of authenticating its acts, and securing public recognition of the same as genuine. The public seal of a state proves itself. It is a matter of notoriety, and may be taken notice of as a part of the laws of nations acknowledged by all. The public national seal of a kingdom or a sovereign state is, by common consent and the usage of civilized communities, the highest evidence and the most solemn sanction of authenticity in relation to proceedings, either diplomatic or judicial, that is known in the intercourse of nations. Griswold v. Pitcairn, 2 Conn. 85; Church v. Hubbart, 2 Cranch, 187; Santissima v. Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 283; 2 Bl. Comm. 346, 347; Story, Confl. Laws, § 643; Toml. Law Dict. tit. "Great Seal of England." The constitution of our own state (section 14, art. 4) has directed that "all grants and commissions shall be in the name and under the authority of the state of Florida, sealed with the great seal of the state, signed by the governor, and countersigned by the secretary of state;" and our statute law has made it the duty of the secretary of state to record all * * * orders, messages, and other official acts and proceedings of the governor; and it is made the duty of the governor before issuing any order, or other promulgation of any official act or proceeding, (except military orders,) to deliver the same, or a copy thereof, to the secretary of state to be recorded, (section 2, p. 933, McClel. Dig.)

We see from the provision of our own constitution last quoted that the purpose of its framers, and the people who adopted it, was that all commissions issued by the state should be sealed with the great seal of state, signed by the governor, and countersigned by the secretary of state. That it is, under this section, the official duty of the officers named to sign and countersign, and the duty of the secretary of state, who, by another section of the same article, is made the custodian of the seal, and whose countersigning is an attending testimony of the authorized use of such seal, to seal all commissions emanating from the state, is the only interpretation of the organic law that would not violate common reason. What is a "commission," in the sense in which it is here used? It is written authority or letters patent issued or granted by the government to a person appointed to an office, or conferring public authority or jurisdiction upon him. Bouvier's, Tomlin's, and Abbott's Law Dictionaries, "Commission;" U. S. v. Reyburn, 6 Pet. 352. The commission is not the appointment itself, but it is the evidence of the appointment. Jeter v. State, 1 McCord, 233. Where the appointment is evidenced by no act but the commission, the two, says Judge MARSHALL in Marbury v. Madison, supra, seem inseparable, it being impossible to show an appointment otherwise than by proving the existence of the commission, which, though not necessarily the appointment, is the conclusive evidence of it. The president's signature, said he, is the warrant for affixing the great seal to the commission, and it attests the verity of the president's signature; and that in all cases of letters patent certain solemnities are required by law as evidence of the validity of the instrument, and that in cases of commissions the sign-manual of the president and the seal of the United States are these solemnities. In U. S. v. Le Baron, 19 How. 73, it was held that when a person has been nominated to an office by the president, confirmed by the senate, and his commission has been signed by the president, and the seal of the United States affixed thereto, his appointment to that office is complete; that congress might provide, as it had done in that case, that certain acts should be done by the appointee before he should enter upon the possession of the office under his appointment; that such acts became conditions precedent to the complete investiture of the office, but they were to be performed by the appointee, not by the executive; that all the executive could do to invest the person with his office has been completed when the commission has been signed and sealed; and when the person has performed the required conditions his title to enter on the possession of the office is also complete. Judge WESTCOTT, speaking for the justices of this court under date of October 28, 1875, said: "When the commission of a justice of the peace is signed and sealed, all that is necessary to his investiture of the office is complete. Under the practice in this state, all the conditions as to taking oaths, etc., are complied with before the commission issues. To him, upon the signing and sealing the commission, belongs the office." Advisory Opinion, 15 Fla. 736, 738, 739. See, also, People v. Murray, 70 N. Y. 521: Mechem, Pub. Off. § 114. In Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 75, it was held that an appointment to office by a board of supervisors was not complete until the appointee had received the certificate of the same under the seal of the board, signed by the proper officers, but the rule was different in cases of election by the people; and in State v. Allen, 21 Ind. 516, that where the title to an office is derived solely by executive appointment, the commission of the executive is the only legal evidence of such title. See, also, People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38.

There can be no doubt that the word "commissions," as used in the above section of our constitution, at least includes appointments to office. The provision in the constitution of the United States, that the executive of any state may, under the circumstances therein specified, "make temporary appointments" of senators, carries with it the power to issue written evidence of any such appointment, and, not only this, but it also implies the duty to do so. It imports that the executive authority of the state shall execute such evidence of the authority of the appointee as can be presented to the senate of the United States, and be passed upon by that body. Such credentials must, in the very nature of things, to serve these ends, be written, and cannot be in parol. In the case of People v. Murray, supra, the view of the court is that there cannot be an appointment to office by parol or word of mouth, unless it was permitted by the terms conferring the power; and we are satisfied that none other than a written appointment is practicable, or is within the meaning of the words of the constitution. The way in which things have for a long series of years been done by those legally authorized and required to do them is a safe index to the intention of the law-makers as to how it was intended they should be done; and an examination of the proceedings of the senate shows in each of the numerous cases we have been able to find that the "credentials" of the appointee were presented to the senate, and in every instance but one the entry is that they were also read before the appointee was seated, and the oath of office was administered to him, the excepted case being on where the senate was not organized when the credentials were presented. See Case of Niles, Senate Jour. Dec. 21, 1835, p. 43; Case of Atherton, Cong. Globe, Dec. 1, 1845, p. 1; Case of Whyte, Cong. Globe, July 14, 1868, p. 4024; and the Case of Key, Cong. Rec. Dec. 6, 1875, p. 165.

Any written appointment of a person to an office by the governor of this state is a commission, and the express fiat of the constitution is that all commissions issued under the authority of the state shall be signed by the governor, and sealed with the great seal of state, and countersigned by the secretary of state. The purpose of the constitution is that the warrant of all persons professing to represent the authority of the state shall be in the form indicated, and none other. The authority to appoint to an office, or to delegate the exercise of the state's power, contemplates conformity to this section of the constitution in making the appointment; and this section makes it the duty of the officers named, whenever the power of appointing is exercised, to see that the commission or written evidence of the appointment is signed and authenticated as therein directed.

It is contended that this provision of the state constitution is not applicable to the case at bar, for the reason that the power to appoint is not found in, or conferred by, the state constitution or any law of the state; or, as it is otherwise put, because it is found in, or "conferred solely by, the constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land." Counsel for respondent, while conceding that, under the federal constitution, the time, place, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives are to be prescribed by the state legislatures, subject to the paramount right of congress to make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators, yet says: "But congress has no right to prescribe, nor has the state any right to prescribe, the time or manner or mode of certifying the appointment by the governor of senators to fill vacancies. In the exercise of his appointing power the governor of a state, under the constitution of the United States, is exempted from any interference or control by any authority, legislative or judicial, federal or state. It is purely political;" and upon this theory he asserts the entire federal legislation is based, it regulating the manner of certifying an election, but saying nothing as to certifying an appointment.

The governor of a state, in appointing a senator, exercises an executive function of the state; and it is none the less so because the power is conferred by the constitution of the United States upon "the executive." The authority is conferred upon the executive power of the state, and is inherent in that power, however it may be constituted by the state, and not upon any functionary or creature of the federal government, and whether it be lodged in one governor, or an executive council of three or more, or otherwise. The purpose of the provision is to preserve the perpetual representation of the state in the senate, and an appointment made by the governor of Florida is the exercise of state authority, and none the less so because the state derives it from the federal constitution. He does it as the executive and officer of a state, and not as an officer of the United States. The legislature of a state, in electing a senator, acts for and represents the state, and does so as the legislature of the state, and in the exercise of the state's right to be represented in the senate or government of the United States by senators thus chosen. That it is the duty of the legislature to elect,—a duty not only to the state, but also to the general government,—in view of the nature of our government, cannot be denied, but the duty does not change the character of the body and make it a federal legislature. The grant to congress of power to alter and make regulations as to the elections of representatives and senators was founded on the possibility that the state legislatures, agencies of the state, might be remiss in the premises. The authority given to the state executive to appoint is not, except as to the mode of appointment, a limitation upon the state's power to choose its senator, but was to preserve and execute that power, and secure representation to the state, through the action of its own executive under certain contingencies, and by the two processes the power of the state to choose its senators at all times and under all circumstances preserved. Mr. Madison, in speaking of the selection of senators by state legislatures, said: "It is recommended by the double advantage of favoring a select appointment, and of giving to the state governments such an agency in the formation of the federal government as must secure the authority of the former, and may form a convenient link between the two systems." And, as to the equal number of senators allowed each state, he observes that it "is at once a constitutional recognition of the portion of the sovereignty remaining in the individual states for preserving that residuary sovereignty. So far as to the equality it ought to be no less acceptable to the large than to the small states, since they are not less solicitous to guard by every possible expedient against any improper consolidation of the states into one simple republic." The Federalist, No. 62, pp. 346, 347.

In the absence of legislation by congress providing the form in which the appointment of a senator shall be authenticated, it is unnecessary to discuss the power of congress to legislate upon the subject. If it has not such power, its deprivation of it is no reason why the state cannot exercise it. The senate has as much power to inquire into the legality of the appointment of a senator by the executive power of a state as into that of the election of one by a legislature. If it has not, any appointee can take his seat in the senate upon the assumption that the governor has appointed him, and given him evidence of the appointment satisfactory to executive discretion. In all cases of any alleged executive appointment a primary question for the senate is, has the executive authority of the state made an appointment? Its validity as an executive appointment cannot be investigated until it is satisfactorily shown that there has been an appointment in fact by the executive. Under the constitution and laws of the United States, and of this state, there is no known mode of evidencing or proving that an appointment of a United States senator, or any other officer, has been made by the executive of this state, except, or unless and until, a commission has been duly signed, sealed, and countersigned in accordance with the above-quoted provision of our organic law. Section 14, art. 4, Const. It is true that it is the duty of the secretary, under a statute referred to above, to record all commissions, like any other executive act; but this duty does not arise, nor can it be legally performed, until the commission has been signed, sealed, and countersigned, as is clearly established by the cases of Marbury v. Madison, and U. S. v. Le Baron, supra, and implied in the advisory opinion of October 28, 1875; for until then it is not complete, and, even if the incomplete commission should be permitted by the appointee to remain in the secretary's office, no certified copy of it would be effectual to prove the appointment, for until complete it is not legal evidence of the title to the office. The law does not contemplate that it shall remain in the office, but that it shall be recorded as soon as complete, and be delivered to the appointee, as the evidence of his title. When complete, it is the appointee's property, and its surrender to him may be compelled by mandamus brought on his relation. Marbury v. Madison, supra.

In the absence of any provision in the constitution or statutes of the United States, when a governor of this state wishes to appoint a senator, the only legal way of evidencing his act, so as to command the recognition of it by the United States senate as his official act, is to comply with the formula which the people of the state have in our constitution declared to be the proper form for exercising the executive power of appointing to office. Any appointment of a senator not thus signed, sealed, and countersigned is not authenticated in the manner which our organic law—the only law regulating the subject—provides, and is not entitled to recognition by the senate of the United States as a commission or appointment as United States senator from the state of Florida, or its executive authority acting for the state. Assuming that congress has the authority to prescribe how such an appointment should be authenticated, until it does so the only reasonable conclusion is that this executive act of the state government shall be evidenced in the manner provided by state law in such cases, and the only appointments or commissions of senators extended upon the proceedings of congress within our reach appear to have been signed by the governor, sealed with the great seal of state, and attested or countersigned by the secretary of state. We have been unable to find anything that suggests any other possible way of evidencing the executive act than that provided by the provision of our own organic law, nor is there in the constitution of the United States anything that prevents the state from regulating the evidence of this official act, at least until congress shall act in the premises. The governor, as the representative of the state, and her chief executive power, whose duty it is to see that the laws are enforced, is seeking to have an act done by him as her chief magistrate, authenticated in the only manner that it can be done to command recognition of it as done by him, and, in our judgment, he is, as her representative, entitled to have it done, unless there is in the nature of the act required of the secretary of state something involving the exercise of official discretion.

It is in our judgment clearly the official duty of the secretary to affix the seal of the state to the appointment, and to countersign or attest the same as evidencing the official act of the executive authority of the state in appointing a senator in the congress of the United States, and this duty is one involving no official discretion or judgment on his part. In the case of State v. Wrotnowski, 17 La. Ann. 156, a mandamus was sought to require the secretary of state of Louisiana to affix the seal of state, and countersign a commission signed by the governor appointing the relator sheriff of the parish of Orleans. The secretary replied that the governor was attempting to issue the commission without warrant or authority of law, and in direct violation of the constitution and laws of the state; that the office of sheriff was then held by another person under a commission which would not expire until the next regular election for the office in question; and that the governor had no authority to supersede the incumbent sheriff. The statutes of Louisiana enacted that there should be a public seal for authenticating the acts of the government, and that the secretary of state, who, as in Florida, was a constitutional officer, should be its keeper, and affix it to all official acts, the laws alone excepted. The governor was vested with the appointing power in certain cases, but it was not shown or pretended in the opinion that he had legally exercised it in the case. "The secretary of state," said the court, "is not to suspend his action to inquire why and wherefore any appointment by the governor is made. His duty is plain. He is not directed, but ordered, by law, to perform it. When commissions from the governor need authentication, he shall affix his official signature and the public seal of state, for these are official acts. Whatever improvidence or illegality there may be in the issuing of commissions, that concerns him not. His authenticating any official act can never compromit him; for he has no discretion to exercise regarding it. * * * Were this right of supervision, which is almost equivalent to a veto power, in the secretary of state, as it is seriously contended it is, it would, indeed, produce startling consequences. The secretary of state could paralyze at will constitutional appointments made by the executive. * * * The secretary of state cannot go behind commissions officially presented to him for authentication. * * * When two commissions, duly authenticated, for the same office, are extant, and it becomes necessary to determine which of the two appointees is legally entitled to the office, that issue, presented in a proper manner and at a proper time, can be entertained; * * * but the courts will not inquisitively seek to know upon what evidence the executive acted in the performance of a constitutional duty; at all events, in advance of the consummation of an official act."

The distinction between the above case and that of State v. Farquer, supra, is clear. There is no language in the constitution of the United States or in our own which can be construed to give the secretary any discretion or judgment as to whether the governor's action in appointing a senator is legal.

The duty devolved upon the secretary of state in the case before us is merely to authenticate the commission signed and presented to him by the admitted rightful executive of the state. It is purely ministerial, and involves no exercise of discretion. There is from the very nature of the duty no place in it for the exercise of judgment. It involves nothing but affixing the seal and signing officially. It is entirely impossible for any one to infer from, or to find implied in, the simple duty of authenticating this evidence of an appointment to an office known to exist, and which, under certain circumstances, the executive of the state has authority to fill, the further duty or the power to question the legality of the exercise of the authority to appoint. If such duty or power of inquiry exists at all, then it covers every question as to legality of the appointment that can be made. It extends not only to the question of whether or not there is a vacancy, but also to the appointee's qualifications as to age, residence, or citizenship. If it exists at all, then the power conferred by the constitution of the United States upon the executive of a state to appoint a senator is not subject simply to the exclusive jurisdiction of the senate as to the election or appointment and qualifications of its members, but to another jurisdiction, which is the judgment of the secretary of state, and has the power to deny to the governor the right of the constitutional evidence that he has even made an appointment. If this power obtains in the case of the appointment of a senator, it, arising as it must and alone can from the mere duty to authenticate a commission, exists also in the case of every justice of the peace, county commissioner, or other county officer, and of every state officer of whom under any contingency the governor may have the power to make an appointment. In so far as the existence of the power is concerned, there is no possible distinction in the several cases. To say that it would not be exercised is no answer, but is an assumption of the existence of the power. Knowledge as to when or by whom the power, if its exercise is recognized, will be used or renounced, is not a subject for our consideration.

In authenticating the executive appointment of a senator, the secretary of state in no wise commits himself to the legality of such act. The governor is not responsible to the secretary, nor the secretary for him. If the act is illegal, the authentication of the secretary is the evidence of its consummation; it proves what the governor has done, but it does not involve the secretary in responsibility for it. The secretary's certificate to the transcript of the legislative proceedings furnished Mr. Call is official evidence of what those proceedings in fact were, and nothing more, and in no wise implies any opinion of his as to the regularity or legality of such proceedings; and the same is true, no less nor any more, of his authentication of the executive act in question. Nor does the appointment, though duly authenticated, have any affect upon the legality of Mr. Call's election, or towards creating any vacancy which does not otherwise exist. If an award of the writ would have any such effect, we would, and upon the plainest principles should, refuse to award it; and for the reason that Mr. Call is not before the court, nor is Mr. Davidson, and mandamus is not the remedy for settling a conflict for an office, even where the right to decide such a contest is in the court, which is not the case here. People v. Farquer, supra; People v. Mayor, 3 Johns. Cas. 79; State v. Hyams, 12 La. Ann. 719, cited in State v. Wrotnowski, 17 La. Ann. 163.

V. It is also contended that neither the state nor the governor has any such interest in relation to the specific act sought to be enforced as authorizes or justifies the institution of this suit.

It is entirely clear from the authorities, (Marbury v. Madison, U. S. v. Le Baron, and Advisory Opinion, supra,) and what has been announced in preceding portions of this opinion, that the executive or governmental duty of completing a commission is not consummated until it has been sealed and countersigned. Even admitting that, when a commission has been signed and delivered by the governor to the secretary of state, the appointee named therein, who may have previously taken the oath and given bond or done anything necessary to justify him in entering into the office upon the perfection of the commission, has such a private interest therein as gives him a status to require, through the instrumentality of this writ, the sealing and countersigning, or admitting that the executive power of revoking his action has passed as soon as a commission so signed has been delivered to the secretary, or even as soon as it has been signed with the intention of such delivery, these positions and concessions, if proper, are in no way inconsistent with, nor do they affect, the interest of the public in the appointment and commissioning of public officers, nor do they remove the fact that the governor is charged with the "care that the laws be faithfully administered." Section 6, art. 4, Const. The commissioning of a public officer is not at any stage of its progress a mere matter of private interest. The entire public are directly interested in the consummation of his appointment, in order that he may perform the duties of his office, which duties, and the necessity of the performance thereof to the public, account, not only for the appointment, but for the creation of the office itself. Of this interest of the public in having offices filled, and commissions sealed and countersigned or completed, so that the title to the office shall vest in, and the performance of its duties become incumbent upon, the appointees, the governor is the constitutionally designated representative or trustee of the people, and as such he has the right, and it is his duty, to take such measures as will secure the benefits of the same to the people. The duty of commissioning officers cannot in reason, nor without great detriment to the public, be transferred to inchoate appointees. If it is thus transferred, and the secretary of state shall refuse to authenticate appointments which the governor may deem it his duty to make, the filling of offices will depend, not upon official duty, but on the financial ability and the disposition of appointees to litigate. It will remit to the private citizen, and impose upon private resources, a public duty which the supreme court of the United States and our own court tells us is not performed until the commission is complete. The governor, in presenting the petition for this writ, has acted in his official capacity, and in behalf of the state, and not in behalf of any private interest. In Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 97, it is said: "In the case of Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo, 1 Pet. 110, it was decided that, in a case where the chief magistrate of a state is sued, not by his name as an individual, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, the state itself may be considered a party on the record. This was a case where the state was the defendant. The practice, where it is plaintiff, has been frequently adopted of suing in the name of the governor in behalf of the state, and was indeed the form originally used, and always recognized as the suit of the state." It is the settled law that where writs of mandamus issue, as they may, upon the relation of a private citizen, to compel the performance of a public duty, the interest in which is common to the whole community, the state is the real plaintiff. State v. Board, 17 Fla. 707; Hamilton v. State, 3 Ind. 452; County of Pike v. People, 11 Ill. 202; City of Ottawa v. People, 48 Ill. 233; People v. Collins, 19 Wend. 56; People v. Halsey, 37 N. Y. 344; State v. County Judge, 7 Iowa, 186, 202. The special interest of the private relator is important only where the matter is one solely of private right. Whether we hold the state or the governor, as the chief executive, to be the real plaintiff in this case, we have no doubt of the power or duty of the governor to act. State v. Dubuclet, 22 La. Ann. 602.

VI. That there is no other adequate remedy is clear from the fact that the commission must be complete before it can be recorded, or a copy of the original can be evidence of the appointment. "In the case of commissions, the law orders the secretary of state to record them. When, therefore, they are signed and sealed, the order for their being recorded is given." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 161. Until signed, sealed, and countersigned, there is no legal evidence of an appointment of which a certified copy can be made.

VII. Upon the case made by the pleadings, our conclusion is that the peremptory writ should be awarded; but, in view of the character of the parties, we will suspend until Monday next any formal order in the premises, further than one adjudging the return of the respondent insufficient, and sustaining the demurrer thereto.

WURTZBARGER v. ANNISTON ROLLING-MILLS.

PAROL EVIDENCE.

An action on a written subscription to stock cannot be defeated by evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral agreement that the stock was not to be issued, nor the subscriber held liable on his subscription.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by the Anniston Rolling-Mills against David Wurtsbarger to recover on his written subscription to the capital stock of plaintiff. Defendant's demurrer was overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Gordon Macdonald, for appellant.

MCCLELLAN, J. This action is for deferred installments of an amount subscribed by Wurtzbarger to the capital stock of the Anniston Rolling-Mills. The subscription was in writing. The defendant, in addition to the general issue, pleaded that he did not make the contract of subscription laid in the complaint, did not authorize any one to make such subscription for him, and that it was never understood or agreed between plaintiff and himself that he should take or subscribe for stock in said company as alleged; but that it was agreed between them, at the time he signed the book of subscription for said stock, that said stock was not to be issued to him, nor was he to be bound on said subscription, but that it was then and there agreed that his said alleged subscription was merely for the purpose of getting his name to assist in the promotion of the company, and upon this condition and understanding alone he signed said subscription. To this plea plaintiff replied that the agreement set forth in the plea was prior to or contemporaneous with the signing of the written agreement upon which the suit is based, and that said alleged agreements and understandings were oral, that after they were had or made the defendant signed the written contract sued on, and that, therefore, the alleged oral agreements were merged in the writing. A demurrer was interposed to this replication, and overruled, and judgment rendered on the evidence for the plaintiff.

The only assignment of error here goes to the action of the court upon this demurrer. We think that ruling was entirely proper. The fact that the contemporaneous agreement relied on in the plea lay in parol destroyed its efficacy as a defense to the action on the written contract; and the replication alleging this fact was a perfect answer to the plea, on the familiar doctrine that, "when a contract is reduced to writing, all oral agreements, whether prior or contemporaneous, are merged in it, and considered as waived, and parol evidence of them cannot be received to vary the legal import of the writing." BURKE v. TAYLOR.

CANCELLATION OF DEED—BURDEN OF PROOF—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

1. A negro woman 80 years of age, with but little education, physically feeble and incapable of carrying on business, at the solicitation of one B., who at the time was insolvent, conveyed to him the fee to land worth $4,000 for an expressed consideration of $250, no part of which was paid, with the understanding that the grantee should pay the taxes, keep the property in repair, etc., "collect the rents, paying same to the grantor during her life-time, and on her decease to erect over her grave a small tombstone, costing about $10." The grantee had been acting as her agent in managing the property for about three weeks before the execution of the deed, which was done by affixing her mark on hearing it read over once, but without explanation or an opportunity to have it examined for her benefit. Held, that the deed was void.

2. In actions to avoid a deed on the ground of inadequacy of consideration and undue influence arising from the relation of the parties, the burden is on the grantee to prove that it is equitable in every respect.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor. Affirmed.

Bill in equity by Nancy Taylor against Michael Burke praying for the cancellation of a deed from plaintiff to defendant. Prayer of plaintiff granted. Defendant appeals.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellee, Nancy Taylor, against the appellant, Michael Burke, and prayed to have set aside and annulled a deed made by her to the defendant, June 7, 1888, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud and undue influence; and the bill also prayed to have the defendant removed as her trustee. The facts set forth in the bill, and which are seemingly sustained by the testimony, are that the plaintiff was an old negro woman, above 80 years of age; was born a slave; that she had but little education; that during the months of May and June, 1888, she suffered greatly from a disease of the eyes and from the infirmities of old age; that she had had an operation performed on her eyes, which caused her much suffering, and left her feeble both in body and mind; and that about the month of May, 1888, the defendant, who was an intelligent white man, and who had had much and varied experience in business life, became acquainted with the plaintiff, and soon thereafter, during the same month, became her agent, to rent her houses, and collect the rent. The bill further avers that the defendant is insolvent, and this he does not deny. Such other facts as are averred in the bill, which are shown by the published testimony, are sufficiently stated in the opinion. Upon the submission of the cause, on the pleadings and proof, the chancellor decreed that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for, and ordered the deed from her to the defendant to be canceled. The defendant brings this appeal, and assigns the chancellor's decree as error.

Moore & Finley, for appellant. Arrington & Graham, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. It is no part of the purpose of this opinion to construe and declare the full legal effect of the instrument in writing dated 7th day of June, A. D. 1888, the validity of which is attacked in this suit. It is enough to say it purports to convey in fee to the grantee, in trust, the property rights of Nancy Taylor, the grantor, in all her real estate. It appears that besides the lot conveyed, and improvements thereon, she owned no other property, except some furniture. The bill charges that the execution of this instrument was procured by fraud and undue influence. The consideration expressed in this conveyance is $250, paid by the grantee, and the assumption on his part to superintend and control generally the property of the grantor, to keep it in repair, to pay the taxes, and keep the property insured, and to rebuild from the insurance money, in case of its destruction by fire, the buildings, to collect the rents, and pay them over to the grantor during her life. A small tombstone was to be erected also over her after her death, which the proof shows would not have cost exceeding $10. It is not pretended that the $250 was paid by the grantee or that its payment was in fact contemplated by the parties. Mere inadequacy of price is not sufficient to set aside a deed of conveyance, and, when relied upon alone, it must be so great as to shock the understanding, and induce the belief that the transaction was fraudulent. Any person possessed of reasonably good faculties and understanding has the right to fix the price of his own property, and part with it on such terms as he may see proper, in the free exercise of his judgment and will. A mere voluntary consideration is sufficient to sustain a deed. Davidson v. Little, 60 Amer. Dec. 82. Gross inadequacy of consideration, when coupled with other facts strongly tending to show fraud or undue advantage, is a suspicious circumstance. In the case of Waddell v. Lanier, 62 Ala. 349, it is said: "All transactions between trustee and cestui que trust, guardian and ward, attorney and client, principal and agent, parent and child, are narrowly watched and jealously scrutinized in courts of equity. In all the variety of the relations of life, in which confidence is reposed and accepted, and dominion may be exercised by one person over another, the court will interfere and relieve against contracts or conveyances, when they would abstain from granting relief if no particular relation existed between the parties, in which trust and confidence was reposed and accepted, and there was not an opportunity for an abuse of the confidence and the exercise of undue influence. * * * The relation of principal and agent is affected by the same consideration which influences the court in dealing with transactions between persons standing in other fiduciary relations. * * * It is certain that agents are not permitted to become secret vendors or purchasers of property which they are authorized to buy or sell for their principals, or, by abusing their confidence, to acquire unreasonable gifts or advantages; or to deal validly with their principals in any case, except when there is the most entire good faith, and a full disclosure of all the facts and circumstances, and an absence of all undue influence, advantage, or imposition;" citing 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 315. In all such cases the burden rests on the party claiming under the deed to prove "satisfactorily that it is just, fair, and equitable, in every respect, and not on the party seeking to avoid it to establish that it is fraudulent." The same doctrine is laid down as to the burden of proof in such cases, in Shipman v. Furniss, 69 Ala. 562, and again in its full force in Lyons v. Campbell, 88 Ala. 469, 7 South. Rep. 250, and reaffirmed in Bancroft v. Otis, 91 Ala. 279, 8 South. Rep. 286, so far as it applies to transactions inter vivos. In 62 Ala., supra, it is further said that feebleness of intellect, or its diminution or infirmity from age, disease, or other cause, would be a circumstance of importance, if the inquiry was directed to the existence of actual fraud; but where fiduciary relations exist, or that of principal and agent, it is not essential that the donor be of unsound mind, or of feeble or impaired intellect. Many authorities might be cited to sustain the proposition that where there is weakness of mind, arising from old age, sickness, intemperance, or other cause, and plain inadequacy of consideration, connected with circumstances of undue advantage, a contract made under such circumstances will be set aside in equity. Tracey v. Sacket, 1 Ohio St. 54, and cases cited. The deed was read over to the grantor once, but without explanation, and she affixed her signature by making her mark. The grantee, Michael Burke, is a white man of extensive and varied business experience. Nancy Taylor, the grantor, was a negro woman, and at the time of the execution of the paper was about 80 years of age, and in feeble health. The instrument was prepared by an attorney at the instance of Burke, and as directed by him, in the absence of the grantor. The evidence shows that the grantor had no children, but she had taken into her care Mary Williams when only 6 months old; that Mary Williams was now 34 years old; and that they had lived together during all of that time; that they spoke and regarded each other as mother and daughter; and that by her will, made before the execution of the instrument of conveyance, and which had never been altered or revoked, the grantor had devised all her property to Mary Williams; that the conveyance to grantee was procured by the grantee during a time when Mary Williams was absent. These important facts are fairly sustained by the evidence, and we do not think it necessary to point out and comment on many circumstances proven which tend to weaken the testimony of the appellant. It is fairly proven that at the time the instrument was executed the relation of principal and agent existed; that the consideration is grossly inadequate; that the grantee was old, infirm, in feeble health, and suffering great pain, and confined to her bed, in consequence of an operation which had been performed on her eyes. The testimony of Dr. Baldwin is that he performed the operation in 1888, and that she was suffering a great deal, and that she was confined to her bed for some time afterwards; that she was physically feeble at the time of the operation; had but little vision, and that was out of but one eye. The notary public, James Jackson, testified that he did not know the condition of her mind at the time she signed the instrument, but that she was not capable of carrying on any business then. The lot of land, at the lowest valuation, was worth $4,000, and a part of it was rented to tenants. The evidence shows that the grantor had known the grantee but a short time, and that she had employed him as her agent to rent out her property, and to collect her rents, and to perform the duties of a real-estate agent for her in regard to her property. His own account shows he was acting in some capacity for her as early as May 18, 1888. She had employed him to sell her furniture at auction, which it seems was very valuable, and which the proof shows he appropriated to his own use without her knowledge and without a sale. We do not think it necessary to say, in regard to the facts proven, as the court did in King v. Cohorn, 6 Yerg. 75, where the facts in many respects were very similar, "that no woman in her circumstances, if in her senses and not under a delusion, would make such a contract, and it may confidently be asserted that no honest or fair man would have accepted it;" but we do hold that the facts amply show that she is entitled to relief. The decree of the court below is affirmed.

WEIL v. McWHORTER et al.

LANDLORD'S LIEN—GOODS IN WAREHOUSE—PRIOR DEBT.

The Code, § 3069, provides that the landlord of any store-house shall have a lien on the goods belonging to the tenant for his rent, superior to all other liens. Held, where the tenant turned out a quantity of goods in payment of a debt not connected with the business, to one having knowledge of the tenancy, that, since such sale was not in the usual course of business, it did not displace the lien.

Appeal from circuit court, Madison county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge. Reversed.

Action in attachment by Isaiah Weil against Pierce & Crumbacker and Morgan McWhorter for rent of a store-building. Judgment for defendants was had, and plaintiff appeals.

The action was brought to recover the amount due, and that would be due, for the rent of a certain store-house, leased to the defendants Pierce & Crumbacker, under a contract, and was commenced on June 28, 1888, by an attachment issued on an affidavit and bond given by the plaintiff. Upon the levy of the attachment upon the goods which were found in the rented store-house, and also upon certain goods in the hands of the appellee Morgan McWhorter, the said Morgan McWhorter interposed a claim to the property so levied on in his possession. A statutory trial of the right of property was thereupon inaugurated, and the issues which were formed were tried by the court, without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts. The facts as agreed upon were substantially as follows: The plaintiff rented to the defendants in attachment, Pierce & Crumbacker, a store-house for a term commencing on March 1, 1888, and terminating December 31, 1888; that the defendants carried on in such store-house a mercantile business in paints, oils, wall-paper, and other house furnishing goods. The grounds of the attachment, as alleged in the affidavit made by plaintiff, were that the defendants had "fraudulently disposed of some of their goods;" that in the trial of the attachment suit judgment was rendered for the plaintiff; that the property which was levied upon in the store-house sold for $65, the amount of the judgment being $173.34. The testimony for the claimant tended to show that on January 15, 1888, the defendants borrowed from him $200, for which they gave their partnership note, which became due on June 20, 1888; that, upon the defendants' failure to pay said note at maturity, claimant threatened to sue them; that they said they had no money, but offered to pay claimant's debt in goods from their store; that claimant accepted said proposal, and bought and removed from said store-house the goods in issue, which did not exceed in value the amount of defendants' indebtedness to claimant, and the claimant receipted and delivered to the defendants their said note for $200. It was further shown that, when the claimant accepted said goods in payment of the said note, he did not know that defendants owed any rent, but, on the contrary, he was informed by the defendants and believed that they had paid all the rent for which they were liable, but the claimant knew that the store-house occupied by the defendants was not their property. Upon the agreed statement of facts, the court ruled "that the lien of the plaintiff was displaced by reason of the removal of the goods, and that said goods, so levied on by the sheriff, and for which the claimant interposed his said claim, were not liable to the attachment, and the court thereupon entered judgment in favor of the claimant against the plaintiff." The bill of exceptions then recites that "to the action of the court in so ruling and so entering said judgment the plaintiff then and there duly excepted."

MCCLELLAN, J. We have had occasion in the cases of Ex parte Barnes, 84 Ala. 540, 4 South. Rep. 769, and Abraham v. Nicrosi, 87 Ala. 173, 6 South. Rep. 293, to institute a comparison between the rights and remedies of a landlord existing under the common law of distraint and his rights and remedies under Code 1886, §§ 3069,[1] 3074, providing a lien on the property of the tenant for the rent of store-houses and other buildings. In the case last noted we held that our statute "must be construed in the light of the common law, and be accorded such operation and effect, not inconsistent with its terms, as was given to the landlord's remedy under the old law of distress." Upon this principle we there held, in consonance with the rule obtaining at common law, the statute being silent on the subject, "that where there are leases from year to year, and the rent of a former is in arrears during a subsequent year, the goods of the tenant then on the premises are subject to the statutory lien for the satisfaction of the rent which accrued under another lease for a previous year." So in Ex parte Barnes, supra, the terms of the statute being broad,—sufficiently so, indeed, if not restrained by recognized general principles, to cover all property belonging to the tenant, whether at the time or ever on the premises or not,—it was ruled that the general terms of the act must be construed with reference to the policy of the common law in respect of distress, which did not contemplate the subjection of property to the payment of rent which had not enjoyed the protection of the demised premises; that property which had never been on the premises could not be subjected to the statutory lien. There are doubtless other matters with respect to which the operation of the statute will be shaped by reference to the principles obtaining in regard to the common law of distress. But, in addition to the points of radical difference between the two remedies adverted to in Abraham v. Nicrosi, there is one such which has an important bearing on the case at bar. The landlord, at common law, had no lien upon the goods of his tenant until distress levied. Moreover, originally he had no right of distress upon goods of the tenant after they had been removed from the premises, unless removed after the landlord or his bailiff, armed at the time with the right to distrain, had had view of them on the premises. This was subsequently changed by statute so as to allow distress within a certain number of days upon goods which had been fraudulently removed, but still there was no lien until the distress had been actually made. On the other hand, the statute we are considering, as construed in Ex parte Barnes, supra, in terms gives the landlord a lien on all property of the tenant from the moment it is brought on the premises, and the remedy by attachment is not, as in distress, to fix a lien, but to enforce one already existing; the lien does not depend upon levy, but is the predicate for the levy. It attaches from the commencement of the tenancy for the security of the rent when it matures. Garner v. Cutting, 32 Iowa, 547; Grant v. Whitwell, 9 Iowa, 152; Hunter v. Whitfield, 89 Ill. 229.

This lien is similar in all respects to that created by statute in favor of agricultural landlords, except as to the species of property to which it attaches, and the reasons upon which the charge upon the property proceeds. Once attached, we can conceive of no ground for giving it a different operation and effect, as regards the rights of the parties to it or the rights of third parties who acquire an interest in the property, than is given by our statute and decisions to the lien in favor of landlords of agricultural lands, save only in one particular to be presently discussed. With respect to liens of the latter class, the law with us is thoroughly well established, that they are not displaced by the removal of the property from the premises, nor by its sale to a third person, who either knows or is chargeable with knowledge of the lien; and it is equally well settled law that one is chargeable with such knowledge who knows that the property he purchases is the product of rented lands. Scaife v. Stovall, 67 Ala. 237; Stern v. Simpson, 62 Ala. 194; Manasses v. Dent, 89 Ala. 565, 8 South. Rep. 108. And we cannot doubt that ordinarily one who purchases from a tenant of a building property to which the landlord's lien has attached, with a knowledge of the existence of the tenancy, takes it subject to the lien. Notice of the tenancy is sufficient to put him on inquiry as to whether any rent has accrued, and where this inquiry, if properly prosecuted and information sought of the landlord, would disclose that rent had accrued, whether due or not, the purchaser is held to know the fact. To make inquiry of the tenant will not suffice. On these considerations and authorities, it is our opinion, on the agreed facts, that the claimant below bought the property with notice of plaintiff's lien, and that his claim thereto against the attachment cannot be maintained unless the transaction between him and the tenant is brought within the exception before alluded to. It is the recognized doctrine of the common law of distress that, when a house is rented for mercantile purposes, it is the implied understanding of the parties that goods kept therein for sale may be disposed of in the usual course of the particular business, free from the claim for rent, and that the purchaser, though with full notice, it may be, that rent has accrued, takes them discharged from the landlord's lien; and on the principles laid down in Abraham v. Nicrosi, supra, this doctrine must be held to obtain under our statute. The tenant in the present case appears to have been a dealer in paints, oils, wall-paper, and the like, and rented the store-house from the plaintiff for the purpose of conducting that business therein. The usual course of trade in such business we apprehend to be the sale of the commodities constituting the stock of goods to persons who have need of them, for money either paid or to be paid. It may be, indeed, no doubt it is, that where such dealer casually owes a customer a sum of money, and that customer has need of his debtor's wares, the supplying of such necessity in consideration of the satisfaction of the indebtedness, would be in the usual course of trade, though no money was paid or to be paid. But where the tenant owes a debt, and his creditor, solely for the purpose of collecting his claim, and not to supply any necessity he may otherwise have for the tenant's goods, takes them in satisfaction of his debt, because this is the only way in which he can realize upon it, we are clear to the conclusion that this is not in the usual course of that business, and that the property so taken is not discharged from the lien. Sales for money take nothing out of the business; indeed, they add to the capital of the business to the extent of the profits which it is to be presumed are made, increase the tenant's ability to pay rent, and enable him to buy other goods which become subject to the lien, and afford security to the landlord until they are in like manner disposed of. And these considerations afford additional reasons for the law's implication that goods thus sold are, by the intendment of the parties, discharged of the lien. Not so with respect to a sale in payment of and for the purpose of paying an antecedent debt. This may be beneficial to the tenant, but it cannot be otherwise than detrimental to the business, from the point of view of the landlord. The property taken out of the business by such transaction is not replaced by other property, or by money with which to buy other property, upon which the lien would become operative. The tenant's ability to pay rent is lessened. The landlord's security is decreased. Such transactions can, in no just sense, be said to be necessary in the prosecution of the business. And every reason for an implication for an intendment between the parties that property so disposed of shall be discharged of the lien is wholly lacking. All this is true, moreover, as well with respect to a sale of any part of the stock upon such consideration as to a sale of the whole of it. The agreed facts, in our opinion, bring this case clearly within the foregoing principles. The claimant had constructive notice of the lien. With this notice he purchased the goods solely for the purpose of realizing on the indebtedness of the tenant to him. The transaction was not in the usual course of trade, and the plaintiff's lien was not displaced by the sale and removal of the property. The judgment of the circuit court must therefore be reversed, and the cause will be remanded.

HUGHES et al. v. SOUTHERN WAREHOUSE CO.

RELEASE OF SURETY—EXTENSION OF TIME — SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. Where a maker pays $100 on a note, and the holder agrees to wait a certain time for the balance, and there is no additional valuable consideration to support the agreement, the surety is not discharged.

2. Parol evidence of the contents of a written lease, alleged to have been lost, is not admissible without first producing the subscribing witness to prove its execution, or showing a legal excuse for his absence.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge. Affirmed.

Action on a note under seal by the Southern Warehouse Company against A. T. Hughes and F. M. Letcher. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

Among other charges given by the court at the request of the plaintiff was the following: "(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant Hughes was notified that the plaintiff held the note early in June, 1886, and that on the 10th day of June he went to the office of plaintiff, and said to it that money was tight, and said that if it would wait on him until fall he would pay one hundred dollars on that day on the note, and would pay the balance in the fall; and if they further believe that this was agreed to, and thereupon defendant Hughes paid the one hundred dollars, and at his instance the indorsement found on the note was then and there made; and if they further believe that the plaintiff, relying upon Hughes' promise to pay such balance, did wait until after the 15th day of October, 1886, without taking any steps to enforce the collection of the note, then the defendants would be estopped from setting up any defense on account of anything that Walker might owe him for advances, or on account of Walker's failure to make repairs on the leased premises, unless the jury believe that at the time of making the payment and obtaining the indorsement Hughes informed plaintiff of such defenses, or unless they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had other notice of such defenses,—then the jury must find a verdict for the plaintiff." The defendants separately excepted to the giving of this charge, and also separately and severally excepted to the refusal of the court to give, at their request, the following charges: "(1) If the jury believe the evidence, the note sued on is entitled to receive the additional credit of one hundred and fifty-two dollars on account of the due-bill given by Walker to Hughes for that amount. (2) If the jury believe the evidence, the defendant Letcher is entitled to a credit on the said note, as to him, of the amount of Walker's due-bill in the sum of one hundred and fifty-two dollars. (3) If the jury believe the evidence, they must find in favor of the defendant Letcher. (4) If the jury believe the evidence that Walker owed Hughes at the time the plaintiff obtained the note in suit more than the amount of said note, then they must find for the defendants. (5) If the jury believe the evidence, the set-off of one hundred and fifty-two dollars pleaded, and under which plea of set-off the due-bill of Walker is introduced in evidence, must prevail." There was judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants prosecute this appeal, and assign as error the rulings of the court upon the evidence and the charges.

John G. Winter, for appellants. Tompkins & Troy, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The present suit is brought on a note under seal or bond, due June 1, 1886, for the payment of $300. It is payable to Walker, and was by him indorsed on the day of its maturity. The note or bond is signed by Hughes and Letcher, the latter being only a surety for Hughes. The consideration is not expressed in the note or bond. Up to this point there is no conflict in the testimony. The joint defenses attempted were set-off and recoupment. Letcher, the surety, pleaded an additional, separate defense, viz., that he was only surety, and that without his consent, and for a valuable consideration, the holder of the note or bond extended the time of payment to October 15, 1886, and thereby discharged him, the surety. One replication to the pleas of set-off and recoupment sets up in avoidance of them that on June 10, 1886, the defendant Hughes agreed with plaintiff to pay, and did pay, $100 on the said note or bond, and that in consideration thereof the plaintiff agreed to indulge, and did indulge, the defendants for the balance of the demand until October 15, 1886. No demurrers were interposed to any of the pleadings, but issues of fact were joined on each plea and each replication; hence there was no judicial ruling invoked or had on any step taken in the formation of the issues. The chief contention arose on the introduction of testimony. Hughes, the defendant, testified that the note in suit was given in part security of the rent of a mill, and was proceeding to testify on certain stipulations alleged to have been embraced in the contract of lease. The lease, he testified, was in writing, and, according to his recollection, Ferguson, who lives in Birmingham, Ala., was a subscribing witness to it. He testified to having made the proper search for the lease, and that it could not be found. It was objected that he could not speak of the contents of the lease without first producing the subscribing witness to prove its execution and existence. The objection was sustained, and he excepted. It will be noted that the offer was to prove the contents of the lease, which the witness testified was in writing, and attested by a subscribing witness; and that no legal excuse was shown for the absence of the subscribing witness. Offered, as this testimony was, to prove the contents of an attested writing, we hold the circuit court did not err in excluding the testimony. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 572. Walker, the payee of the note, was then introduced, and testified that the lease was oral, and not in writing. The witness Hughes was again offered to testify to what had been previously rejected, and his testimony, on objection, was again ruled out. Had the second offer been to prove, as independent facts, what were the stipulations of the contract on Walker's part, we cannot know what the circuit court's ruling would have been. That was not the offer The proposition was to prove what the written contract of lease showed were his obligations. This involves the same question as that considered above, and the court did not err in rejecting the testimony. The proof showed that the facts of the case in regard to the extension of time were precisely those set forth in the replication, the substance of which we have given. No new consideration was paid or promised. Payment of $100 of the sum evidenced by the note is all that is pretended to have been done. It requires an additional valuable consideration—something beyond part payment of the debt proposed to be extended—to bind the promisee to an observance of even an express promise to indulge. Giving full credit to all the testimony tended to prove, the warehouse company was not hindered one minute in its right to sue by the agreement entered into. It follows that the alleged indulgence extended to Hughes, no matter how presented, could not discharge Letcher from liability on the note or bond. The promise to so indulge was gratuitous, and not binding. David v. Malone, 48 Ala. 428; Haden v. Brown, 18 Ala. 641; Railway Co. v. Brewer, 76 Ala. 135. We cannot know what defense of merit could have been made in this case, if the terms and conditions of the contract of lease had been before the jury. We have seen they were properly ruled out. There was, however, some testimony introduced, tending to prove a cross-demand or set-off. Hughes testified that with Walker's consent he put repairs on the mill; and there was some proof of their value. This Walker denied, and the question became one for the jury, if the issue had permitted them to consider it. But it did not. We have stated the substance of the replication to this line of defense, and that the testimony proves the truth of that replication. Now, whether it tendered a material issue or not, issue was joined upon it, thus conceding that it was an answer to the pleas. That issue being found in favor of the plaintiff, that line of defense necessarily fell to the ground, unless, on motion by defendants, a repleader had been awarded. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 711, §§ 5–7. No such motion was made. If the issue had permitted the inquiry, we are not prepared to say we would affirm the correctness of the first charge, given at the instance of the plaintiff. We have seen this inquiry was precluded. Of the charges asked by defendants, No. 4 is without evidence to sustain it. The others, on the evidence in the record, were properly refused. Affirmed.

ENGLISH et al. v. PROGRESS ELECTRIC LIGHT & MOTOR CO.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCE—ELECTRIC LIGHT PLANT.

In a suit to enjoin defendant from maintaining a nuisance by operating an electric light plant adjoining complainants' dwelling-house the evidence showed that the plant was of great public utility, and the machinery of the best quality; that the officers and agents were skillful; and that the annoyances from smoke, soot, noise, and vibrations had been materially lessened during defendant's ownership; one witness testifying that they were not one-hundredth part as great as formerly. The evidence in regard to the vibrations of the house, caused by the engine, was conflicting; and one witness testified that they were not greater than those usually caused by a passing dray. Held, that the evidence did not prove more annoyance than is usually incident to a residence in a city, or such annoyances as could not be prevented by labor and money, for which there was redress at law.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; THOS. W. COLEMAN, Chancellor. Affirmed.

Bill by Martha E. English and others against the Progress Electric Light & Motor Company to enjoin as a nuisance the operation of defendant's plant. Decree for defendant. Complainants appeal.

Gregory L. & H. T. Smith, for appellants. Thos. H. Smith and Overall & Bestor, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. Appellants invoke the interference of the chancery court to abate by injunction, as a nuisance, the electric plant maintained and operated by appellee in the city of Mobile. The remedy sought is preventive, and, incidentally, compensatory. An injunction for such purpose is not a matter of absolute right; but if, as has been said, it rests in judicial discretion, the exercise of such discretion is not without limitations, and is to be guided by the settled principles on which interference by the court, in such cases, depends. In considering whether or not an injunction should be granted regard must be had, on the one hand, to the right of every person to use his own property as his taste, desires, and interest may dictate; and, on the other, to the right of his neighbors to the comfortable and unmolested use and enjoyment of their property. No one should be restrained as to the use of his property, unless such use offends the legal rights of another. There are certainly instances of private nuisances, for which an action on the case can be maintained, yet insufficient to justify interference by injunction. This extraordinary and transcendent power should be exercised only when imperatively necessary to prevent multiplicity of suits, or irreparable injury, or continuous or constantly recurring grievances, when, from their irreparable nature, continuance, or frequent repetitions, the legal remedies are inadequate to afford full redress. While it is not essential that the injury should be strictly continuous, it must not be only occasional or accidental. Rouse v. Martin, 75 Ala. 510; 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 959. The plant of defendant was first established in April, 1885, and was operated and used by Cawthorn and his associates for the purpose of lighting the dwellings and stores in the city of Mobile, until April, 1887, when they sold it to defendant, who has continued its operation, lighting the streets as well as dwellings and stores. The house in which complainants resided is a one-story frame house, having four rooms, with kitchen and servants' rooms, and is situated on a mound about 12 feet above the level of the street and the adjacent property. Many years ago the streets in that portion of the city were graded to the level of the wharves, and the adjacent property, except complainants', cut down to the level of the streets. Brick walls were built on the four sides of complainants' lot for the purpose of supporting the embankments. The bill avers that defendant has a contract with the city of Mobile, under which it lights the streets of the city with electricity every night that the moon is not shining, and for this purpose uses four large boilers and several large dynamos; the ends of the boilers projecting to within a few feet of the wall of complainants. It further avers that when the plant is in operation a dense smoke is produced, the soot from which, in certain conditions of the atmosphere, is frequently blown up and into complainants' house, and fills it, unless the windows are closed. Further, that the machinery, when in operation, frequently and at intervals makes a loud, palpitating noise, like the puffing of a locomotive when pulling a heavy train up grade, which noise is sufficiently loud to be heard 200 yards away; also frequently creates a severe vibratory motion, that shakes the surrounding buildings, and especially the building owned by complainants. The bill further avers that the noise, vibrations, and smoke are all made in the night-time, and frequently continue from early in the evening until nearly morning; that the noise disturbs the sleep of the occupants of the building, and the vibrations are so severe as to make the tableware upon the tea-table and the windows of the house rattle, the chairs and furniture in the house rock, and to shake the occupants when in bed. That such noise and vibrations not only interfere with the sleep of the occupants, but render them nervous, and make the houses undesirable as places of residence, even for those in health; and, in case of sickness, would so excite an invalid as to seriously affect speedy recovery, and in certain cases be seriously dangerous to life. The bill further avers that on several occasions portions of the machinery have burst or blown out, making a loud noise, greatly frightening complainants, causing them to run out into the street; that there is constantly thrown from said machinery steam in large quantities, and hot water, which runs down the gutters in front of and around the residence of complainants, to their great annoyance; that the proximity of said boilers and machinery greatly increases the risk from fire and the rate of insurance, also adding great danger from the explosion of the boilers and breaking of machinery. The answer denies these allegations of the bill; sets up the great utility of the business to the public; also that, if there were causes of complaint at the commencement of the business, they have been obviated by the application of scientific appliances, and that any inconvenience experienced by complainants could have been prevented with little effort; also that the acquiescence and fault of complainants induced defendant to invest a large sum of money in improving the plant.

It is difficult, if not impracticable, to formulate a rule accurately defining the acts or facts which will constitute a nuisance under any and all circumstances We shall not make the attempt. As a general proposition, it may be said that any establishment, erected on the premises of one, though for the purposes of trade or business, lawful in itself, which, from the situation, the inherent qualities of the business, or the manner in which it is conducted, directly causes substantial injury to the property of another, or produces material annoyance and inconvenience to the occupants of adjacent dwellings, rendering them physically uncomfortable, is a nuisance. In applying this principle, it has been repeatedly held that smoke, offensive odors, noise, or vibrations, when of such degree or extent as to materially interfere with the ordinary comfort of human existence, will constitute a nuisance. Rouse v. Martin, supra. This principle has been applied to various kinds of factories and industries located in a city, including gasworks, and the production of light by the operation of a steam-engine and dynamos. Cleveland v. Gas-Light Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 201; Yocum v. Hotel St. George Co., 18 Abb. N. C. 340. The averments of the bill clearly make a case of nuisance, calling for its abatement by the chancery court; but the denials of the answer, and the affirmative and substantial defenses set up therein, make the necessity of interference turn upon the sufficiency of the evidence; proper legal principles being applied to show that the electric plant, as now operated and conducted, so materially interferes with complainants' use and enjoyment of their adjacent dwelling as to entitle them to injunctive relief. From this consideration the evidence relating to the offensive odors may be eliminated, there being no allegation in the bill touching this matter; also the evidence relating to risk from fire, danger of explosion, depreciated value of the property, and the increased rate of insurance, for such wrongs may be adequately redressed at law. This narrows the inquiry to the degree or extent of the noise, smoke, soot, and vibrations. There is a mass of evidence,—many witnesses having been examined by both parties,—and the testimony is voluminous. The evidence is conflicting in material respects. Appellants' counsel contend that the testimony of the contradicting witnesses on the part of defendant is entitled to but little weight, for the reason that but few of them were ever in the house of complainants, and these only for a short time, and the others live at a great distance. Naturally the noise and vibrations diminish in proportion to distance; but the force of the argument is impaired by the fact that one of the most material witnesses resides in the dwelling-house owned by complainants, and mentioned in the bill as subject to the same disturbances, and some of the others in dwellings in the same block, while some of complainants' witnesses reside in dwellings in a different block, and across the street. The testimony of defendant's witnesses, having a material bearing upon the inquiry, should not be ignored, but accorded such weight as it may be entitled to, when the entire evidence and the construction and operation of the plant are considered. We shall not attempt, however, to follow counsel in their elaborate discussion of the evidence. Though the testimony of the witnesses on the part of complainants may be somewhat exaggerated by supersensitiveness and an excited imagination, it may be conceded that their evidence strongly tends to show material annoyance and inconvenience, caused by the smoke, soot, noise, and vibrations during the administration of Cawthorn, and even for a time after defendant purchased and operated the plant. The evidence, however, shows that defendant has made alterations and improvements, especially as to the escape of steam, which have greatly diminished the evils complained of. As to an establishment of public utility in a city, the rule is that its lawful use will not be perpetually enjoined, when, by the application of scientific appliances, such alterations in the machinery may be made as will remedy the evils. In such case the court will go no further than to require such appliances to be introduced, and in some cases will direct a reference to ascertain if the evils can be thus remedied. Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 540; 1 High, Inj. § 787. On the same principle, the court will not make the injunction perpetual when such appliances have been used, even during the pendency of the suit, and the desired results effected. The real and important question is, does the manner in which defendant operates the plant, since the alterations and improvements were made, interfere with the comfortable use and enjoyment of their residence by complainants to such extent as to create a nuisance, which, when the locality and the circumstances are considered, it becomes the duty of the court to enjoin? The witness Long testifies that the noise has been diminished exceedingly, and that it "is not a hundredth part of what it was before these changes were made;" and Sossaman says: "I could feel no vibration there, but I know that sometimes, while walking down the street, one can feel a little shaking, which is caused by the running of a dray, and I noticed no more vibrations about that place than a running of a dray might cause. At the time I speak of the machinery was in motion." We have especially referred to the testimony of these witnesses for the reason that Long resides in the dwelling owned by complainants and mentioned in the bill, and Sossaman went to the house at the instance of complainants to examine and give an opinion. His attention was directly called to the subject. Their evidence is corroborated by the testimony of several other witnesses. There is, however, conflicting evidence on the part of complainants. The evidence further shows that by a comparatively small expense complainants could avoid the inconveniences and annoyances arising from the vibratory motions. When such is the case, a perpetual injunction will not be granted, full compensation being obtainable at law. In Rosser v. Randolph, 7 Port. (Ala.) 238, the bill was filed to enjoin the erection of a mill, which, it was alleged, would be injurious to the health of the neighborhood, and would drown and render useless a spring on which complainant relied to furnish himself and family with pure water. The mill having been erected, and it not appearing that the health of the community had suffered, the court said, in reference to the spring: "By the application of labor, the value of which can be ascertained, or which the defendant, if applied to, might be willing himself to do, the spring can be restored to its original state; thereby giving to complainant the full enjoyment of his spring of water, and at the same time securing to the defendant those rights which appertain to him as owner of the adjacent land." Also in Kingsbury v. Flowers, 65 Ala. 479, where the bill was filed to enjoin future interments in a private burial-ground, it is said: "The apprehension of injury from this source, it is evident, could be quieted by but slight labor expended in drainage,—a labor, it may be, if requested, the defendants would have performed, rather than to have been forced into this litigation." These were cases in rural districts. The rule is especially applicable to industrial establishments in a large city.

We do not think the evidence shows that the locality in which the plant was situated is so exclusively devoted to industrial enterprises, or business purposes, or so remote, as to afford defendant immunity on this account. The dwellings of complainants and others in the vicinity were erected long before the plant was established. However, a person cannot expect to possess in a city the peace, quiet, enjoyment, and freedom from annoyances of the country, and must submit to the ordinarily incidental annoyances of living in a city. It has been aptly said: "A person who resides in a large city must not expect to be surrounded by the stillness that prevails in rural districts. He must necessarily hear some of the noise, and occasionally feel slight vibrations, produced by the movements and labor of its people, and by the hum of its mechanical industries. The aid of a court may be invoked to keep annoying sounds within reasonable limits. Every noise, however, is not a nuisance; nor when produced in the exercise of a lawful occupation should the strong arm of a chancellor be extended to suppress it." McCaffrey's Appeal, 105 Pa. St. 253; Coffin Co. v. Warren, 78 Ky. 400. Whether or not the transcendent power of the court should be exercised under such circumstances must be determined in view of the relative rights of the parties and the public welfare. Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448. Unquestionably the electric plant is of great public utility, and its abatement by injunction would entail heavy loss upon its owners, and, according to the testimony, increased cost of light to the citizens of Mobile. The machinery is of the best quality employed for electrical purposes. Its officers and agents are shown to be skillful, and acting in good faith. Efforts have been made with considerable success, and are still being made, to prevent injury and annoyance to the occupants of adjoining dwellings. One of the chimneys is 80 feet high and the other 70,—40 or 50 feet higher than the roof of complainants' residence, and sufficiently high to discharge the smoke in the air, so as not to incommode complainants unless in abnormal conditions of the atmosphere, which occur only occasionally. Though the locality in which the plant is situated may not be of such nature as to defeat its abatement, if its operations cause substantial injury to neighboring dwellings or material annoyance to the occupants, yet when, by the application of scientific appliances, or by the expenditure of a reasonable amount of labor and money, the evils can be obviated or diminished, so as to amount to no more than are ordinarily incident to a city life, the rights of the parties will be preserved, the infliction of heavy loss prevented, and the public interest subserved by withholding equitable interference, and leaving the complaining party to pursue the legal remedy. By the settled rule in this state a case must be proved which establishes the necessity of a preventive remedy,—a case within that class of cases of irreparable or continuous injury which can be adequately redressed only by injunction. And in all cases where the right is doubtful, and the exercise of the power would interfere with industries promotive of public utility, it becomes the duty of the court to abstain from interfering. In such cases the proof should be clear and convincing, and the power "should be cautiously and sparingly exercised." Ray v. Lynes, 10 Ala. 63; Rouse v. Martin, supra. A careful examination and review of the mass of evidence forces the conclusion that complainants have failed to establish clearly and convincingly a case of imperative necessity. The evidence leaves the mind in doubt whether complainants have suffered, since the alterations and improvements were made, any substantial injury or material discomfort, more than is usually incident to a residence in a city, or which could not be prevented by the application of labor or money, that may be adequately redressed at law. Affirmed.

DECLARATION AND ADMISSIONS — ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—WITNESS.

1. In a suit for the price of goods sold to one on the credit of defendant's decedent, it was error to admit in evidence a conversation had between plaintiff and his salesman in relation to whom the goods were to be charged.

2. In a suit against an administrator in his representative capacity, it was not necessary to prove that defendant was such administrator where the point was not raised in the pleadings.

3. Where a witness was not a party to the suit, or interested in its result, his testimony as to an interview between plaintiff and defendant's decedent is not excluded by Code Ala. § 2765.

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge. Reversed.

Action by S. Richard et al. against Joseph Espalla, Jr., as the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Julia Ryan, deceased, to recover the price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to Mrs. Julia Ryan. The summons was against "Joseph Espalla, Jr., as the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Julia Ryan, deceased;"

and the return of the sheriff shows that a copy of the complaint and summons was served on, and the judgment was rendered against, Joseph Espalla, Jr., as the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Julia Ryan, deceased. The defendant did not plead ne unques administrator, but pleaded the general issue. The only assignments of error are to the court's rulings upon the admissibility of the evidence, and upon the court's refusing to give a charge requested by the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that the goods had been sold by the plaintiffs upon the credit of Mrs. Julia Ryan, but no testimony was offered as to the administerial capacity of the defendant. The defendant asked the court, in writing, to charge the jury as follows: "The court charges the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that there is no evidence to satisfy them that said Espalla is the administrator of the said estate of Julia Ryan, deceased, then the jury must find for the defendant." The court refused to give this charge, and the defendant duly excepted to such refusal. There was judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant brings this appeal.

W. E. Richardson and Henry Chamberlain, for appellant. Gregory L. & H. T. Smith, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The suit is on an account for goods which the plaintiffs claimed were sold by them to Mrs. Julia Ryan, deceased, the intestate of the defendant. The defendant contended that his intestate had not purchased or ordered the goods, and did not become responsible for the price thereof. There was evidence tending to show that Mrs. Ryan came to plaintiffs' place of business, and stated to a member of the firm that she was going to put her son, James Ryan, in her store to run it, and take charge of it for her, and requested plaintiffs to let him have whatever goods he wanted, as it was her business. Against the objection of the defendant the plaintiffs were permitted to introduce evidence to show that when James Ryan came into their store on a subsequent day a member of the plaintiff firm, who was waiting on him in selecting and ordering goods, on being called aside by a salesman who was standing off in the store, and asked if he was selling the goods to James Ryan, stated to the salesman that he was not selling the goods to James Ryan, but to his mother, Mrs. Julia Ryan. This conversation was not in the presence of Mrs. Ryan, nor was it brought to her knowledge in any way; and the statement as to who was the purchaser of the goods was not made in the course of any transaction with her. So far as the declaration could possibly be regarded as referring to any dealings of the firm directly with Mrs. Ryan, it was merely an allusion to a past transaction. She could not be bound by what one of the plaintiffs may have said to a third person, who was a stranger to her. So far as she was concerned, the statement was merely hearsay, and upon no possible theory was it admissible against her or against the defendant as the administrator of her estate. What was said on the occasion mentioned was as inadmissible against the defendant as any conversation that one of the plaintiffs may have had at any other time with a stranger to Mrs. Ryan. It is not conceived by what method of reasoning the statement could be regarded as part of the res gestæ of the transaction had with Mrs. Ryan on a former day. Stallings v. Hinson, 49 Ala. 92; Martin v. Hardesty, 27 Ala. 458; Lavender v. Hall, 60 Ala. 214; Smith v. Flagg, 46 Ala. 624; Tamplin v. Still, 77 Ala. 374; Hart v. Kendall, 82 Ala. 144, 3 South. Rep. 41; Railroad Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149, 4 South. Rep. 618. It is suggested for the appellees that there was a failure to specify any particular ground of objection to the admissibility of this evidence. The illegality of the evidence was apparent upon its face. To ascertain this it was not necessary for the court to look to any fact that was not stated by the witness in detailing the conversation. No casting around to discover a ground of exclusion was required. It was obvious, without reference to any extrinsic fact, that Mr. Richard's statement to the salesman in his store was mere hearsay, so far as Mrs. Ryan was concerned. In such case the court should sustain the objection, without demanding a specification of what is already patent. The general rule requiring the ground of objection to be stated did not apply. Richards v. Bestor, 90 Ala. 352, 8 South. Rep. 30; Pool v. Devers, 30 Ala. 672; Cunningham v. Cochran, 18 Ala. 479. This case was tried before the adoption of the rule of practice now governing the mode of reserving exceptions to rulings on the introduction of testimony. Under that rule the trial judge can in all cases call on the counsel to specify grounds of objection. See rule printed in 90 Ala. and 9 South. Rep. iv. The evidence as to the statement referred to should have been excluded.

The witness Richmond was not a party to the suit, nor was there evidence to show that he was interested in the result thereof. He did not come within any of the exceptions to the competency of witnesses, and there was no error in the refusal to exclude his testimony as to what occurred in the interview between one of the plaintiffs and the intestate of the defendant. Code 1886, § 2765; Huckaba v. Abbott, 87 Ala. 409, 6 South. Rep. 48; Miller v. Cannon, 84 Ala. 59, 4 South. Rep. 204.

There was no error in refusing to give the charge in writing requested by the defendant. The suit is against the defendant in his representative capacity, and not as an individual. In the caption of the complaint the defendant is described "as the administrator of the estate of Julia Ryan, deceased." In each count of the complaint the cause of action stated is an account against the intestate of the defendant, and the defendant is charged as her personal representative. Harris v. Plant, 81 Ala. 639; Watson v. Collins, 87 Ala. 587; Christian v. Morris, 50 Ala. 585; Rhodes v. Walker, 44 Ala. 213. But the fact that defendant was sued as administrator does not necessarily impose upon the plaintiffs the duty of proving that the defendant was such representative. Such proof is not required, unless the pleadings present an issue upon that point. It is contended that an issue as to the character in which the defendant was sued was presented by his plea of "not guilty." A plea in that form is not the appropriate method of presenting the general issue to a complaint on an account. Code 1886, § 2675. As, however, the plaintiffs, without objection, took issue upon the pleas in that form, we will treat them as amounting to the averment that the allegations of the complaint are untrue. In a suit by a personal representative the plea of the general issue admits the plaintiff's right to sue in that character, and renders proof of that fact unnecessary. Clarke v. Clarke, 51 Ala. 498; Worsham v. Goar, 4 Port. (Ala.) 441. So, in a suit against a personal representative, a plea which involves only a denial of the plaintiff's cause of action is an admission by the defendant of the character in which he is sued. A denial of such character is not involved in a mere denial of the plaintiff's cause of action, but must be specially pleaded. Code 1886, § 2675; Railroad Co. v. Trammell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 870; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 381; Wilson v. Bothwell, 50 Ala. 378. No such special plea having been interposed, it was not incumbent upon the plaintiffs to offer proof of the defendant's appointment or qualification as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Ryan. The other assignments of error are in reference to matters which are not likely to be presented on another trial. As they do not bear upon the merits of the controversy, it is unnecessary to consider them. For the single error above noted, the judgment must be reversed. Reversed and remanded.

HIGHLAND AVE. & B. R. CO. v. DONOVAN.

INJURY TO PASSENGER ON STREET-CAR—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Plaintiff was riding on the front platform of a street-car, and, while passing around a curve, was thrown from the car. He testified that the rear platform was crowded, and he had to get on the front; that he had to stay there because the car seemed full. There was evidence for defendant that there was ample room to stand inside the car. Held, that an instruction was proper which authorized the jury to find plaintiff free from negligence in riding on the front platform if there was a reasonable necessity, real or apparent, for his doing so.

2. Where the evidence tended to show that riding on the front platform was not obviously dangerous; that the accident would not have happened if the defendant had used due care in operating the car,—the question of plaintiff's negligence was for the jury, to be considered in connection with his knowledge of the curve in the street, and of defendant's rule against riding on the front platform.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by William Donovan against the Highland Avenue & Belt Railroad Company to recover for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellee, William Donovan, by his next friend, against the appellant corporation, and sought to recover damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant or its employes. The defendant pleaded the general issue and contributory negligence, and issue was joined thereon. The plaintiff's evidence was that he was about 17 years old, and that on the 30th of September, 1889, he got on a car of the defendant's at Avenue F and Twenty-Seventh street as a passenger, and a lady got on with him; that the rear platform of the car was crowded, and he had to get on the front platform; that on account of the crowd he was unable to enter the car by the rear platform, where he usually entered; that there were several persons standing on the front platform, and there were some railings running about the front window, and he had his left hand on one of these, and in his other hand he had his school-books and his umbrella; that he had but one leg; that, after he had gotten on, the conductor got on the same platform he was standing on, and pushed his way into the car through the persons who were standing on the platform; that the plaintiff looked into the car, and saw that the seats were crowded, and that the aisle between the seats was full of people standing; that he had to stay on the platform; that the seats ran along on both sides of the car, and the people were in the aisle holding on the straps; that the conductor collected his fare when he got on. The plaintiff further testified that he stood on the right-hand side of the car, there being two persons between him and the door; that at the corner of Avenue E and Twenty-Seventh street there was a curve to the left, which placed him on the outside of the curve as the car went around the curve; that, as the train moved around the curve, the other persons standing on the platform were shoved against him, breaking his hold, and he was thrown from the car, and had his ankle broken; that he had heard that the rules of the company prohibited persons from riding on the platform. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the car was filled or not; the evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that it was full on the inside, and the evidence for the defendant tending to show that there was ample standing-room inside of the car. The plaintiff, after testifying as to the inside of the car being crowded, was asked: "What appearance did it have as they were standing in that way?" The defendant objected to this question, but the court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. As to the appearance of the aisle the plaintiff said that "near the door it was crowded more than at the center; there were people hanging on all along." Upon the introduction of all the evidence, the court, at the request of the plaintiff in writing, gave the following charge: "If the jury believe from the evidence that there was a reasonable necessity, either real or apparent, under the circumstances of the case, for the plaintiff to travel on the platform of the car, and that he made such effort to obtain accommodation inside the car as an ordinarily prudent man would under similar circumstances, then he would not be guilty of negligence by reason of standing or traveling on the platform." The defendant excepted to the giving of this charge by the court, and separately and severally excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following written charges at its request: "(1) That there is no evidence that the rate of speed at which the cars were run around the curve at Twenty-Seventh street and Avenue E was dangerous or negligent. (2) That if the plaintiff with knowledge that the car was so crowded that he could not get a seat, and could not get into the car, got onto the platform with knowledge that the rules of the company prohibited his standing there, then this would be negligence on his part which would defeat a recovery. (3) If the jury believe all the evidence, they should find a verdict for the defendant. (4) If the jury believe from the evidence that when the plaintiff boarded the car it was filled with passengers, and the platforms were also filled with passengers, and the plaintiff, when he got on the car, knew that he could not get a seat, and could not get into the car, then his getting on the platform with this knowledge, and remaining there, was voluntary, and would defeat a recovery on his part. (5) The plaintiff having testified that he knew of the existence of the curve at Twenty-Seventh street and Avenue E, then he would be presumed to know the effect of the car going around the curve: and if with this knowledge the plaintiff stood upon the front platform, on the outside of the curve, which was the most dangerous place, then he would be guilty of negligence which would defeat a recovery. (6) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff saw the crowded condition of the cars and platforms, as testified by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff knew that the rules of the company prohibited him from standing on the platform, and with this knowledge he got upon the car, and stood upon the platform, and failed to request the conductor to give him a place in the car, and by reason of being on the platform he contributed directly to the injuries he sustained, the plaintiff cannot recover. (7) That the existence of an apparent necessity to the plaintiff for him to stand upon the platform will not excuse the negligence of the plaintiff for being on the platform." There was verdict for the plaintiff, and in accordance therewith the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. On this appeal, brought by the defendant in the court below, the rulings of the court in giving the charge asked by the plaintiff, and in refusing to give the several charges requested by the defendant, are assigned as error.

Alex. T. London, for appellant. Weatherly & Percy, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. 1. What constitutes the exercise of due care, and, conversely, what amounts to negligence, depends in all cases, of course, upon the circumstances surrounding the person whose conduct, in these respects, is under investigation. A man may be negligent in failing to ascertain his environments, no less than in the omission of that course of action, with respect to a situation known to him, which prudence dictates. But having been duly careful to acquaint himself as best he may with all the facts which should have a legitimate influence in shaping his conduct, his subsequent action is to be gauged with respect to the observance or lack of care and caution; not by the real facts which, or some of which, his circumspection may have failed to disclose to him, but by the appearance of things as uncovered by that degree of effort to ascertain the real facts which men of ordinary prudence would put forth in the premises. In other words: "He is not bound to see. He is bound to make all reasonable efforts to see that a careful, prudent man would make in like circumstances. He is not to provide against any certain results. He is to make an effort for a result that will give safety,—such an effort as caution, care, and prudence will dictate." Greany v. Railroad Co., 101 N. Y. 419, 5 N. E. Rep. 425. There is evidence in the record going to show that when the plaintiff boarded defendant's car—there being only one in the train—every seat and the aisle were occupied; that the rear platform was also fully occupied, and that there were several people on the front platform. Plaintiff, finding he could not get on the rear, went to and took a position on the front platform. From this position, which afforded a view through an open window of the whole interior of the car, it appeared to him that there was no available space for him on the inside. If the jury found the facts in line with these tendencies of the testimony, they would have been justified in finding further that the plaintiff exercised due diligence and caution in ascertaining the situation, and hence had a right to act upon the facts which such diligence and caution disclosed, whether they were the real facts or not. It follows that, assuming proper circumspection to have been observed by plaintiff, evidence as to whether the car presented the appearance of being entirely full was pertinent and properly received, and the charge requested for plaintiff, which authorized the jury to find plaintiff free from negligence in taking a position on the platform, if there was a reasonable necessity, real or apparent, for his doing so, correctly stated the law. The application of this principle to charge 7 requested by defendant must lead to its condemnation, as being misleading in itself, and affirmatively bad, when read in the light of the evidence.

2. It is insisted for the appellant that the assumption of a position on the front platform was negligence, as a matter of law, in the plaintiff, for that a rule of the carrier, which was known to him, forbade his doing so. Ordinarily, no doubt, this would be true but in this instance it is not, on one phase of the evidence, for the reason that there was no other position on the train open to plaintiff, and he was impliedly invited by the conductor to take this position, accepted as a passenger while occupying it, and his safe carriage while occupying it was assumed by the defendant. A tendency of the evidence goes to show that the position was not obviously a dangerous one, and would have been unattended by danger or injury in this instance had the carrier exercised due care in operating its train. On these tendencies of the evidence the whole question of negligence vel non on the part of the plaintiff, so far as the known rule of the company and the supposed inherent danger of the position bear upon it, was one of fact for the determination of the jury. Charges 3 and 5 asked by defendant involved the determination of this question by the court, and were properly refused. Railway Co. v. Walling, 2 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 20, and notes; Willis v. Railroad Co., 34 N. Y. 670; Nolan v. Railroad Co., 3 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 463; Railroad Co. v. Miles, 13 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 10; Railroad Co. v. Werle, 21 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 429; Railway Co. v. SAVANNAH & W. R. CO. v. MEADOWS.

DEATH OF TRESPASSER ON TRACK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—PLEADING.

1. In an action against a railroad company for damages for killing plaintiff's intestate, where the evidence shows that decedent was, at night, walking along the track through a long cut that could not be used at any place as a crossing, in a sparsely settled neighborhood, and was killed by a train coming up from behind, the decedent became a trespasser when he entered the cut, and was per se guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Evidence showing the custom of people to walk on the track of a railroad company in sparsely settled neighborhoods and at other places than public highways or crossings is inadmissible.

3. Where defendant was not shown to have discovered the danger of decedent in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of due care, and that such care was not exercised, the proof that defendant's train was running at a high rate of speed within the corporate limits of a city having no ordinance regulating speed of trains; that the engine carried no head-light, though after dark; that the engineer failed to blow his whistle or ring the bell on approaching the crossing, a short distance behind and away from which decedent was walking at the time of the accident, as required by Code, § 1144,—is not sufficient to overcome the defense of contributory negligence.

4. A count alleging negligence in not blowing the whistle or ringing the bell before entering a cut on a curve within less than one fourth of a mile from a public crossing, when the engineer could not see one-fourth mile in front of him, is defective, under section 1144, providing for blowing the whistle and ringing the bell on entering a curve, for the reason that when the pleadings show the plaintiff to have been a mere trespasser he must show that the negligence of defendant was wanton, reckless, or intentional, to entitle him to recover.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge. Reversed.

Action by Fannie Meadows, administratrix, against the Savannah & Western Railroad Company, to recover for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

The complaint contained four counts. The first count alleged negligence on the part of defendant in failing to blow the whistle, or ring the bell, or give other notice while moving within the city of Opelika, at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed. The second count alleged negligence in failing to give a signal one-fourth of a mile before reaching a public crossing near which plaintiff's intestate was killed. The third count alleged negligence in not ringing the bell or blowing the whistle before entering the cut on a curve within less than one-fourth of a mile from a public crossing, where the engineer could not see one-fourth of a mile in front of him. The fourth count alleged negligence in having no head-light at the time of the accident, and that the engine was being run at a high rate of speed. Demurrers to each of these counts were overruled.

Harrison & Ligon, for appellant. A. & R. B. Barnes, W. J. Samford, and J. M. Chilton, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. This action was brought by Fannie Meadows, administratrix of her deceased husband, Robert Meadows, to recover of the defendant railroad company damages for the alleged unlawful and negligent killing of her husband. We will consider the case upon the hypothesis that the facts are as contended for by the plaintiff. According to this assumption, Robert Meadows was run over and killed by an engine of the defendant within the corporate limits of the city of Opelika, about 8 o'clock P. M. on the 13th of September, 1888. At the time he was struck by the engine he was on his way home, walking up the railroad track of the defendant, and within a cut, about twenty feet deep and some four or five hundred yards in length. Behind him, in the direction from where the engine was coming, there were street crossings and public road crossings, and one not very far from the entrance to the cut; and deceased came to his death after he had gone about 100 or 150 yards in the cut. There were curves in the road, which obstructed the view for less than a fourth of a mile. The engineer did not blow the whistle or ring the bell before reaching the crossing, and did not blow the whistle or ring the bell at short intervals, while moving within or passing through the city, as required by section 1144 of the Code; and defendant's engine had no head-light. The negligence of the defendant in one or more of these requirements, it is contended, caused the death of the decedent. Conceding that the proof of these facts shows negligence on the part of the defendant, does the proof, as admitted to be true, show that the deceased was guilty of such contributory negligence as to deprive the plaintiff of the right to maintain this action? There was no city ordinance regulating the speed of trains running within the corporate limits. The duties imposed upon railroads by section 1144 of the Code were intended to protect persons or property rightly at or approaching public crossings or stopping places of the trains, but have no application to places or conditions not within its provisions. In the case of Railway Co. v. Chewning, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 461, it is said: "While a person intending to take a train, awaiting its arrival, should not be regarded as a trespasser, should he merely cross or inadvertently step on the track in the dark, at or about the usual stopping place, plaintiff, having walked up the track beyond the limits of the usual stopping place, to meet the train, and having knowingly and voluntarily stepped and stood on the cross-ties, where he was not invited, and had no right to be, must be regarded as a quasi trespasser; or, as we have said, was guilty of negligence contributing to his own injury. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 150, 4 South. Rep. 618, it was declared to be the settled doctrine in this state, supported by the great weight of authority in England and America, that ordinarily the right of way of a railroad company is its exclusive property. Its free and unobstructed use is essential to the transaction of the business of the company. Mere acquiescence in the use of its right of way does not confer on the public a right to use it, nor create any obligation to look out for persons using it, other than the general duty to look out for obstructions, and that it was not competent to introduce evidence of the custom of people to walk on the track. When a railroad track runs through part of a city, town, or village, thickly populated, and the demands of trade and public intercourse necessitate the frequent crossing of the track, it is the duty of those operating an engine along the track in such places to keep a lookout. This duty to keep a lookout is not specially imposed by statute, but arises from the likelihood that in such places there are persons on the track, and the bounden duty to duly guard against inflicting death or injury, in places and under circumstances where it is likely that injury may result, unless care be observed. The duty arises when the circumstances exist which call for its exercise. The mere usage or custom of crossing the track at any particular place does not give rise to the duty to keep a lookout. The population and intercourse of a city, town, or village must co-exist with the usage to the extent that it is likely there are persons upon the track at the particular time or place. We do not think the track of a railroad can be converted into a road for ordinary travel, and one who undertakes to make such use of it becomes a trespasser. This we understand to be the extent of the rule declared in Railroad Co. v. Womack, supra, and, as thus qualified, the case of Railroad Co. v. Donovan, 84 Ala. 146, 4 South. Rep. 142, is reaffirmed.

Under the evidence as it appears in the record we do not doubt that at the time Robert Meadows came to his death he was a mere trespasser. The neighborhood where he was killed was sparsely settled, as much so as many country neighborhoods. The long cut into which he entered was not used, and could not be used, as a place for crossing the track. Its only use by the public was that of personal convenience for travel as a road, and was not at all necessary for this purpose. When the deceased entered this long cut at night, to use it as a road in going home, he became a trespasser, and was per se guilty of contributory negligence. Such being the case under the evidence as it appears in the record, the right of plaintiff to recover is narrowed down to the inquiry whether the defendant was guilty of reckless, wanton, or intentional negligence. Did the defendant discover the danger of plaintiff's intestate in time to avoid the injury by the exercise of due care and exertion, and did it fail to exercise such care? Such negligence must be shown to overcome the defense of contributory negligence. We deem it unnecessary to consider in detail the several assignments of error based upon the charges given and the refusal to charge as requested. The trial court evidently proceeded upon the idea that the use of the railroad track in a city or town as a road for travel was not a trespass, or that the law imposed upon the defendant the duty to keep a vigilant lookout, even for trespassers upon its track, so long as it was inside the corporate limits, without regard to population and public intercourse and usage, and without regard to the fact that the deceased was using the track as a road for travel for his personal convenience, at a time and in a place where there was no likelihood that any one would be. This, we have seen, is not a proper construction of the law. The statute requires in express language that the engineer shall blow the whistle or ring the bell at short intervals while moving within and passing through the city or town, and we hold this duty is co-extensive with the city or town, as we have explained. The mere failure to comply with these statutory requirements has never been held to constitute more than simple negligence.

Under our system of pleading, under a count for simple negligence, a recovery may be had upon proof of wanton negligence. The first, second, and fourth counts present a sufficient cause of action. The negligence of the defendant is averred in each of these counts. Applying the rule that the pleadings must be construed most strongly against the pleader, the third count is defective. It is averred that the injury occurred in a deep cut of the road. Although in a city, from the description of the place (in a cut) prima facie we would conclude from all that is stated in the pleadings that he was there without invitation, and was a trespasser. When the pleadings show that plaintiff is a trespasser he must aver more than simple negligence to authorize him to recover. The negligence must be wanton, reckless, or intentional. The complaint contains no such averment. Railway Co. v. Chewning, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 460. We have considered only the testimony of the plaintiff, because all the principles of law which govern the case are sufficiently raised by this evidence. Reversed and remanded.

KINNEY et al. v. ENSMINGER, (two cases.)

VENDOR'S LIEN.

A vendor of land, who takes the vendee's notes with a third person as surety, is presumed to have waived the vendor's lien.

Appeal from city court of Decatur; W. H. SIMPSON, Judge. Reversed.

Separate actions by George Ensminger and Mary L. Ensminger against F. M. and P. H. Kinney to enforce a vendor's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

Noble Smithson, for appellants. Wert & Speake, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. The two appellees, father and daughter, jointly owned a tract of land in Morgan county, but in unequal interests. Through a real-estate agent they agreed upon a sale of the land to F. M. Kinney at the price of $11,000,—$3,000 cash paid down, and the balance on time. They executed a deed to said F. M. Kinney, conveying him the land with full covenants of warranty, and received from him his two notes to secure the balance,—one for $2,000 due at 12 months, payable to Mary L. Ensminger; and the other for $6,000, due at 2 years, payable to George Ensminger. Each of these notes was signed also by P. H. Kinney, surety for F. M. Kinney. The deed was read to and signed and acknowledged by the Ensmingers, father and daughter, and delivered to F. M. Kinney. The notes, signed by F. M. Kinney and P. H. Kinney, were delivered to the payees respectively. The contract was made, and the papers bear date, in March, 1888. The notes do not express the consideration, and the deed conveys the land "for and in consideration of the sum of eleven thousand dollars, to us in hand paid by F. M. Kinney, the receipt whereof we do hereby acknowledge." The two bills, one by the father and the other by the daughter, were filed in August, 1890, against F. M. Kinney and P. H. Kinney. Their object is to assert and enforce a vendor's lien upon the land for the payment of said two promissory notes. Among other charges made in the bills, it is averred that one Harrison was the appointed agent of complainants to effect the sale; that he was instructed to so frame the contract as to secure and preserve a vendor's lien on the land for the payment of the purchase money; that he (Harrison) did effect the sale, and "that neither the note to said Geo. or Mary expressed in the face thereof, nor did the deed on its face, that the vendors retained a vendor's lien on said land for the balance of the purchase money; yet it was distinctly understood between complainant and respondents that said deed and notes should so show on their face." The answers deny every averment that there was any agreement or understanding that a vendor's lien was to be retained. George Ensminger testified that he did give instructions to Harrison, the agent, to retain a vendor's lien to secure the payment of the purchase money. He is not corroborated by any other witness on this point. He testified further that he read and spoke the English language, and that the deed was read over to him before he executed it. On the question of retaining a lien Harrison's testimony is diametrically in conflict with that of Ensminger. He testified that Ensminger desired personal security, and expressed distrust of the land as a sufficient security; that he even went so far as to say he did not desire to retain a vendor's lien. F. M. Kinney, the purchaser, testified that he purchased the land for sale again, and that he would not have purchased if a vendor's lien had been retained. There is testimony that each of the Kinneys was solvent when the contract was made, and P. H. Kinney was reputed to be wealthy. It was testified that they were, each of them, solvent when the testimony was taken in the case, and there was no testimony to the contrary. In the decree of the city court is this language: "After a careful investigation of all the evidence, the court is left in doubt whether the lien created by law by the sale of the real estate described in the bill has been intentionally disposed of or waived by consent of the parties, express or implied. The lien, therefore, must be held to attach under the authority of Tedder v. Steele, 70 Ala. 347." We hold it to be clear beyond all question that the attempt to establish by testimony outside of the writings that a lien on the land was retained to secure the payment of the purchase money was a failure. We think we might go further, if necessary, and hold that the allunde testimony against the retention of such lien outweighs that in support of it. Taking the writings alone for our guide, what are the implications? It must not be overlooked that this question never arises, unless there has been a conveyance of the title. If the title has been retained by the vendor, the land remains bound for the purchase money. In 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 323, it is said this lien "is waived by the taking of a distinct and independent security, unless there is at the time an express agreement for its retention. Thus, taking the bond or note of the vendee with a surety." In Foster v. Trustees, 3 Ala. 302, this court said: "On this side of the Atlantic, by a strong and decisive current of authorities, it appears to be settled that, where the vendor takes a distinct and independent security of the property, or the responsibility of third persons, the lien on the land is waived." In Walker v. Carroll, 65 Ala. 61, it was said: "Bell sold and made a deed to Walker, taking personal security for the unpaid purchase money. This was, at least prima facie, a waiver of the vendor's lien." In Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 167, it was said: "It cannot be doubted, presumptively, that the lien is abandoned where a vendor, who has conveyed the title, accepts a distinct and separate security for the purchase money; as, for example, a mortgage on other property, or a bond or note with surety or indorser, or a deposit of stock or personal property." In Donegan v. Hentz, Id. 437, the same doctrine was asserted, and emphasized in the following language: "That such security will operate as a waiver of the lien, prima facie, liable, of course, to rebuttal by legal evidence which is sufficient to overcome the presumption, was also decided by this court in Walker v. Carroll, 65 Ala. 61, and is fully sustained by the following authorities;" citing many. The city court was no doubt misled by the following language, found in the opinion in Tedder v. Steele, 70 Ala. 347: "The whole question of waiver is conceded to be purely one of fact or intention, and the burden of proof is always on the purchaser to establish, in the particular case, that the lien has been intentionally displaced or waived by the consent of the parties, express or implied. If it remains in doubt, then the lien must be held to attach." This language is copied substantially from Story, Eq. Jur. § 1224, and, as a general proposition, is correct. We cannot say it was not correct in the case then in hand, for in making the sale and purchase out of which that suit grew the numbers of the lands purchased were set out in the notes given for the purchase money as the consideration upon which they were given. This we have always treated as a weighty circumstance in arriving at the intention of the contracting parties to retain a lien. Bryant v. Stephens, 58 Ala. 636, as modified in Tedder v. Steele. That it was not intended in that case to overturn the doctrine that taking personal security is prima facie a waiver of the lien is shown on the face of the opinion delivered. Speaking of such presumed waiver it was said: "This doctrine is certainly well settled by the past decisions of this court, and may be considered as a rule of property, never departed from since the case of Foster v. Trustees, 8 Ala. 302." During the same term Justice SOMERVILLE, who prepared the opinion in Tedder's Case, wrote the opinion in the cases of Walker v. Struve and Donegan v. Hentz, each of which asserts the doctrine that when a conveyance is made, and personal or other additional security is taken, and nothing else appears in the transaction, prima facie this is a waiver of the vendor's lien. As we have said, this case must be decided on the facts and presumed intention derived from the papers themselves. They raise the presumption that the vendor's lien was waived, and nothing is shown to overturn that presumption. A presumption not rebutted becomes a conclusion. The decrees of the chancellor are reversed, and decrees here rendered dismissing the bills, at the costs of the respective complainants in the court below and in this court. This controversy has been before in this court. Kinney v. Ensminger, 87 Ala. 340, 6 South. Rep. 72.

CONVEYANCE OF HOMESTEAD — ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY WIFE.

Where a wife's signature to her husband's conveyance of the homestead was "attested by two witnesses" in compliance with the requirements of Code, § 1894, for a relinquishment of her dower, but was not separately acknowledged by her, as required by section 2508, for the conveyance of a homestead by a married man, since the deed took effect only upon delivery, where after its execution, but before delivery, the grantor had acquired and taken possession of another homestead, it passed the title to the land described, which had then ceased to be a homestead.

Appeal from circuit court, Calhoun county; LEROY F. BOX, Judge. Reversed.

Action of ejectment by Lucy Richardson et al. against the Woodstock Iron Company et al. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

This was a statutory action of ejectment, brought by the appellees, as the only heirs at law of W. B. Bonds, deceased, against the appellants, and sought to recover certain described lands. There were originally two suits, which by agreement were submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury, as one case. The defendants claim title by a deed of conveyance executed by W. B. Bonds and his wife, Lucinda Bonds, on January 5, 1880. All the other facts necessary to a full understanding of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion. Upon the submission of the case, the court announced a special finding, holding that the deed made by W. B. Bonds and Lucinda Bonds, his wife, was void because not properly acknowledged by Lucinda Bonds, and therefore rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. This judgment is appealed from by the defendants, and the same is assigned as error.

Caldwell & Johnston and Knox & Bowie, for appellants. Cecil Browne and Kelly & Smith, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. When this case was before the court at a former term, it was held that a conveyance of the homestead, in all respects effectual for that purpose, except that it was not acknowledged by the wife as required by law, was a nullity; and that a proper acknowledgment made by the wife after the death of the husband did not defeat or affect the title of the heirs. This conclusion necessarily resulted from well-settled principles of law, as declared by repeated decisions of this court, and many of them being referred to in the opinion. Richardson v. Iron Co., 90 Ala. 268, 8 South. Rep. 7. The question presented on this appeal was not considered in that opinion, and could not have arisen from the evidence as then stated in the record. The undisputed facts, as they appear in the present record, show that the instrument was signed and dated and properly attested by two witnesses, but not acknowledged by the wife in the manner required by law for the conveyance of a homestead,[1] and a few days prior to its delivery to the grantee. That, at the time it was signed, dated, and attested, the grantor and his wife occupied as a homestead the land described in the instrument. The testimony further shows that at that time the husband and owner of the land contemplated and was preparing to change his homestead, and a few days thereafter actually removed and occupied another and different place as his homestead. The evidence further shows that, prior to his removal, the grantor and grantee were negotiating for the sale and purchase of the land then occupied as a homestead, and, in pursuance of the understanding between them, the instrument was prepared, signed, dated, and duly attested, as above stated. The evidence further shows that the grantor retained the instrument in his own possession and under his control until he had acquired a new homestead. That subsequent to his removal to the newly-acquired homestead the purchase money was paid for the premises conveyed, and the deed, without the acknowledgment by the wife, delivered to the grantee. These facts are not controverted. "Delivery is essential to give effect to a deed; * * * that, though signed, attested, or acknowledged, so long as the grantor retains control over it,—so long as he does not part with it,—with the purpose that it shall inure to the grantee, title will not pass from him." Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 356; Elsberry v. Boykin, 65 Ala. 340. A deed or other writing only takes effect from its delivery. Stiles v. Brown, 16 Vt. 565. A deed duly signed and dated, but delivered at a subsequent date, takes effect only from the date of delivery, and the delivery cannot relate back, so as to vest title from the date of the deed. Mitchell v. Bartlett, 51 N. Y. 453. Notwithstanding there is a written date, the true date may be shown by extraneous evidence, even in the most solemn instruments, as deeds under seal. Lee v. Insurance Co., 6 Mass. 219. The deed only takes effect from the actual time of its delivery, and the actual date of delivery will always control the date mentioned in the deed. Tied. Real. Prop. § 812; Smith v. Porter, 10 Gray, 66; Newlin v. Osborne, 67 Amer. Dec. 269. Acceptance by the grantee is essential to pass title from the grantor and to the validity of the deed. Tied. Real Prop. § 814; 66 Ala. 356, supra. The writing and signing a note on Sunday is not the execution of it on that day, unless it be delivered on that day to the payee; delivery being essential to make it operative as a contract. If delivered on a subsequent day, not Sunday, it takes effect as a valid instrument from the day of delivery. Flanagan v. Meyer, 41 Ala. 135. It is legally impossible to have two homesteads at the same time. Boyle v. Shulman, 59 Ala. 569. If the wife had died after the husband acquired a new homestead, and before the delivery of the deed, according to all the principles of law cited in the foregoing authorities, the deed took effect from the day of its delivery. The principle involved in the present appeal is vitally different from that adjudicated on the former appeal. Under the facts stated, we do not doubt the purchaser received a good title. Reversed and remanded.

[1] Code Ala. § 1894, provides that, when a wife relinquishes her dower, "her signature must be attested by two witnesses, * * * or acknowledged by her," etc. Section 2508 provides that an alienation of a homestead by a married man shall not be valid "without the voluntary signature and assent of the wife, which must be shown by her examination, separate and apart from him," and prescribes the form of the certificate of her acknowledgment.

MOBILE & O. R. CO. v. GEORGE.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — INJURY TO EMPLOYE ON TRACK—PLEADING—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries, an allegation that plaintiff was upon defendant's track "at the instance and request of the defendant," and that defendant, notwithstanding its duty to manage its engines and trains "so as not to injure the plaintiff, * * * negligently ran over and injured the plaintiff with one of its engines," was sufficient although it did not aver the particular acts or omissions constituting the negligence.

2. Proof that plaintiff was on the track while in the discharge of his duties as a brakeman was a fatal variance.

3. Code, § 2590, subd. 1, provides that a master shall be liable to a servant for personal injuries caused by any defective machinery used in the business of the master, but not "unless the defect arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master." Held that, as such negligence must be averred, it was not sufficient to allege that defendant "negligently used" in its business a locomotive "which was out of order, so that it could not be stopped promptly" when making couplings and uncouplings.

4. The court erred in refusing an instruction that defendant could not recover under said count if "the locomotive engine * * * was not out of order, and was in suitable and serviceable condition."

5. Code, § 2590, subd. 3, gives such cause of action when the injury results from the negligence of any person in the service of the master, to whose orders the servant, "at the time of the injury, was bound to conform, and did conform, if such injuries resulted from having so conformed." Held, that it was sufficient to allege that plaintiff was injured while obeying the orders of defendant's yard-master, under whose directions plaintiff was, and who "negligently ordered the plaintiff to couple and uncouple certain cars;" it not being necessary to aver the particular acts or omissions constituting the negligence.

6. There being evidence that plaintiff was injured while between an engine and a car, in the act of uncoupling them, the court properly refused an instruction that he could not recover unless he was ordered to go in between the engine and car to uncouple the same, since there might have been circumstances under which plaintiff had a right to infer such order from a mere direction to uncouple the car and engine.

7. Code, § 2590, subd. 5, imposes such liability upon the master when the injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any one in his service, "who has control of any signal points, locomotive engine, switch, car, or train upon a railway." Held, that it was sufficient to aver that, while "plaintiff was uncoupling the said engine from one of defendant's cars, * * * said engineer negligently ran said engine forward, and knocked plaintiff down and injured him," without alleging that the engineer knew, or might by reasonable care and diligence have known, of plaintiff's position.

8. Evidence that the fireman was handling the engine when plaintiff was injured was admissible, as tending to show negligence on the engineer's part in permitting the fireman to be in charge of the engine.

9. It was not necessary for plaintiff to allege that he did not know, and could not by reasonable diligence have known, of the various acts of negligence charged.

10. Plaintiff alleged that defendant, disregarding its duty to provide for its employes an engine with a platform, upon which its brakeman could stand while coupling and uncoupling the engine to and from cars, "negligently used in its

said business an engine that was not provided with such platform or other device," and that plaintiff was injured because of his being thereby compelled to walk between the engine and cars to uncouple them. Held, that the court properly refused an instruction that, if plaintiff's injuries were the result of perils incident to the performance of his duties, he could not recover, since under the statute plaintiff could recover damages for injuries resulting from the negligence therein described, although such injuries were the result of risks assumed by plaintiff upon entering into defendant's employment.

11. Plaintiff accepted the issue tendered by defendant's plea in confession and avoidance, that, although plaintiff was injured by an engine that had no platform, it was safely and properly constructed, and in the manner that most of its engines were made, and that it was in good repair, and not defective; and that defendant had been compelled to use the engine by which plaintiff was injured as a yard-engine, because it had no other with which to replace the regular yard-engine while it was undergoing repairs. Held, that the court properly refused an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if he was injured by an engine "constructed upon a like standard and pattern, and in the same manner, as most of the engines are constructed and in use in the service of the defendant," since said instruction did not cover defendant's allegation that the engine "was in good repair and not defective."

12. Evidence was admitted that the engine usually used by defendant as a yard-engine had a step on each end, that the regular yard-engine was undergoing repairs, and that the necessity for the brakeman to stand on the ground while coupling and uncoupling was removed by attaching a flat-car to an ordinary road-engine. Held, that proper foundation was laid for the introduction of evidence that defendant customarily so used a flat-car.

13. A witness, who was shown to be prima facie an expert in such matter, was competent to testify as to the difference in danger between using an ordinary road-engine as a yard-engine, with and without a flat-car attached to it.

14. Evidence that railroad men considered the use of a road-engine as a yard-engine dangerous was hearsay and inadmissible.

15. The court erred in refusing an instruction that the burden of proving a cause of action within the statute was upon plaintiff. Railway Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 133, 4 South. Rep. 146, followed.

16. The court rightly refused to instruct the jury that plaintiff could not recover under certain counts as to which the evidence was conflicting.

17. There was evidence that plaintiff stepped in between the engine and car to pull out the coupling-pin; that, failing to do so, he signaled to the engineer to "give slack;" and that, as the engineer did so, plaintiff stumbled, and fell across the pilot, the heel of his shoe having caught on the top of the guard-rail. Held, that the court erred in refusing an instruction that, if plaintiff's injuries "were the direct results of an accident incident to the business in which he was engaged," he could not recover.

18. Defendant requested instructions that it was plaintiff's duty to take into account the perils attendant upon the service in which he was engaged, and could not recover if, when he went in between the engine and car, he failed to bestow that degree of care, in respect to his own safety, in view of the surrounding danger, that an ordinarily careful person would have exercised, or if he did not take the necessary precautions to protect himself against obvious danger; and that, if "it was manifestly dangerous of itself to uncouple the engine from the car on account of its having been coupled with the drawbar," and plaintiff failed to exercise that degree of caution commensurate with the manifest danger at the time he received his injury, "or, if defendant used that which was dangerous in a careless manner, this would be contributory negligence on his part." Held, that said instructions were improper, as they assumed that plaintiff's want of care and prudence contributed to his injury, which the jury should have been permitted to determine.

19. The considerations that moved plaintiff to leave defendant's shops, and accept employment as a brakeman, were irrelevant, and not admissible in evidence.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge. Reversed.

Action by James George against the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while performing the duties of a brakeman for defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

The complaint, as originally filed, contained 25 counts, and it was afterwards amended by the addition of 2 more counts. The defendant demurred to each count separately, and the court sustained the demurrers to all of the counts except Nos. 1, 19, 21, 23, 24, 26, and 27, and overruled the demurrers to these counts. The twenty-fourth count was stricken out by the plaintiff. The first count, after alleging that the defendant operated a railroad in this state, continued as follows: "The plaintiff was upon the defendant's said track at the instance and request of the defendant, and it was the duty of the defendant to manage and operate its engine and trains upon said track so as not to injure the plaintiff while so upon said track; but defendant, disregarding its said duty in the premises, negligently ran over and injured the plaintiff with one of its engines, and thereby caused plaintiff great pain and suffering," etc. The demurrers to this count were on the grounds that it did not show the violation of any legal duty due from the defendant to plaintiff, and because it failed to show with sufficient particularity the nature of the neglect, and the circumstances under which plaintiff was injured. The substance of the nineteenth count was that the plaintiff, while in the discharge of his duty as switchman, was run over by one of defendant's engines, by reason of the negligence of a switchman in the employment of defendant, to whose orders plaintiff was bound to conform, and did conform, and that said switchman negligently ordered the plaintiff to uncouple certain cars from the engine, "although said engine was so constructed that the plaintiff could not uncouple said cars without going between said engine and said cars, and the plaintiff conformed to said orders, and went between said cars, and in so doing was run over by said engine and injured." The demurrers sustained to this count were upon the grounds that it did not allege that when said switchman ordered the plaintiff to uncouple said cars he knew, or might have known, of the defective construction of said engine, by the exercise of reasonable diligence; that said count did not allege that plaintiff did not know that said engine was so constructed that he could not uncouple said engine without going in between said engine and said cars; and that it was not alleged that said engine was defectively constructed. The twenty-first count based its grounds of recovery upon the fact that plaintiff was injured while obeying the orders of the defendant's yard-master, under whose directions plaintiff was; and alleged that "the defendant's yard-master negligently ordered the plaintiff to couple and uncouple certain cars; that he uncoupled same, and in so doing was run over by said engine and injured." The grounds of demurrer to this count were that it was not alleged in what particular the defendant's yard-master was negligent, and that the allegations contained in said count show that plaintiff's injuries were the direct result of an accident. The twenty-third count, after alleging that the plaintiff was a switchman in the employment of defendant, alleged "that while the plaintiff was uncoupling the said engine from one of defendant's cars, in performance of his duty as such switchman, said engineer negligently ran said engine forward, and knocked plaintiff down and injured him." The ground of demurrer to this count was that it did not allege that at the time the plaintiff was uncoupling said engine from one of the defendant's cars the engineer knew, or might have known, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, that said plaintiff was between said engine and cars. The twenty-sixth count, after stating that the defendant was a railroad corporation operating a railroad in this state, and as part of its business it was necessary to have cars taken in and out of its yards, and that brakemen were employed, whose duty it was to couple and uncouple the cars, alleged that it was the duty of the defendant "to use due care in furnishing for the use of its said employes in said business, and for their protection, fit and proper engines, and to exercise due care to keep such engines in fit and proper condition for such uses; but, wholly disregarding its duties in the premises, defendant negligently used in its said business a steam-engine or locomotive which was out of order, so that it could not be stopped promptly when making said couplings and uncouplings; and on, to-wit, the 23d day of February, 1889, plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant as one of its brakemen, and as such it became and was his duty to go between said engine and defendant's cars, and while so between them, and by reason of said negligently defective condition of said engine, it could not be and was not stopped in proper time, and by reason of said defect it ran over and injured plaintiff." The defendant demurred to this count, on the grounds that it failed to allege whether the said engine was out of order when first employed and used by defendant, or whether it afterwards became out of order; and because it did not allege that the defendant, or any person superior to the plaintiff, engaged in the employment of the defendant, knew of the defective condition of the engine, or might have known of the same, by reason of ordinary diligence, and because it did not allege in what particular said engine was defective. The twenty-seventh count, after alleging the operation of a railroad by the defendant, and the necessity of moving its cars from place to place in its yard, and the employment of brakemen and switchmen by the defendant to couple and uncouple its cars, alleged that it was the duty of the defendant "to use due care in furnishing for the use of said employes in its said business, and for their protection, an engine with a platform or other device upon which its brakemen could stand while coupling or uncoupling the engine to and from the car to be moved in and out of its said yard, and from place to place therein; but, wholly disregarding its duty in the premises, defendant negligently used in its said business an engine that was not provided with such platform or other device, and on, to-wit, the 3d day of February, 1889, plaintiff was in the employment of defendant as one of its brakemen, and as such it became and was his duty to couple or uncouple the said engine from its cars in its said yard, and by reason of said engine not being provided with a platform or other device, as aforesaid, plaintiff was obliged to walk between said engine and cars, and by reason of the said defective condition of said engine, in not being so provided with such platform or other device, and while between said engine and car, in the performance of his duty, as aforesaid, said engine ran over and injured the plaintiff." The defendant demurred to this count on the grounds that it was not shown therein that it was the custom of all well-managed railroads to furnish engines with platforms or other devices to its employes, engaged in coupling and uncoupling cars; that it was not alleged that the defendant agreed to furnish plaintiff exclusively an engine with a platform or other device attached to it, for the purpose of switching in said yard, and that no facts are stated in said count whereby it was shown that it was the legal duty of the defendant to furnish said plaintiff an engine with a platform or other device attached thereto, for the purpose of coupling and uncoupling cars. The overruling of all of the grounds of demurrer to each of the counts, as stated above, constitutes the first six assignments of error. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and two special pleas to the twenty-seventh count, the substance of which are stated in the opinion.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff tended to show that on February 3, 1890, while he was at work in the yard of the defendant at Mobile, and in the discharge of his duty as switchman, under the direction of one Matt Eagan, an older switchman, he went between a regular road-engine, which was being used as a switch-engine in the yard of the defendant, and a car, to uncouple them; that just as he pulled the pin the pilot or cow-catcher ran upon him, threw him down, and the front wheels ran over him, cutting off both of his legs at unequal distances from his body. It was further shown that up to Friday before the accident, which occurred on Sunday, there was used before the engine a flat-car, "which made it less dangerous to couple and uncouple the cars in the yards, and that the yard-master ordered the flat-car, which had been used for this purpose, to be carried out on the road, and thereafter a regular road-engine was used alone, for switching purposes. It was further shown that the danger of coupling and uncoupling cars was greatly increased by the use of a road-engine instead of a regular switch-engine, and especially so by the use of such engine without the flat-car in front of it. There was also evidence tending to show that the throttle-valve of the engine and one of the flues leaked, and that the effect of the leak in the throttle-valve was to cause the lever to jerk away from the engineer, and make the engine move in a direction opposite to that desired, whenever the engineer undertook to shut the throttle or stop the engine. There was also evidence tending to show that when the engine caught the plaintiff the engineer, without stopping the engine, jumped down to assist the plaintiff, and the fireman seized the lever and stopped the engine, "but it was working backwards and forwards for some time before the engine could be stopped." The engineer in charge of the engine claimed that the plaintiff tried to pull the pin out, and failed, and then gave him the signal to give "slack;" that he shoved the engine forward in response to this signal, and that as he did so the plaintiff fell; but the plaintiff denies that he failed to pull the pin out, or that he gave the signal to give "slack," but claims that as he pulled the pin out the engine was shoved upon him, and he fell. The engineer claimed that the engine was stopped within the distance of 10 feet, and it was proved that if the engine was stopped within that distance it was a good stop. And the engineer also testified that neither the throttle-valve nor the flues leaked, so as to affect its stoppage in any way. Such other evidence as may be necessary to the full understanding of the opinion of this court is sufficiently stated therein. There was no evidence whatever of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The rulings upon the evidence, which are assigned as error, are sufficiently shown in the opinion. There was a general exception taken by the defendant to two separate portions of the court's general charge to the jury, which the rulings of this court render it unnecessary to notice.

Upon the introduction of all of the testimony, the defendant requested the court to give the following written charges, and separately and severally excepted to the court's refusal to give each of said charges as requested: (1) "The defendant ask the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that there was no switchman superior to the plaintiff in the service of the defendant, whose orders the plaintiff was bound to obey, who ordered plaintiff to go in between the engine and car to be uncoupled, and if they further believe from the evidence that said engine was not defectively constructed, then, under count nineteen of the plaintiff's complaint, the jury will return a verdict for the defendant." (2) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the yard-master in the service of the defendant, to whose orders plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform, did not order plaintiff, at the time of his injury, to go in between the engine and car to uncouple the same, and if they further believe from the evidence that it was a part of plaintiff's duty, when entering the service of the defendant, to uncouple cars from an engine constructed similar to the one to which was attached the car he was attempting to uncouple when injured, then, under the twenty-first count of plaintiff's complaint, you will return a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (3) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that at the time the plaintiff received his injury, while engaged in uncoupling a car from an engine, the engineer in charge and control of said engine did not negligently run said engine forward and over the said plaintiff, and thereby injure him, then, under the twenty-third count of plaintiff's complaint, you will return a verdict for the defendant." (4) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the locomotive engine, at the time the plaintiff sustained an injury, was not out of order, and was in suitable and serviceable condition, then the court instructs you, under the twenty-sixth count of the plaintiff's complaint, to return a verdict in favor of the defendant." (5) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the locomotive engine in use at the time the plaintiff sustained his injury was constructed upon a like standard and pattern, and in the same manner, as most of the engines are constructed and in use in the service of the defendant, to which cars are coupled and uncoupled on its line of railroad from Mobile, Alabama, to East St. Louis, Illinois, and frequently in its said yards, then the court instructs you that, under count number 27 of the plaintiff's complaint, you will return a verdict in favor of the defendant." (6) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that although they may believe from the evidence that it was the legal duty of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff a locomotive engine to be used in its yards at Mobile, Ala., to which was attached a platform or other device, upon which the plaintiff, as brakeman, could stand while coupling and uncoupling cars to and from said engine when moving said cars from place to place in said yard, and if they further believe from the evidence that the defendant did furnish a locomotive engine to which was attached a platform or other device upon which plaintiff could stand while coupling and uncoupling cars from said engine, and moving said cars from place to place in said yard, and that said engine, with the platform or other device upon which the plaintiff could stand while coupling and uncoupling cars, became out of repair and unserviceable, and that it was necessary to place said engine in the repair-shops to be put in order and made serviceable, and that defendant did not have any other engine, constructed as the one out of repair, that it could spare from its other yards, to be used in said Mobile yard, and that defendant furnished to its employes in its said yard, in lieu of said locomotive engine constructed with a platform which was sent to the shops for repair, an engine which was constructed of the same pattern or standard of most of the engines used in the service of the defendant, and which were frequently used in the service of the defendant, and which were frequently used in and about its said yards, then, in that event, the court instructs you, under the twenty-seventh count of the plaintiff's complaint, to return a verdict for the defendant." (7) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, James George, in entering the service of the defendant as brakeman, assumed to perform as a part of his duties the coupling and uncoupling of cars to an engine made and constructed upon the pattern of the engine in use at the time he received his injuries, namely, with a pilot and draw-bar, and if you further believe from the evidence that he performed this part of his duty without any protest or notice to his superior officers that it was dangerous, and if you further believe from the evidence that while performing such duties, namely, uncoupling a car attached to the engine in use at the time he received his injuries, and that his injuries were the result of the perils and dangers incident to the performance of that portion of his duties, then you will find a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (9) "At the request of the defendant the court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the injuries received by James George were the direct results of an accident incident to the business in which he was engaged, then, in that event, you will return a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (10) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the injuries sustained by James George resulted from the ordinary dangers incident to the service he was performing in defendant's employment, then you will return a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (12) "The court charges the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff, James George, to take into account the surroundings and perils attendant upon the nature of the service in which he was engaged at the time he claims to have received his claimed injuries, and to bestow such care and watchfulness as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under like circumstances in reference to their own safety; and, if the jury further believes from the evidence that the plaintiff, James George, failed and neglected at the time he went in between the engine and car, in the yard at Mobile, Ala., for the purpose of uncoupling the car from the engine, to bestow that degree of care, watchfulness, and caution in respect to his own safety, in view of the surrounding danger, that an ordinarily careful and prudent person would have exercised under like circumstances, then the jury must find in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (13) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence that it was apparently and obviously dangerous for the plaintiff, James George, to go in between the engine and car for the purpose of uncoupling a car from said engine in view of the surrounding circumstances unless the plaintiff, James George, took the necessary precautions to protect himself against the apparent danger, and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff did not at the time take the necessary steps and precautions to protect himself against the said apparent and obvious danger in view of the surrounding circumstances, they are instructed to find a verdict for the defendant, unless the jury further believe from the evidence that he received his said injuries from the negligence of the engineer, or the negligence of the yard-master, or the defective condition of the engine." (14) "The court charges the jury, at the request of the defendant, that to entitle the plaintiff, James George, to recover by virtue of the employers' statute of the state of Alabama, he must aver and prove a case within the provisions and operations of the statute. In this respect the plaintiff holds the affirmative of the statutory provisions relied upon in his complaint, and on which his right of recovery depends. And the court further instructs the jury that the general rule is that the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative." (15) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that it was manifestly dangerous of itself for James George to uncouple the engine from the car on account of its having been coupled with the draw-bar, then it was the duty of the plaintiff to exercise that degree of care and caution commensurate with such manifest danger of uncoupling the draw-bar from the car; and, if you further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff failed and neglected to exercise that degree of caution and prudence that was commensurate with the manifest danger at the time he received his injury, then the court instructs you to return a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (16) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that James George used that which was dangerous in a careless and negligent manner, this would be contributory negligence on his part to such an extent as to defeat his right of recovery, and you will return a verdict for the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (17) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, before they can return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff under the first count of plaintiff's complaint, they must believe from the evidence that James Lyons, locomotive engineer, in charge and control of the engine that ran over James George, the plaintiff, was incompetent to properly handle said engine by reason of some physical defect, and that said physical defect was known to the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, or might have been known to the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, by the exercise of reasonable diligence; and you must further believe from the evidence that the said physical defect of said James Lyons, in control of said engine, was unknown to the said James George, and could not have been learned by him by the exercise of reasonable diligence." (18) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the first count of plaintiff's complaint and the evidence submitted in said cause, the plaintiff, James George, and the locomotive engineer, James Lyons, were fellow-servants engaged in one common employment and under one common employer; and the court instructs you that, before you can return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff under the first count of said complaint, you must believe from the evidence that said James Lyons, locomotive engineer, was incompetent to safely handle said locomotive engine, and that said incompetency of said James Lyons, engineer, was unknown to the said James George, and could not have been discovered or ascertained by the said James George, plaintiff aforesaid, by the exercise of reasonable diligence." (19) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the said James Lyons was incompetent from any cause to safely handle the locomotive engine at the time said James George was injured, and said incompetency was known to the plaintiff, and he continued in the service of the defendant, then the court instructs you that, under the first count of said complaint, you will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (19a) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company under the first count of plaintiff's complaint." (20) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company under the nineteenth count of plaintiff's complaint." (21) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company under the twenty-third count of plaintiff's complaint." (22) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company under the twenty-sixth count of plaintiff's complaint." (23) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company under the twenty-seventh count of plaintiff's complaint." (24) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that James Lyons, locomotive engineer in charge of and controlling the engine at the time it ran over James George, the plaintiff in this case, had previously to that time been examined and licensed by a board of engineers, appointed by the governor of the state of Alabama, under an act to require locomotive engineers in this state to be examined for license by a board to be appointed by the governor for the purpose, then the court instructs you that this is prima facie evidence of the qualification of the said James Lyons to perform the duties of a locomotive engineer in the state of Alabama." (25) "The defendant asks the court to instruct the jury that, under the evidence submitted in this cause, they will return a verdict in favor of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company." (26) "The court instructs the jury for the defendant that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defect in the engine as laid in the first count of plaintiff's declaration, and if they further believe from the evidence that said defect was known to plaintiff as well as defendant, and that said plaintiff continued in the service without making any complaint about said defect, and was injured, then they must find for the defendant under said first count."

At the request of the plaintiff in writing, the court gave the following charge: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, on the 3d day of February, 1889, was in the employment of the defendant as a yard switchman, and that as such yard switchman it was his duty to go in between defendant's engine, having a pilot in front, and one of its cars, and uncouple them, while in motion, and while so between said engine and car, in the performance of his duty, and without any negligence on his part, the engineer in charge of the engine negligently and suddenly sent the engine forward at a quicker rate, and thereby caused the pilot of the engine to catch the plaintiff's leg or foot, or to strike him, and throw him down, and that the engine then ran over and injured plaintiff, the jury ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff." There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $19,547.20.

E. L. Russell, for appellant Gregory L. & H. F. Smith and R. I. Smith, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The first six assignments of error go to overruling the demurrers to the 1st, 19th, 21st, 23d, 26th, and 27th counts of the complaint; the 24th count having been struck out by amendment, and the demurrers to the others sustained. In each count the averment of negligence is general. In actions based on misfeasance or non-feasance, the rule, as settled by our decisions, is that, when the complaint avers the facts from which the duty arises, a general averment of negligence is sufficient under our system of pleading. The pleader is not required to specify the particular acts or omissions from which the conclusion of negligence is deducible. Leach v. Bush, 57 Ala. 145; Railway Co. v. Chewning, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 458. The nineteenth and twenty-first counts are framed under subdivision 3 of section 2590 of the Code, which gives a right of action to an injured employe, "when such injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the service or employment of the master or employer to whose orders or directions the servant or employe, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform, and did conform, if such injuries resulted from having so conformed." On the principles stated above, it is not necessary, in a complaint founded on this clause of the section, to aver in what particular or respect the orders or directions were negligent. It may be that good pleading requires the name of the person to whose orders the employe is bound to conform to be stated, so as to give the defendant notice thereof, and present as an issuable fact whether such person was in the service or employment of defendant, or whether plaintiff was bound to conform to his orders. This, however, not being assigned as ground of demurrer, we do not decide, and allude to it merely to prevent any inference of approval of a complaint omitting the name. On the same principle in a complaint framed under subdivision 5 of section 2590, "when such injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the service or employment of the master or employer, who has charge or control of any signal points, locomotive engine, switch, car, or train upon a railway, or of any part of the track of a railway," it is not essential to aver that the engineer knew, or might have known by the exercise of reasonable diligence, that plaintiff was between the engine and car, or any other particular acts or omissions constituting the negligence complained of. Neither need the complaint negative the fact that plaintiff knew, or by reasonable diligence might have known, the defect or negligence charged. Contributory negligence is defensive matter, which must be pleaded and proved by defendant. Railroad Co. v. Hawkins, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 271. The demurrers to the 19th, 21st, and 23d counts were properly overruled.

The first count of the complaint is not framed under any clause of the statute. It avers that plaintiff was on the track at the instance and request of defendant; that is, by invitation. From this fact springs the duty to exercise reasonable care and precaution to avoid injuring him. The facts being stated from which the duty legally arises, a general averment that the defendant negligently ran over and injured the plaintiff with one of its engines is sufficient. The count sets forth a substantial cause of action.

The third ground of demurrer to the twenty-sixth count is that it fails to allege that defendant, or any person superior to plaintiff, engaged in the employment of defendant, knew of the condition of the engine, or might have known of the same by reasonable or ordinary diligence. This count is framed under subdivision 1 of the section, which gives a right of action "when the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with, or used in, the business of the master or employer." The statute, however, further provides: "Nor is the master or employer liable under subdivision one, unless the defect arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition." In Railway Co. v. Bradford, 86 Ala. 574, 6 South. Rep. 90, this provision was held not to relate to defensive matter, but to the negligence of the defendant, and that facts would probably have to be averred which would show that the defect was within the statutory limitations. In this as in the other enumerated classes of cases arising under the statute, negligence on the part of the employer is the essential basis of liability to answer in damages to an injured employe; without negligence there can be no recovery. A complaint drawn under this clause, which does not allege in the words of the statute, or in substance, that the defect arose from, or was not discovered and remedied owing to, the negligence of defendant, or of some person intrusted with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition, fails to set forth a good and substantial cause of action. As to the particularity with which the facts should be averred, it is said in Railroad Co. v. Hawkins, supra: "There is no reason, however, for requiring a greater degree of particularity in the averment of negligence under this statute than is required with respect to any other negligence counted on for a recovery of damages; and the facts to be alleged in either class of cases are little, if any, more than the mere conclusions of the pleader, leaving the factors which enter into and support the conclusions to be adduced in evidence." An allegation pursuing the words of the statute, or substantially the same, is sufficient; but this much is requisite. The averment in the count that "defendant negligently used in its business a steam-engine or locomotive which was out of order, so that it could not be stopped promptly," cannot be regarded as the equivalent of the statutory language. The engine may have been negligently used in the business, and yet the defect complained of not have arisen from, or been discovered and remedied owing to, the negligence of defendant, or of some person intrusted with the duty of seeing that the works and machinery were in proper condition. The adverb "negligently," as employed in the count, qualifies the manner in which the engine was used, and, fairly construed, does not relate to the origin of the defect, or to the failure to discover and remedy it; and, even when taken in connection with the subsequent averment, that plaintiff was injured on account of "the negligently defective condition of the engine," is not the equivalent of an averment that the defect arose from, or was not discovered and remedied owing to, the negligence of defendant, or of any person in its employment,—is insufficient to bring the case within the statutory limitations. Manufacturing Co. v. Woodson, 10 South. Rep. 87, (present term.) The demurrer to the twenty-sixth count should have been sustained. The twenty-seventh count, which is framed under the same clause of the statute, is not obnoxious to any of the objections made in the assignments of grounds of demurrer.

The next 14 assignments of error go to the rulings on evidence. If the evidence objected to by defendant is admissible under any count of the complaint, there is no error in refusing its exclusion. The twenty-seventh count avers that the engine used in the yard at the time of plaintiff's injury was not provided with a platform or other device on which brakemen could stand to couple and uncouple. The evidence tends to show that defendant ordinarily used in the yard a regular switch-engine, having a step in front and rear, on which brakemen could stand. The switch-engine, being out of order, was at the shops for repairs, and a road-engine, with pilot attached, substituted. In front of the road-engine, and attached thereto, a flat-car was used until Thursday or Friday evening before plaintiff was injured, on Sunday. This flat-car had been removed from the yard by the yard-master. There is also evidence that the use of a flat-car obviated the necessity of brakemen standing on the ground when coupling or uncoupling. It was manifestly the duty of defendant to furnish as safe and suitable appliances as was practicable and reasonable, under the circumstances, for the protection of brakemen. In view of the other evidence, and this duty, testimony that defendant ordinarily used a particular kind of engine in the yard, and customarily used a flat-car, when a road-engine was substituted therefor, and that a flat-car was attached to the road-engine for a time, was admissible.

The eleventh assignment of error, to the effect that plaintiff was allowed to testify that the fireman was handling the engine at the time he was injured, does not seem to be sustained by the record. As we understand his evidence, he did not testify that the fireman was handling the engine, but simply that he stopped it. On the contrary, he testified that Lyon, the engineer, was in charge of the engine. However, if conceded that he did so testify, the evidence was admissible under the twenty-third count, as tending to show negligence on the part of the engineer in permitting the fireman to handle the engine at such time and under such circumstances.

The testimony as to the consideration which moved plaintiff to quit the shops and take employment as a brakeman was properly excluded. It does not throw light on any proper or material inquiry. The witness Davis, who is prima facie shown to be an expert in such matter, was competent to testify to the difference in danger between using a road-engine with and without a flat-car, especially when he states the facts on which his opinion is based. But it was not admissible for the plaintiff to testify that the railroad men considered a road-engine dangerous for uncoupling. This is mere hearsay; the experts themselves should have been called. The record discloses exceptions to other portions of the evidence, but they are not assigned for error.

The remaining assignments of error, 28 in number, go to charges given, and the refusals of charges asked by defendant. In considering them, we shall not regard the order in which they are numbered. The general principles regulating, in all the classes of cases defined by the statute, the rights and duties of the employe, and the liability of the employer, and also the defenses available to him, as declared by our former decisions, may be summarized as follows: Though the statute has no application to the known risks and dangers of the service or employment against which human skill and caution cannot provide, when an employe sustains injury by reason of any defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant, or the injury is caused by the negligence of any of the persons mentioned, and under the circumstances provided by the statute, it abrogates the common-law rule that the employe impliedly contracts to assume the known and ordinary risks incident to his employment. In neither of the classes of cases, however, does any liability for injuries, caused by the known and ordinary risks, arise without negligence on the part of the employer, or of some person intrusted with superintendence or authority to give orders or directions, or having charge or control of some signal point, locomotive engine, car, or train upon the track of the railway, or by reason of the act or omission of some person done or made in obedience to the rules, regulations, or by-laws of the employer, or to particular instructions of a person delegated with authority in that behalf. The scope and operation of the statute is to make the employer answerable in damages for an injury caused by his own negligence, or the negligence of a co-employe of the same or superior grade, in the enumerated classes of cases. In all cases, the employe is bound to use ordinary care for his own protection. If there are two ways of discharging the service apparent to the employe, one dangerous, and the other safe or less dangerous, he must select the safe or less dangerous way; and cannot recover for an injury sustained when the danger is imminent, and so obvious that a careful and prudent man would not incur the risk under the same circumstances. Railroad Co. v. Walters, 91 Ala. 435, 8 South. Rep. 357; Railroad Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 South. Rep. 360; Railway Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 133, 4 South. Rep. 146. There is evidence tending to show that plaintiff could have stood on the ground and uncoupled the car without going between the engine and car. If this be true, and it was apparent to plaintiff, and he nevertheless went between the engine and car, this was negligence, sufficient to defeat a recovery, if it contributed to his injury, notwithstanding there may have been negligence on the part of defendant, unless his injury was caused by reckless, wanton, or intentional negligence. Under such circumstances, it cannot be said that plaintiff used ordinary caution to avoid injury.

To entitle plaintiff to recover by virtue of the statute, he must both aver and prove a case coming within one of the enumerated classes of cases. Under the nineteenth and twenty-first counts, it is incumbent on plaintiff to show (1) that the person who gave the orders or directions was in the service or employment of defendant; (2) that he was bound to conform to the orders of such person; (3) that he did conform to such orders, and that his injuries resulted from having so conformed; and (4) that the person was negligent in giving the orders or directions. The clause under which these counts are framed evidently refers to special orders or directions, in respect to the particular service in which the employe is engaged at the time of the injury, as distinguished from a general order or direction, in reference to the discharge of his general service growing out of the nature and scope of his employment. But, in case of a special order to uncouple, there need be no express order "to go between the engine and car." Such direction will be implied from a special order to uncouple at a time and under circumstances rendering going between the engine and car necessary to conform to the order. There being no evidence that the yardmaster gave plaintiff any order or direction to uncouple the car from the engine at the time of his injury, he has failed to establish one of the essential statutory propositions, and is not entitled to recover under the twenty-first count. But charge 2, requested by defendant, proceeds on the theory that an express order, at the time of the injury, to go between the engine and car to uncouple, is requisite, and also that defendant may set up in such case the defense that plaintiff assumed the ordinary risks incident to his employment, though his injury may have been caused by the negligence of the yardmaster. For this reason the charge was properly refused. The same observations apply to charges 7 and 10; also, if the evidence fails to show that plaintiff was bound to conform to the orders of the switchman, he is not entitled to recover under the nineteenth count. Charge 1 should have been given if not objectionable in form, which we shall notice hereafter.

The twenty sixth count alleges that the engine was so out of order that it could not be stopped promptly. The pleader having specified the particular defect, it becomes matter of description, which it is incumbent on plaintiff to prove with equal particularity, as also that he was injured by reason of such defect. If, therefore, the evidence fails to satisfy the jury that the particular defect existed or that plaintiff was injured by reason thereof, he is not entitled to recover under that count. Railroad Co. v. Coulton, 86 Ala. 129, 5 South. Rep. 458. This is the legal proposition asserted in charge 4.

While charges 12, 13, 15, and 16 may assert correctly general legal propositions, they are defective in assuming, as matter of law, that plaintiff's want of care and caution contributed to his injury. Plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence as hypothesized, and yet such negligence not have contributed to his injury. Whether it did or not so contribute was a question of fact for the determination of the jury.

Charges 5 and 6 are founded on the predicate that the manner in which most of the engines used by defendant in coupling and uncoupling cars on the line of its road, and frequently in its yards, is the standard of defendant's duty to furnish safe and suitable appliances for the protection of its employes. This is not the law. But appellant insists that these charges should have been given under the issue joined on the two special pleas numbered 2 and 3, —pleas of confession and avoidance. The first alleges, in substance, that, while it was true that the engine which was in use at the time plaintiff was injured did not have a platform or other device upon which plaintiff could stand while coupling and uncoupling, the engine in use at that time was constructed in the same manner as most of the engines were constructed in use by the defendant to which cars were coupled and uncoupled along its line of railroad; that the engine used at the time of plaintiff's injury was properly and safely constructed, and of the same pattern and standard as most of the engines used by defendant; was not defective or out of repair, but was in good condition and proper repair, at the time plaintiff received his injuries. The third plea alleges substantially the same facts, and contains the additional averments that the switch-engine used in the yard had become out of repair and useless for switching purposes, whereby it was necessary to send it to the shops for repair, and that defendant had no other engine to put in the yard. Whether these pleas presented valid and substantial defense it is unnecessary to inquire. Plaintiff did not demur to them, but accepted the issues tendered by the pleas. Though they may have presented informal or immaterial issues, plaintiff having joined issue thereon, it would have been a reversible error to refuse to give charges framed in reference to such issues, and the tendencies of the evidence to establish the truth of the pleas. If the material averments be established, defendant is entitled to a verdict, whether the pleas are sufficient or insufficient. But charges 5 and 6 omit from the hypothesis the facts alleged in the pleas, that the engine was properly and safely constructed, and was in good condition and proper repair, and could be safely used in its yards in coupling and uncoupling cars. For this reason they were properly refused.

There is evidence tending to show that plaintiff stepped in between the engine and the car to pull the pin, and, failing to pull it, gave the engineer the signal to slack, in response to which the engineer, the engine having been reversed, threw the lever ahead, and as he did so plaintiff stumbled, and threw himself across the pilot, the heel of his shoe having caught on the top of the guard-rail. If such be the facts, the engineer was without negligence, and the injury to plaintiff accidental. It does not require argument or the citation of authorities to support the proposition that defendant is not responsible for an injury the direct result of an accident incident to the business in which plaintiff was employed. This is the proposition asserted in charge 9, which should have been given.

In Railway Co. v. Holborn, supra, we laid down the rule that, in cases under the statute, the plaintiff holds the affirmative of each of the statutory propositions on which his right of recovery depends, and the general rule applies, that the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative. The same rule was subsequently declared in Railroad Co. v. Davis, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 552. Charge 14 asserts this rule, but is objectionable because argumentative.

It being undisputed that plaintiff was an employe of defendant, and a fellow-servant of the engineer in charge of the engine which it is alleged was negligently run over him, he is not entitled to recover under the first count, as we have construed it to be a suit by a person not in the employment of defendant, but lawfully on the track. The liability for an injury to an employe caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant rests on entirely different principles from the liability to a stranger on the track by license or invitation. In the case of an injured employe, the complaint must contain other and distinct averments, whether seeking to enforce the common-law or statutory liability of the employer. The variance between the allegations of the first count and the proof is fatal.

Charges 20, 21, 22, and 23 are charges upon the effect of the evidence under separate and distinct counts, and charge 25 under the whole complaint. There being conflict in the evidence in some respects, and inferences to be drawn therefrom, these charges were properly refused. While some of the charges, such as 1, 3, and 4, assert correct legal propositions, they conclude with a direction to "return a verdict in favor of defendant" under the special and separate count in reference to which they are framed. The complaint, as amended, contains six counts, as to each of which a similar charge was separately asked. Had there been but one count, or, being several, had the charge upon the effect of the evidence applied to the whole complaint, there could be no objection to such conclusion of the charge, but, when there are two or more counts, the phraseology is subject to criticism. It is calculated to impress the jury with the idea that a separate verdict must be returned as to each count, though under some they may find for the plaintiff. Its tendency is to mislead or confuse, and requires explanation. As this objection may be obviated on another trial, we shall express no opinion whether it authorized the refusal of the charges, and merely suggest that the safer practice would be to adopt the usual form of expression in such cases. On the principles we have heretofore stated, the charges given at the instance of plaintiff assert a correct legal proposition. Charges 17, 18, 19, 24, and 26, asked by defendant, are abstract. The principles of law therein asserted have no application to the first count. Charge 13 is somewhat involved and argumentative.

Where the injury is permanent, the plaintiff, in actions of this character, may recover compensation for the disabling effects of the injury, past and prospective. In estimating the damages, the loss of time, and the incapacity to do as profitable labor as before the injury, as well as the mental and physical suffering caused by it, are pertinent and legitimate factors. Railroad Co. v. McLendon, 63 Ala. 266; Railroad Co. v. Yarbrough, 83 Ala. 241, 3 South. Rep. 447. It may be that the portion of the general charge, to the effect that plaintiff is entitled to recover "what his services have been proven to be worth from the time of the injury, or what he could have earned but for the injury, from the time of such injury to such time as he may reasonably expect to live, less what he may earn, if he earn anything in his present condition," does not accurately state the necessary and legal damages; but the exception is taken to two separate and distinct propositions of the general charge as a whole, the last of which is a correct proposition. Where such is the case, the exception is not available. Reversed and remanded.

WRITS — AMENDMENT OF RETURN — ATTACHMENT LIEN.

1. The court cannot, on motion, amend a sheriff's return so as to show a different date of service of process from that certified in the return, where the sheriff is now deceased, and his representatives are not in court.

2. Where process in an action by creditors to set aside a fraudulent sale of a stock of goods was served before defendant's attachment was levied, the attachment lien is subordinate to the creditors' lien.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge. Affirmed.

Bill by McDermott et al. to set aside for fraud a sale of a stock of goods by B. F. Eborn to Jefferson County Savings Bank. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

The bill was filed by the appellees against B. F. Eborn and the Jefferson County Savings Bank, and sought to set aside, as fraudulent, a sale of a stock of goods. The original bill in the present case was filed on September 15, 1886, and the return of the sheriff shows that the service of process in the present suit was made on the Jefferson County Savings Bank and B. F. Eborn on September 15, 1886. The complainants are creditors of Eborn subsequent to the execution of said bill of sale to the Jefferson County Savings Bank, as first made on May 30, 1886; and the city court of Birmingham rendered a decree dismissing complainant's bill, on the ground that said bill of sale was not void as to subsequent creditors. On appeal the judgment was reversed. After this reversal, the cause coming up again to be heard in the city court of Birmingham, the Jefferson County Savings Bank filed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill and amended sheriff's return, so as to show the priority of the lien of the defendant, and the Jefferson County Savings Bank also filed motions to so amend the sheriff's return. The complainants filed a motion to dismiss the cross-bill, and demurred thereto, and also moved to strike from the files the amended motion of the Jefferson County Savings Bank. The complainants' demurred both to the cross-bill of the Jefferson County Savings Bank and to its motion to amend the sheriff's return. The complainants' demurrer to both the cross-bill and the amended motion was sustained The cause then being submitted on the pleadings and proof, a decree was rendered in favor of the complainants. Defendants appeal.

W. C. Ward and E. K. Campbell, for appellants. Mountjoy & Tomlinson, for appellees.

WALKER, J. When this case was here on a former appeal, it was decided that the bill of sale to the Jefferson County Savings Bank was fraudulent and void as against the complainants, and that, if the process in this suit was served on the defendants prior to the levy of the attachment sued out by the bank against Eborn, then the lien of the complainants would be superior to that of the bank. No disposition having been made by the trial court of the motion which had been made for the amendment of the sheriff's return of the process in this case, so as to show a priority in the levy of the attachment, the cause was remanded, in order that some action might be taken on that motion. McDermott v. Eborn, 90 Ala. 258, 7 South. Rep. 751. After the remandment of the cause, the defendant bank amended its motion to set aside and correct the sheriff's return on the process in this case, and alleged in the amended motion that the sheriff whose return was sought to be corrected was then dead. The same relief as to the correction of the return indorsed on the process was also sought by a cross-bill interposed by the bank. The complainants' demurrers to the amended motion and to the cross-bill were sustained. That action of the trial court is now assigned as error. The practice in the courts of this state of granting leave to a sheriff to amend his return of process, so that it may conform to the facts, is well established and is approved. Wilson v. Strobach, 59 Ala. 488; Daniels v. Hamilton, 52 Ala. 105; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 745; 2 Brick. Dig. p. 456. A different question is presented when it is sought to compel the sheriff to change his return as to a matter of fact, or to have the court substitute its finding as to the facts of the service of process in the place of the officer's return. When the officer does not consent to the proposed correction, and the application is contested, a separate issue is presented for trial. It seems that the courts have regarded it as a matter of necessity to give credence to the official return of the service of process, in order to avoid the embarrassment of turning aside to try such collateral issues; and that a party who has been injured by a false return cannot dispute it in that case, but must seek redress by proceedings against the officer. Brown v. Turner, 11 Ala. 752; Crafts v. Dexter, 8 Ala. 767; Martin v. Barney, 20 Ala. 369; Boas v. Updegrove, 5 Pa. St. 516; Vastine v. Fury, 2 Serg. & R. 426; Bolles v. Bowen, 45 N. H. 124; 2 Freem. Ex'ns, §§ 358–369; Murfree, Sher. § 868. It is not necessary to determine whether or not such absolutely conclusive effect must always be accorded to a sheriff's return in the case in which it is made; for, without deciding that question, the action of the city court in refusing to disturb the return in this case may be sustained. By whatever procedure a return is impeached, if the attack against it is sustained, the result is to render the officer who made it liable in damages to the party who may have suffered injury in consequence of its falsity. In the present case, for instance, if it is a fact that the process was not served on the defendants until after the service of the writ of attachment sued out by the bank, the sheriff would be liable to the bank for any injury resulting to it from the falsity of the return; and, if the correction is made in this case, he might also be liable to the complainants for the failure to serve their process with proper diligence. The issue presented was one in which the sheriff was materially interested. He was a necessary party to any proceeding for the determination of the question. He was dead when the amended motion and the cross-bill were filed and submitted. His representative was not brought into the case. The controversy sought to be presented could not have been settled because of the absence of an indispensable party. The grounds of demurrer addressed to this defect in the amended motion and in the cross-bill should have been sustained. Brooks v. Harrison, 2 Ala. 209; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 368. If the sheriff or his personal representative could not have been made a party to the proceedings for the purpose of trying the question of the truth or falsity of the return, then that consideration alone would support the conclusion that the issue is one not determinable in this cause; for that cannot be a proper method of procedure from which must be omitted a necessary party to the question to be settled. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not the personal representative of the sheriff could have been made a party to the proceeding so as to be bound by the result thereof. The fact in this case, that a necessary party was not before the court, suffices to support the ruling on the demurrers pointing out that defect.

The contention of the complainants was that they were entitled to have the debts due to them from Eborn paid out of property which, it was alleged, was claimed by the bank. The bank at first claimed that property under the bill of sale, and afterwards claimed a prior lien by virtue of its writ of attachment. The former claim has been disallowed as fraudulent. The latter claim is subordinate to the lien in favor of the complainants, for, according to the sheriff's return which has not been amended or set aside, the attachment was not sued out until after the process in this case was served on the defendants. But it appears from the answer of the bank to the bill as amended that the property in question has been sold under its writ of attachment, and that it has received as proceeds of the sale an amount greater than the aggregate of the complainants' claims. There being in this case no claimant to that property or the proceeds of its sale besides the complainants and the bank, and it having been clearly ascertained that the complainants were entitled to priority, and that the bank was chargeable with more than enough to satisfy their debts, there was no necessity of a reference to the register to state an account of the amount with which the bank was chargeable, or to calculate the interest on the complainants' demands. The bank admitted that its receipts from the sale amounted to more than the complainants' demands. No further inquiry on this subject was necessary. The simple computation of interest was properly made by the judge himself, without a reference. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 396, § 476 et seq. The other questions sought to be raised by the assignment of errors are concluded by the decision on the former appeal. We have discovered no reason to disturb that determination. Affirmed.

POLLAK et al. v. HARMON.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where plaintiff, in trespass for attaching goods claimed to have been purchased by him from the attachment debtors, relies on his own testimony to prove that he was a purchaser in good faith, it is not error for the court to refuse to charge that the failure of plaintiff to produce the sellers as witnesses to prove the consideration is a circumstance of suspicion for the jury to consider.

Appeal from circuit court, Bullock county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge. Affirmed.

Action of trespass by J. F. Harmon against Ignatius Pollak and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

Roquemore, White & McKenzie, Norman & Son, and A. A. Wiley, for appellants. Cabaniss & Weakley and Watts & Son, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. On the trial of an action of trespass, brought by appellee against appellants, for levying an attachment against Harmon Bros. on a stock of goods which plaintiff claimed to have purchased from the defendants in attachment, both the vendors were sworn, and, with other witnesses, placed under the rule. The consideration alleged to have been paid was plaintiff's assumption of a debt of Harmon Bros. to Lehman, Durr & Co., for which he had become personally liable as surety, and to secure which he had mortgaged his real estate. Also his obligation to hold Harmon Bros. harmless against the payment of the debt. The vendors were not examined, plaintiff choosing to rely upon his own testimony to prove the consideration and the bona fides of the transaction. Defendants requested the following charge: "The failure of the plaintiff, if such is the fact, to introduce the grantors of the bill of sale as witnesses to prove the consideration of the instrument, if they were present in court, is a circumstance of suspicion that the jury may look to in determining their verdict, if there were any suspicious circumstances surrounding the transaction of making the sale." The refusal to give this charge is the only error assigned. There is a rule of evidence that, when a party has it in his possession or power to produce the best evidence of which the case, in its nature, is susceptible, and withholds it, the fair presumption is that he withholds it from some sinister motive, and that its production would thwart his evil or fraudulent purpose. This rule "excludes that evidence which itself indicates the existence of more original sources of information." There is also another rule, that, when a party has the means of producing a witness who possesses peculiar or higher knowledge of the transaction, and fails to produce him, this affords ground for suspicion that the testimony of such better informed witness would be unfavorable to his claim. Also, when any material circumstance is left unexplained, or there is an irreconcilable conflict of testimony preponderating on either side, and the party has, or is presumed to have, the means of explaining or contradicting, the failure to introduce the explanatory or contradictory testimony raises a presumption against the party on whom is the burden of proof, and is a circumstance to be weighed against him. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1267. Neither of the foregoing rules requires the production of the greatest amount of evidence which it is in the power of the party to produce as to any given fact. In the language of an eminent jurist, the rule is not infringed "where there is no substitution of evidence, but only a selection of weaker, instead of stronger, proofs, or an omission to supply all the proofs capable of being produced." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 82. Similar charges have been considered and disapproved. In Jackson v. State, 77 Ala. 18, the charge requested was: "If there were but two witnesses to the difficulty which resulted in the death of the deceased, and the prosecution has only called one of them, the presumption is that the testimony of the other witness would not be favorable to the prosecution, and the jury would be authorized to predicate a reasonable doubt on the failure to introduce the other witness." And in Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 223, the charge asked was: "If a party has a witness within his power to produce, and fails to produce him, the presumption is fair that the witness, if produced, would not support the right of the party." In respect to the refusals of the court to give these charges, respectively, it was said in the first case: "All the law requires is sufficient proof, and a party is not bound to produce all the witnesses to the facts. No presumption unfavorable to the prosecution arises from an omission to examine all the witnesses to the transaction." And in the case last cited, it is said: "The second charge is too general and comprehensive in its terms. Carried to its extent, it would require of a suitor that he should produce all the witnesses, no matter how numerous they might be, who knew anything of the transaction, and, failing to do so, to have the presumption indulged against him that such witnesses, if produced, would not support his right."

The proposition of the charge under consideration reaches beyond the extent and purpose of either of the above-stated rules, which are designed to prevent fraud. It requires a party to produce and examine all the witnesses to the transaction in his power, though all the evidence may be primary, or of equal grade, and no circumstance to contradict or explain,—merely cumulative evidence. On the principle that, when a transaction assailed by creditors as fraudulent is between relatives, clearer and more satisfactory proof of the fairness of the transaction and explanation of every suspicious circumstance is required than when the transaction is between strangers, appellants insist that a party who holds clearer and more satisfactory evidence of the matter in dispute than that offered, and which he has power to produce, and fails to do so, subjects himself to the imputation of withholding such evidence from sinister motives. The same principle was contended for in Patton v. Rambo, 20 Ala. 485. The contention there was that, when all the evidence introduced is primary or original in its character, still, if that which is offered is less satisfactory and conclusive than that which might have been, but was not, introduced, this is a circumstance that makes against the party, and should be considered by the jury in weighing the testimony actually introduced. It is said: "But if it were admitted that the distinction does or ought to exist, yet it is very certain that before the court should instruct the jury that the failure to introduce the more conclusive proof was a circumstance against the party, it should clearly appear to the court that the proof withheld or not introduced could more clearly or fully explain the point in issue than the proof relied on did. Unless this should be made distinctly to appear, no one could say what the evidence withheld could explain or show; and certainly no party is bound to introduce every witness to a fact that might be called; he need only prove the fact sufficiently." Both the grantors in the bill of sale were in court, and equally in the control of both parties. In such case the jury, being in duty bound to determine the case upon the facts shown and the evidence actually introduced, have no right to presume what would have been shown had the grantors in the bill of sale been examined as witnesses. The failure to examine them may have been the proper subject of comment before the jury, but furnishes no ground for any unfavorable presumption against either party. Scovill v. Baldwin, 27 Conn. 216. In the opinion of the jury, as appears from their verdict, the plaintiff established his case by evidence of requisite certainty. This is all the law requires, and, if plaintiff chose to rely on the evidence of the consideration and bona fides of the transaction actually introduced, the failure to examine the grantors in the bill of sale to prove its consideration is not a circumstance of suspicion to which the jury may look in determining their verdict, and does not authorize, under any recognized rule, a presumption against him. Affirmed.

WIMBERLY v. MAYBERRY et al.

MECHANICS' LIENS — PRIORITY OVER MORTGAGE — ENFORCEMENT.

1. Code Ala. § 3018, provides for a mechanic's lien on the building or improvements, and the land on which the same is situated, to the extent of the interest of the owner. Section 3019 declares that the lien as to the land shall have priority over all other liens created subsequently to the commencement of the work on the building; and as to the building it shall have priority over all other liens, whether existing at the time of the commencement of such work or subsequently created. In an action to enforce a lien against mortgaged premises for materials and labor, it appeared that the premises were insured for the benefit of defendant mortgagee, and, after a loss by fire, by agreement between the mortgagor and defendant, the insurance money was used by the mortgagor in rebuilding; that after the money was expended the mortgagor, without defendant's knowledge, contracted with plaintiffs for the material and labor which created the lien sought to be enforced. Held, that defendant's mortgage lien was superior and prior as to the property covered by the mortgage before plaintiffs' lien attached, and subordinate to plaintiffs' lien for what he added. STONE, C. J., and CLOPTON, J., dissenting.

2. The rights between the holders of mortgage and mechanics' liens can only be adjusted by a court of equity.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; W. W. WILKERSON, Judge. Reversed.

Action by H. H. Mayberry and others against T. P. Wimberly to enforce a mechanic's lien for materials furnished and labor performed. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals.

Garrett & Underwood, for appellant. Cabaniss & Weakley, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The agreed facts, as we construe them, are substantially as follows: On the 26th day of October, 1889, one R. M. Mulford, being then the owner in fee of a lot and dwelling and other improvements thereon in the city of Birmingham, obtained a loan of $4,000 from T. P. Wimberly, and secured the same by a mortgage of the lot, dwelling, and improvements, and, as a further security, the mortgage provided that the dwelling should be insured for the benefit of the mortgagee. The mortgage was regularly acknowledged and recorded. Before the 2d day of June, 1890, the dwelling was partly destroyed by fire, and from the policy of insurance $2,664 was realized. By agreement between Wimberly, the mortgagee, and Mulford, the mortgagor, Mulford was permitted to use the insurance money in rebuilding his dwelling; it being expressly agreed that the new building should stand in the place of the burned dwelling, and be subject to the mortgage in the same manner. Mulford expended the insurance money without completing the dwelling, and, without the consent or knowledge of his mortgagee, incurred the indebtedness sued upon, for its completion. Complainants Mayberry and others, whose claims aggregate about $600, filed their bill to enforce a lien for material furnished for the completion of the building. The city court granted relief to the complainants, holding that their lien for materials extended to the entire building, and was superior and prior to that of the mortgage. The decree of the court is assigned as error.

Section 3018, Code, declares that every mechanic or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor upon, or furnish any material, fixtures, * * * for, any building or improvements upon land, or for repairing the same, * * * shall have a lien therefor on such building or improvement, and on the land on which the same is situated, to the extent in ownership of all the right, title, and interest owned therein by such owner or proprietor, etc. The lien for repairs, by this section, is as extensive as that given for materials or fixtures furnished for the building or improvement. Section 3019 of the Code, fixing the priority of liens, declares: "Such lien as to the land shall have priority over all other liens, mortgages, or incumbrances created subsequently to the commencement of the work on the building or improvement, or repairs thereto; and, as to the building or improvement, it shall have priority over all other liens, mortgages, or incumbrances, whether existing at the time of the commencement of such work or subsequently created." The terms "building or improvement," as here used, are not necessarily synonymous, and have a different signification from "repairs thereto," although repairs ordinarily may be an improvement. The term "building" refers to an independent erection upon the land. An improvement may be an independent structure or addition, and it may be an addition to or mere betterment of a building or improvement already made, and not included in "repairs thereto."

The statute contemplates different conditions of the realty at the time of the commencement of work by the mechanic, or when the materials are furnished, or repairs thereto are made: First, when there is no lien or incumbrance upon the land at the time the building or improvement or repairs are commenced; second, when there is a lien upon the land, and other and independent buildings or improvements are subsequently commenced; third, when there is a lien upon the land, and building or improvements thereon, and further improvements or repairs are subsequently commenced. The word "land," as used in sections 3018 and 3019, has its common-law meaning, and includes all buildings or improvements on the land at the time of the commencement of the work, or when materials are furnished. Under the first condition, by virtue of section 3018 of the Code, a lien is given upon the building or improvement and land, not only for the work done and materials furnished, but for repairs made; and, by section 3019 of the Code, this lien has preference over all subsequent liens or mortgages. The lien may be enforced, if necessary, by a sale of the entire property. Under the second condition, for the erection of an independent building or improvement, a mechanic's or material-man's lien is given upon the building or improvement, which is declared to be superior to any existing lien upon the land. The statute provides that this lien may be enforced by a sale of the building or improvement, and, if necessary, the purchaser has authority to remove it from the land. The other condition is when there is a lien for an improvement, which is a mere betterment of a building or improvement, or when there is a lien for "repairs thereto," upon which there is an existing mortgage or lien, before or at the time the improvements or repairs are commenced. The statute as clearly declares the lien for an improvement which is a mere addition or betterment of a building or improvement, or for repairs thereto, as it does upon a building or improvement wholly erected; and it is the duty of the courts to protect and enforce the lien as far as it can be done legally, and without interfering with vested interests or impairing the obligation of contracts.

To determine the respective rights of the holders of the different liens in the cases last enumerated is the question presented by the record for adjudication. Section 3019, supra, fixing the priority of the liens, uses the term "such lien." The lien given to which the words "such lien" refer, and its extent, is declared and defined in the previous section, 3018, in the following words: "Shall have a lien therefor on such building or improvement, and on the land on which the same is situated, to the extent in ownership of all the right, title, and interest owned therein by such owner or proprietor." The italics are ours. "Such lien," the priority of which is fixed, and provision for its enforcement made in section 3019, is limited by section 3018 to the right, title, and interest of the owner or proprietor in the "building or improvement, and the land on which the same is situated." This must necessarily be correct; otherwise the owner of a life-estate in a block of buildings, by a contract for improvements or repairs, might have all the buildings sold and removed from the premises, to the entire destruction of the property of the remainder-man; or a vendee, who retains the vendor's lien, might be improved out of his security, without fault or neglect on his part. Under this view, the question arises, what operation will be given to that part of section 3019 which provides, "as to the building or improvement, it shall have priority over all other liens," etc.? The lien can have no force beyond its extent, and its extent is upon the whole building or improvement, except as declared and limited by section 3018. There are many conditions in which the lien can be enforced by a sale of the buildings or improvements, as provided in the statutes, and without injury to any creditor or owner of the land or remainder interest. To have a proper understanding of the statute, the two sections must be construed together, and with reference to the existing law intended to be changed, and the protection to mechanics and material-men intended by the statute. At common law, a mortgage or lien upon land carried with it not only the buildings or improvements erected thereon at the time, but all subsequent buildings, improvements, or repairs thereto, merged into the realty, and became subject to the mortgage, and this is the law now, except so far as changed by statute or agreement of parties. The lien of mechanic or material-men is purely statutory, and its operation and extent is defined and limited by statute. Copeland v. Kehoe, 67 Ala. 597.

There was no injustice or injury in giving to mechanics and material-men a prior lien upon buildings or improvements wholly erected by them against existing mortgages or liens, or in declaring a prior lien upon the land as against the mortgages and liens subsequently obtained. As against a prior mortgage or incumbrance of the land, the equity and policy of the statute which secures the mechanic's and material-man's lien rest upon the principle that no injustice is done in preventing the holder of the older lien from appropriating the labor and material of others, by which his security is enhanced, without compensation. It would be inequitable to hold that a mechanic or material-man can appropriate, as compensation for his labor and material, the estate of an innocent prior mortgagee; or, as was forcibly stated in Welch v. Porter, 63 Ala. 232, "to hold that a subsequent contractor or material-man could acquire a lien which would take precedence over an intervening incumbrance * * * would shock the moral sense of the profession, and fail to carry out the intention of the legislature." The purpose of the act was to intervene in favor of the mechanic or material-man, and secure to him a paramount lien upon what he put upon the land in the way of "buildings or improvements or repairs thereto," and prevent the operation of the common law, which, without the act, would give an existing mortgage or lien a priority over it. The property improved in such cases merges into the realty, but subject to the mechanic's lien to the extent of the value of the improvements. It was to protect those by whose labor and materials the value of the property was increased, as far as possible, to the extent of the enhanced value of the property. When a building or improvement, as an entirety, is placed upon or added to land under mortgage, such building or improvement may be sold and removed without affecting the mortgage security. Where the improvement is a mere betterment, or where repairs are made upon a building or improvement upon which there is a valid lien, and the owner has only a qualified right, it would be unjust and inequitable in many cases, and against the plain provision of section 3018, to enforce the lien, and give it priority on the entire building or improvement. It would be appropriating one's man's property to pay the debts of another, without his knowledge and consent.

The statute of Iowa, in regard to mechanics' liens, is very similar to the statute of this state. See Revision Iowa, §§ 1846, 1855. In the case of Getchell v. Allen, 34 Iowa, 559, it was held a mechanic's lien for work or material furnished in making additions or repairs to a building is not entitled to preference, as against the entire building, over a prior mortgage on the premises; that the word "improvement," as used in the statute, did not apply to an addition or betterment of a building, but to some independent structure on the land. This ruling was afterwards affirmed in Neilson v. Railroad Co., 44 Iowa, 77. In the case of Insurance Co. v. Slye, '45 Iowa, 615, it was held that a mechanic's lien for materials furnished for the improvement or enlargement of a building does not take priority over an existing mortgage, and this rule prevails, even though the building be changed so that very little of the original structure remains. The Iowa courts have not given to the word "improvement" the same extensive definition as that given to it by this court. We do not see that the difficulty of construing and applying the statute is in any way relieved by confining "improvement" to independent structures or erections. The Iowa statute provides a lien for "repairs" to the same extent as our statute, and the lien given for repairs like ours is the same as that for "building or improvements."

The Missouri statute is also substantially the same as that of this state. In the case of Crandall v. Cooper, 62 Mo. 478, the facts were that Cooper, a mortgagor, contracted for improvements in putting up a fence on the mortgaged premises. The question arose as to the priority of the mortgage lien and the mechanic's lien. The court held the mechanic acquired no greater interest in the realty than Cooper, the mortgagor, possessed, viz., the equity of redemption, or a right to the premises after the trust lien was paid off. The court further held that the mechanic might have enforced his lien upon the fence, and recovered it. The case is cited to show that the mechanic's lien is limited to the extent of ownership of the owner of the land as against a prior mortgage. In the case of Haeussler v. Thomas, 4 Mo. App. 463, the same question was directly involved. The different sections of the Missouri statute are set out in the opinion, and we find no material difference in the statutes quoted from that of this state. The second section of the Missouri statute, as section 3018 of the Code of Alabama, limits the mechanic's lien "to the extent, and only to the extent, of all the right, title, and interest owned therein by the owner or proprietor of such building, erection, or improvement," etc. The third section of the Missouri statute declares that "the lien for the things aforesaid or work shall attach to the buildings, erections, or improvements, for which they were furnished or the work was done, in preference to any prior lien upon the land upon which said buildings, erections, improvements have been erected or put," etc. The statute goes on to prescribe for the sale and removal of the buildings or improvements in the same language as that used by our statute. The court held that the two sections must be construed together, and that the second section could not be set at naught in construing the third section, giving priority to the lien, and to hold otherwise would impair the obligation of a contract. The conclusion of the court is that the third section does not give a mechanic's lien for repairs upon an existing building, to the prejudice of rights previously acquired by a mortgagee, though it does give him a lien upon a build ng erected by him subsequent to the mortgage. We approve of the conclusion of the court, as we have stated that conclusion above. The same general principle is recognized in the case of Steininger v. Raeman, 28 Mo. App. 594.

The supreme court of Minnesota, in the case of Meyer v. Berlandi, and of Manufacturing Co. v. Jameson, 40 N. W. Rep. 513, held the statute of the state, in so far as it assumes to give a mechanic's lien precedence over prior incumbrances, to be unconstitutional and void. The reasoning of the court in this opinion is to the effect that such an act impairs the obligation of contracts, and divests settled rights of property. The view we take of our statute, as applied to the facts of this case, do not require a decision of this question, as we are of opinion that the lien may be enforced without divesting vested rights, or impairing the obligation of a contract. We hold the meaning and intention of our statute is to give the anterior incumbrance priority upon what it embraced when the mechanic's lien commenced, and the mechanic's or material-man's lien or for "repairs thereto" priority over what is added, either as a building or improvement or repairs. It would be in violation of the plain language of the statute to permit a mortgagee to appropriate to the payment of his debt not only the property covered by his mortgage, and upon which he relied as security, but also the additional security furnished by the mechanic or material-man; and it would be inequitable and contrary to law to apply the mortgagee's prior security to the payment of the mechanic's or material-man's claim. The rights of both may be adjusted and preserved in a court of equity. This conclusion is entirely consistent with the case of Turner v. Robbins, 78 Ala. 592. The facts in that case show that the mortgage was upon a naked lot, and the mechanic's lien was given a preference upon a building subsequently erected. The same principle applied in the case of Stockwell v. Carpenter, 27 Iowa, 119, to which we have been referred. There the vendor's lien was upon a naked lot, and the buildings afterwards erected.

Cases will arise under our construction which involve difficulty in the adjustment of the equities of the parties, and enforcing their respective priorities; but the statute is plain in declaring the lien for materials and repairs and fixing its priority. The statute is not unconstitutional, as we construe it, and should be enforced in all cases where it can be done within constitutional limits. The statute makes no provision for adjusting priorities of liens in courts of common law, and the power of a court of law, without additional legislation, is not sufficient in all cases. If the building or improvement is a separate, independent erection or structure, it may be sold under execution from a court of law, and removed. If the mechanic's lien be for a mere betterment of a building or improvement, or for repairs thereto, upon which there is an existing mortgage, the priority of the lien cannot be adjusted and protected in a court of law. A purchaser at a mortgage sale, foreclosed by a power contained in the mortgage, would not destroy the mechanic's lien, further than as to his right to redeem. Any other lien the statute gives him would continue and follow the property. There is no doubt but that the mortgagee may also redeem the property from under the mechanic's lien which is prior to his lien. The mortgagee's lien is superior and prior as to the property covered by the mortgage before the mechanic's or material-man's lien attached, and subordinate to the lien given to the mechanic or material-man for what he added, and so the lien of the mechanic or material-man is upon the whole property, but subordinate to the mortgage as to the property covered by the mortgage when his lien attached. This is the condition of the property, and the relative rights of both are fixed by statute, and the only question is as to the power of a court of equity to preserve, adjust, and enforce the respective rights of all.

When the jurisdiction of a court of equity is invoked, all parties in interest may be made parties, and the court of chancery, by reason of its elastic power, has authority to so frame its orders and decrees as to ascertain, adjust, and protect every interest and priority. In adjusting the equities between a prior bona fide mortgagee of the land, as we have defined "land," and the holder of a mechanic's or material-man's lien for betterment of or repairs to a building or improvement, the court is not bound by the contract between a contractor or the owner of the land and the mechanic or material-man. As between the latter, judgment will be rendered according to contract, but as to the mortgagee this contract is res inter alios acta. It is clear, under general principles, the mortgagee, by paying the mechanic's lien, could subject the whole property to his lien; and there is no reason why the mechanic or material-man could not redeem the property from under the mortgage, so as to subject the entire property to his claim. Under the rule declared, to adjust the equities of the mortgagee and mechanic or material-man, the court should order a reference, to ascertain the value of the building or improvement, without estimating the increased value added by the improvements or repairs which are subject to the prior lien of the mechanic or material-man, and also its value including that added by the material or repairs. If the proof shows the value has not been enhanced by the material furnished or repairs made, the material-man or mechanic gets nothing as against the prior mortgage. On the other hand, if the proof shows that without the improvements or repairs the property would not be so valuable as with them, the mechanic's or material-man's lien has priority on the increased value, and, in proportion as the building or improvement is increased in value by the material furnished or repairs made, the rule is furnished for declaring the relative rights and interest of the parties in the building or improvement. If the building or improvements are sold by the decree of the court, the proceeds can be easily adjusted. As stated before, the power of the chancery court is not limited to a sale of the property. In some cases, as where the mechanic's claim was due, and the property was covered by a mortgage of prior date, but which did not mature until some time in the future, or where the owner had only a life-time estate in the building, it might be more equitable and necessary, in order to protect the interest of all parties, to adopt the rule laid down in Hoot v. Sorrell, 11 Ala. 386, and rent out the property. The refusal of a mortgagee to foreclose his mortgage cannot operate to defeat the power of a court of equity to take care of the prior lien of a mechanic or material-man. The form of the decree enforcing the liens will depend more or less upon the proof as to the particular estate of the owner, the condition of the property, and the character of the conflicting liens. All these must be considered, and perhaps cases will arise into which other considerations will enter. Ware v. Shoe Co., 92 Ala. 145, 9 South. Rep. 136. Where the mortgage has been legally foreclosed by a power of sale contained in the mortgage, it would seem the better time for fixing the respective valuations would be at the date of the foreclosure. Ordinarily, when there has been no foreclosure, it would seem the better time would be when the reference is ordered by the court; but we lay down no inflexible rule on this point, as we cannot anticipate circumstances. A mortgagor in possession before foreclosure is an owner or proprietor, within the meaning of the statute, and authorized to contract for building or improvements or repairs. The description of the property in the bill of complaint is a substantial compliance with the statute. The demurrer to the bill was properly overruled. The cause is reversed, and remanded, that the trial court may proceed in accordance with the principles of law herein declared. Nothing in this opinion is to be construed as having reference to the statute as amended by the act of 1890-91, p. 578, passed by the last legislature. The rights herein involved had vested before the passage of that amendatory act. Reversed and remanded.

Since the foregoing opinion was prepared, the chief justice has written a dissenting opinion, and we do not deem it improper to notice the argument adduced by him for holding to a contrary conclusion. If the learned chief justice, in his able dissenting opinion, had explained how it is that the lien for a building wholly erected upon land under a mortgage is prior and superior to the mortgage, and the lien for an improvement or "repairs thereto" is secondary and subordinate to the mortgage, his conclusion would be much more satisfactory. The statute which declares and fixes the priority of the former is that which declares and fixes the priority of the latter, and the statute makes no distinction as to the extent and priority of either. The lien for either stands upon the same footing, and both liens are of equal dignity and entitled to the same priority as to existing mortgages. The authority for holding that one is senior and superior to the mortgage, and the other junior and subordinate to the mortgage, and as attaching only to the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, we submit cannot be found in the statute itself. That this is true is clearly manifest from the statute, and from its extent and operation upon the property of the owner when there are no intervening incumbrances. In such case the lien for repairs may be enforced against the whole building and the land. It is the qualified interest of the owner, or the prior incumbrance, which limits the priority of the mechanic's lien to that which was added by his material or labor, and prevents it from operating on the whole property. The court has not conceded, as stated by the chief justice, that the lien of complainant for materials is subordinate to that of the mortgagee. We expressly hold, in the language of the statute, that it has priority to the extent of the value of the improvement, and is secondary only as to the property covered by the mortgage before the materials were added. The facts that the building wholly erected may be sold and removed goes merely to the remedy. This in no way enlarges or diminishes the force and extent of the lien as declared by the statute, nor can the mere right to remove the building operate to prevent the common-law principle from applying which would subject buildings subsequently erected to a prior mortgage. It is the statute which has this effect, and, if available to protect a building from the operation of the common-law principle, which would subject it to a prior mortgage, it is equally effective to protect additions to the realty, whether by way of "improvements or repairs thereto." If the one is constitutional, the other is, for the same principle is involved in both, and the language of the statute as to both is the same. At common law, a building is merged into and becomes as much a part of the realty as "repairs thereto;" no more, no less. No fair construction of the statute will lead to any other conclusion. The fact that one may be severed and the other not, has nothing to do with the principle of law. Whether the powers of the court are competent to protect and enforce both liens is a different question. If a case should arise in which the courts would be unable to afford relief, it would be simply a case of a right without a remedy. We cannot yet see that this case is one of that character. It is conceded that if $600, for which the material-man's lien is claimed, had been expended in the erection of an independent building, the statute would prevent the appropriation of the building to the payment of the mortgage in preference to the payment of the material-man's claim. Now, if, by reason of the material added, the property will sell for more, by $600, than it would have sold for without the material, why should the mortgagee in the one case, any more than in the other, be permitted to appropriate the additional $600? How is the mortgagee injured, if he gets all he would have received if the material had not been added, and what injustice is there in the rule which secures to the material-man compensation for his labor and materials by which the value of the property was enhanced. Suppose in this case there had been no insurance, and after the almost total destruction of the mortgage security by fire the mortgagor had procured by contract the rebuilding of the house, expending over $3,000, for which the mechanic's lien attached, could the mortgagee, in the face of the statute, have appropriated the whole property to the payment of his mortgage? Such a construction would convert the statute into a snare to catch the unwary mechanic. This is the rule which seems to apply in the state of Illinois. The statutes are not exactly alike, but there is no difference so far as the application of the principle is involved. Code Ill. p. 665, c. 82, § 1, is as follows: "That any person who shall, by contract * * * with the owner of any lot or piece of land, furnish labor or materials, * * * in building, altering, repairing, any house, building, or appurtenances thereto, shall have a lien upon the whole of such lot, and upon such house or building and appurtenances," etc. Section 2 extends the lien to the interest of the owner, etc. Section 17: "No incumbrances upon the land created before or after making of a contract, under the provisions of this act, shall operate upon the building erected or material furnished until the lien in favor of the person doing the work shall have been satisfied; and, upon questions arising between previous incumbrances and creditors, the previous incumbrance shall be preferred to the extent of the value of the land at the time of making the contract, and the court shall ascertain by the jury or otherwise, as the case may require, what proportion of the proceeds of any sale shall be paid to the several parties in interest." In the case of Bradley v. Simpson, 93 Ill. 93, construing the mechanic's lien law, the court declared that, "where land is sold under a decree for a mechanic's lien upon which there is a prior incumbrance, and the proceeds of the sale are not sufficient to pay both the claims as found by the decree, they will be apportioned, and the mortgagee will take such a share of the net proceeds of the sale as the value of the property before the improvements were put upon it bears to the total value of the property after the improvements were made, and no more;" "the parties have the same proportionate interest in the proceeds that they had in the property before it was sold." In the case of Croskey v. Manufacturing Co., 48 Ill. 483, the court uses this language: "If, for example, the owner of unincumbered realty, with a building upon it, executes a mortgage thereon, and afterwards has repairs made upon the building, for which a mechanic's lien is enforced, such lien would take priority over the mortgage only to the extent of the additional value given to the property by the improvements. Thus, if a house and lot worth fifteen thousand dollars, and, subject to a mortgage, additions or improvements are made by the mortgagor in such mode as to make the premises worth eighteen thousand dollars, the mechanics and material-men * * * would have a prior lien to the extent of three-eighteenths of the proceeds of the sale, and the increased market value added to the property would measure the extent of the priority of their lien, without reference to the cost of the materials or labor actually furnished." We think these are adjudged cases, direct in point and by respectable authorities, and are conclusive, as far as that court can be regarded as authority, that our construction of the statute does not impart to the lien given for the materials or repairs a force or right which affects vested rights, or in any manner conflict with Magna Charta. The fact that the Illinois statute made special provision that the relative rights of the parties might be ascertained "by a jury or otherwise, as the case may require," in no way affects the question of the extent and priority of the respective liens, as given by the statute; nor does the declaration in the statute that, upon "questions arising between previous incumbrances and creditors, the previous incumbrance shall be preferred to the extent of the value of the land at the time of making the contract." This is the legal effect of sections 3018 and 3019 of the Code, when construed together, and each part of the act is given some effect, and our courts of equity are fully competent to afford the same relief.

The construction contended for by the chief justice would render entirely nugatory the lien given for the betterment to a building, or repairs thereto, upon which there was a prior incumbrance. We all agree the statute is not unconstitutional. It must have some operation. It cannot be controverted that the powers of a chancery court, as exercised in this state, are sufficient to ascertain the proportionate rights of the parties, and by appropriate decrees, either by a sale or by renting, or permitting the one or the other to redeem, according to the circumstances of the case, protect the respective interests of all parties. Each of the cases cited by the chief justice, including the case of Getchell v. Allen, 34 Iowa, 559, so largely quoted from, were cases where the whole property upon which there was a prior lien at the time of the commencement of the work or when the materials were furnished, was subjected by the decree of the lower court to the payment of the mechanic's lien. We hold the same conclusion, and have cited those cases to that point, as showing the court erred in giving complainant a prior lien upon the whole building. Furthermore, in the Iowa cases, we are not informed whether the court in which those cases originated had equitable jurisdiction and power to apportion the priorities of the respective liens, as has the chancery court. If, in the case before us, it was pending in the circuit court, and no remedy afforded except the statutory remedy, we would hold the circuit court had no authority to have the property sold, and apply the entire proceeds to the mechanic's lien. It would present a case in which the remedy could not be found in a court of law. But, even if those authorities held to a different rule, we feel constrained to construe our statute as we have, and to hold that, where our statute says "such lien shall have priority," it means "priority" in its usual sense, and not "junior liens" or "subsequent incumbrance," as assumed in the dissenting opinion, and upon which assumption his argument entirely rests. We think it is the duty of the court to protect and enforce their respective priorities as fixed by the statute, in all cases where the power of the court is competent for this purpose.

The chief justice asks in his opinion why it was the legislature conferred jurisdiction upon courts of equity when the amount claimed is not less than $100. We have made no investigation of the reasons which influenced the legislature. We take the law as it is, and we find that section 3048 provides that "any lien provided for under the provisions of this chapter, where the amount claimed is not less than one hundred dollars, may also be enforced by bill in equity." The act confers the jurisdiction generally upon a court of equity, and, having jurisdiction, it may enforce the lien according to its own powers. In the present suit the sum involved exceeds $100, and the only question is whether the chancery court is competent to adjust the equities of the different liens. When the present act was originally adopted the legislature may have thought that, under the authority of Montandon v. Deas, 14 Ala. 33, the chancery court had jurisdiction without having it specially conferred by statute. It may have been supposed that, under the authority of the case of Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448, a decision rendered by the present chief justice, where it is held that chancery court had jurisdiction to enforce the landlord's lien, independent of the statutory remedy furnished by a court of law. Be this as it may, this court decided in Walker v. Dalmwood, 80 Ala. 246, and Chandler v. Hanna, 73 Ala. 392, that the chancery court did not have jurisdiction to enforce the mechanic's lien, "in the absence of some special ground of equitable interposition, such as would render inadequate the remedy prescribed in a court of law;" and after these decisions were rendered the legislature saw proper to confer jurisdiction generally upon a court of equity to enforce the lien, "without alleging or proving any special gound of equitable jurisdiction." It is impliedly conceded in both the authorities (80 Ala. and 73 Ala., supra) that cases might arise in which the remedy prescribed in a court of law would be inadequate, and it would be necessary to resort to a court of equity. When these decisions were rendered, it would seem the court had in view that the necessity to adjust different equities and conflicting liens might arise under the statute. The chief justice states as follows: "Under the opinion of the majority of the court, the right and remedy for repairs put on a building which was on the premises at the date of the mortgage would be much more compensating—much more nearly adequate—than if the claim were for an improvement entirely new. Can the legislature have intended this advantage to him who only repairs an old building, over the material-man and mechanic who furnishes materials and constructs a new one? Did the legislature intend to give to the builder this inadequate compensation for an improvement entirely new, and leave it to the courts to secure to the repairer, by interpretation, a full quantum valebat for what he may have added?" We would reply by asking, did the legislature intend to compensate, in whole or in part, one who constructs a new building, by permitting him to remove it from the premises, and did the legislature intend to deny all compensation to one who makes the repairs thereto? If so, in what part of the statute is this intent to be found which makes this difference? Why were liens for repairs put upon the same plane as liens for building a structure, if it was expected that the courts would give the two liens, by judicial interpretation, a different plane, making the one a prior lien and the other secondary and subordinate,—a mere "well without water?" The opinion further proceeds: "Can it be that the legislature intended to grant the special relief my brothers have awarded to complainant in this case when the value of the repairs amounts to one hundred dollars or upwards, and to withhold it when it falls below that sum? Would there be any justice in such discrimination?" If the act is plain, it is not for this court to impugn the intent of the legislature. But we call attention to the statement of the chief justice when he summarizes his conclusion under the third proposition. It is as follows: "The only remedy or resource left to the material-man and mechanic was the right to redeem from Wimberly by paying off the older incumbrance, and then enforcing the collective liens for their benefit; or they could enforce their claim against Mulford's equity of redemption, or await Wimberly's foreclosure, and claim payment out of the surplus, should anything be left." We ask, in what court can "the collective liens for their benefit" be enforced? or in what court can they "enforce their claim against Mulford's equity of redemption?" The statute itself furnishes no such remedy. A chancery court alone has jurisdiction of these questions, and we reply, in the language of the chief justice: "Can it be that the legislature intended to grant the special relief the chief justice contends for where the collective liens amount to one hundred dollars or upwards, and without it when it falls below that sum? Would there be any justice in such discrimination?" The summary of the chief justice necessarily concedes that the rights granted to the mechanic and material-man are, as we hold, independent of the statutory remedy, "specially provided for its enforcement in the statute," as stated in another part of his opinion; and without regard to the limitation of $100, as prescribed in section 3048 of the Code, may enforce in a court of chancery, under section 720 of the Code, which gives jurisdiction to the chancery court "in all civil cases in which a plain and adequate remedy is not provided in other judicial tribunals."

The second proposition of the chief justice in his summary is "that the material-man's and mechanic's lien is inferior to Wimberly's lien, [the mortgage,] and bound only Mulford's equity of redemption." As to the property covered by the mortgage when the materials were added or a building wholly erected, this is true; but this is not true, and is directly in the face of the statute, as to a new building, or materials furnished or repairs made. As to these, the statute directly declares this lien "shall have priority over all other liens, mortgages, whether existing at the time the materials are furnished or subsequently created." To hold that the words "such lien," as used in section 3019, refers only to the lien given upon a building wholly erected, would impute to the legislature a want of knowledge of the ordinary meaning of words, and resolve the section into an absurdity; for, unless the words "such lien" includes the lien for material and repairs, then there is no provision in the statute for enforcing the lien for material and repairs, even in cases where the mortgage was subsequently created. No one contends that this would be a proper construction of the statute. We have given the statute a great deal of study. It should be so construed as to give some effect to every clause, and a construction which leaves to a sentence or clause no field of operation should be avoided as far as possible. Lehman v. Robinson, 59 Ala. 219; Ex parte Dunlap, 71 Ala. 73. Our conclusion is the only solution of the difficult question involved, as we understand the purpose of the statute. It does no injustice to either party; it rests upon equitable principles, and does not violate Magna Charta.

STONE, C. J., (dissenting.) Our statute (section 3018, Code 1886) provides that mechanics and material-men, "who shall do or perform any work or labor upon, or furnish any material, fixtures, * * * for any building or improvement on land, or for repairing the same, under or by virtue of any contract with the owner or proprietor thereof, * * * shall have a lien therefor on such building or improvement, and on the land on which the same is situated, to the extent in ownership of all the right, title, and interest owned therein by such owner or proprietor." Section 3019: "Such lien, as to the land, shall have priority over all other liens, mortgages, or incumbrances created subsequently to the commencement of the work on the building or improvement, or repairs thereto; and, as to the building or improvement, it shall have priority over all other liens, mortgages, or incumbrances, whether existing at the time of the commencement of such work or subsequently created; and the person entitled to such lien may, when there is a prior lien, mortgage, or incumbrance on the land, have it enforced by a sale of the building or improvement, under the provisions of this chapter, and the purchaser may, within a reasonable time thereafter, remove the same." Section 3021: "When a lien attaches under the preceding section, [section 3020, which relates to buildings or improvements on land held under lease,] the lessor, at any time before a sale of the property, shall have the right to discharge the same by paying to the holder the amount secured thereby." The purpose of this section is to enable the lessor to prevent the removal of the building or improvement from the land, by paying off the lien upon it. The foregoing are all the statutory provisions which are material to a correct decision of this case. The facts of this case are all clearly shown in the pleadings and in the agreed statement of facts. There is no dispute of fact about anything this court need decide. R. M. Mulford occupied as a residence a lot adjoining the city of Birmingham, on which were a dwelling-house and other improvements necessary for its occupancy as a dwelling. Mulford had executed a mortgage on the lot, "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereto belonging," to T. P. Wimberly, to secure the payment of a note of $4,000, payable at a bank. The mortgage was executed in October, 1889, and was properly recorded in the probate office of Jefferson county, the county in which the lot is situated. At the time the mortgage was executed Mulford was the owner of the property in fee, and resided on it. The dwelling was almost destroyed by fire in 1890, but the kitchen part of the dwelling was only partially consumed, and outhouses in the yard were left unharmed. At and before that time the property was under insurance for the benefit of Wimberly, the mortgagee; and when the amount of the loss was adjusted in August, 1890, the sum of $2,664 was ascertained to be the amount of the loss suffered by the fire, and this was paid by the insurance company. It was then agreed between Wimberly and Mulford that the said insurance money should be expended in restoring the dwelling-house to a habitable condition, the house, when restored, to still continue under the mortgage; and, if any sum beyond the $2,664 was expended on the building, Mulford was to supply it, and was to continue in the occupancy of the house subject to the mortgage. Under this agreement the house was rebuilt on the site of the one burned, and the $2,664 were exhausted in the erection. The house not being completed, or not being finished up to the satisfaction of Mulford, he incurred additional expense in material and workmanship which went into the body of the house. The debt thus incurred is some $600. This additional expense was incurred on credit, without the knowledge or consent of Wimberly, and the act has never been ratified by him. It is not shown that he even knew that the expense being incurred was in excess of the $2,664. The verified statement of materials and workmanship required under sections 3022–3024, Code, were made out against R. M. Mulford, without any notice whatever of Wimberly's claim or mortgage. The mechanics who did the work, having acquired the ownership of the material-men's claim, filed the present bill to enforce both claims by a sale of the property on which the house was erected,—properly, in the present case, on which the house was repaired or completed. The bill was filed January 29, 1891, and sets forth that Mulford was a citizen of Jefferson county, —the county in which the property is situated,—and that Wimberly resided in Lee county, a hundred miles or more away. While the suit was pending, and after Wimberly had answered the bill, to-wit, on March 28, 1891, he sold the property under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, having previously given the requisite notice, and one Hyde was set down as the purchaser at $4,910.41, the amount of the mortgage debt, and the expense of the foreclosure. A deed was made to Hyde, and on the same day the property was reconveyed by Hyde to Wimberly. No money was paid, and it was practically a purchase by Wimberly at his own sale. The mortgage gives to the mortgagee no right to purchase at his own sale.

There are two reasons why the sale under the power can exert no influence in this case: First, when the bill was filed (January 29, 1891) no attempt to foreclose the mortgage by sale under the power had been made. If the bill, when filed, contained no equity, the subsequent act of Wimberly cannot give it equity. To authorize a suit in chancery for relief, the facts on which complainant relies for recovery must be existent. It is not enough that they come into existence afterwards. Planters' & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Selma Sav. Bank, 63 Ala. 585; Rapier v. Paper Co., 64 Ala. 330; Banks v. Thompson, 75 Ala. 531; Malone v. Marriott, 64 Ala. 486; Peevey v. Cabaniss, 70 Ala. 253; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 679. Second. Wimberly, for all equitable purposes, being the purchaser at his own sale, the sale and conveyances made did not in the slightest degree impair or change the equitable rights, or the manner of their assertion, that any third person may have had. Subsequent incumbrancers had precisely the same equitable rights after the said sale as they could have asserted before. The statutes under consideration do not attempt to secure to mechanics or material-men a lien paramount to older valid liens. If it did so attempt, we would be forced to deny such relief, for the attempt would be to deprive the owner of his property without "due process of law." The lien the statute confers is only "to the extent in ownership of all the right, title, and interest owned therein by such owner or proprietor;" that is, the one who procures the materials to be furnished, or the mechanic's labor to be performed, thereby gives a lien co-extensive with his ownership, and no more. If he have only a leasehold estate, a part interest less than the whole, an equity of redemption, or an equitable right to demand, or receive title on payment of the purchase money, the mechanic or material-man acquires a lien on that title or right, and nothing more. He does not and cannot acquire a larger right or interest than his employer owned. It is axiomatic that no one can convey or incumber property beyond the extent of his ownership. I understand Justice COLEMAN in his opinion to concede what is stated above.

If the employer (owner or proprietor, as he is designated in the statute) own the unincumbered fee, then no difficulty will be encountered in enforcing the lien. The statute gives a lien, not only on the building or improvement erected, or added to or repaired, but also on the lot on which it stands. The entire property, lot and all, if necessary, can be sold in discharge of the lien, even though that lien be only for repairs put on the building. Such is the statute. If, however, the owner or proprietor, procuring the work to be done or materials furnished, have not an unincumbered title to the lot, then the statute provides a different rule. If the workmanship and materials are employed in the erection of a new building or improvement, which can be removed and leave the property as it was before the building or improvement was commenced, then there is a first and paramount lien on the building or improvement, which can be enforced by a sale of such building or improvement, "and the purchaser may, within a reasonable time thereafter, remove the same." And, in such case, the mechanic and material-man each has an additional lien on whatever title to or interest in the lot the owner or proprietor owned at the time the lien commenced to attach. In the two categories stated above, the rights and remedies of the several parties are clearly defined in the statute, and are easy of enforcement. Cases arise in which the claim of the mechanic or material-man is for labor done or materials furnished for the completion of an unfinished building or improvement, or for repairs on such building or improvement, at a time when the fee-simple title is not in the person who procures the materials to be furnished or the services to be rendered, and yet both the material and services become so incorporated in the building as not to be separable from it, so as to leave it in the condition it was in before the repairs were made. That is this case. It is manifest that neither a sale of the entire property, nor of the building on which the repairs were put, nor a removal of the building, can be resorted to in such case. Either course would deprive the older lienee, the mortgagee, of his property, without due process of law. It results that for the case we have in hand the statute points out no specific mode of enforcing the lien. It must therefore be determined on equitable principles. The claim of a mechanic or material-man is, at least, but a lien,—a right to have the claim enforced as a charge. The statute makes it subordinate to all older valid liens; and, if it did not, the constitutional barrier would have made it so. Magna Charta made it so. Except to the extent the statute provides specially for its enforcement, it stands on no higher plane than other valid liens; and we have seen there is no statutory provision which points out the remedy in a case like this. We have simply the case of a junior lienee attempting to collect his claim out of property that is subject to an older valid lien. In the opinion of my Brother COLEMAN, it is admitted that Wimberly's claim is the older, and its bona fides is not questioned. Suppose the complainants in this case filled the position of a junior mortgagee, and, to make the analogy striking, suppose the consideration of such junior mortgage had been for money which was expended in repairs on the house covered by the senior mortgage. Or suppose the case of a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, no title being made, and a mechanic asserting a lien against the vendee in possession for repairs put upon and incorporated in a dwelling that was on the premises before the agreement of sale. Can ingenuity draw a distinction in principle between either of the cases supposed and the case we have in hand? And would any one contend, in either of the cases supposed, that any other principle was involved than that which always obtains when there is a junior and a senior mortgagee?

I hold the following propositions are so clearly established that not a respectable authority can be found in opposition to either of them: First. The mortgage to Wimberly being duly spread on the records of the county in which the lot was situated, and that mortgage being the older lien, this, in law, was and is the equivalent of actual notice to the mechanic and material-man of the existence of that older lien. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 679, §§ 8, 9. Second. The complainants in this case, being only subsequent incumbrancers, had no right, either at law or in equity, to compel that older mortgagee to enforce his lien, either by foreclosure or otherwise, in order that their junior interests might be carved out of it. Their only right, like that of any other junior incumbrancer, was to redeem the property from the older lienee, and thereby secure their subrogation to his rights. Kelly v. Longshore, 78 Ala. 203, and authorities cited. Third. There is not an adjudged case, not even excluding those cited by my Brother COLEMAN, which holds that a junior incumbrancer, although his labor or money may have enhanced the value of the security, can coerce the enforcement of the lien, as a means of carving his alleged interest or lien out of it, unless there is a statute conferring the right. Our statute giving to mechanics and material-men a lien was approved March 6, 1876. Before that time we had no statute on the subject that was like the present one. Code 1867, §§ 3101–3104. Its provisions, so far as the principles necessary to be decided in this case are concerned, are identical with those of Code Iowa, §§ 2130, 2139, 2140, 2141. The Iowa Code was adopted in 1873, three years before our statute was enacted. The complete identity of language found in each of the systems, on the points material to this case, demonstrates that our statute, being the latter, must have been copied from the Iowa statute. Such identity of expression could not be accidental. The substantial re-enactment of a statute which has been construed, and has acquired a fixed judicial construction, is a legislative adoption of the construction. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 749, § 16. Seven of our decisions are cited in favor of this principle. Getchell v. Allen, 34 Iowa, 559, was decided in 1872, four years before our statute was enacted. The Iowa statute was of force before that time. Code Iowa, 1851, § 981 et seq. The Iowa case was not distinguishable in purpose or principle from the one we have in hand. The court said: "In the case of a mortgage upon land and the buildings thereon, made before the mechanic's lien attaches, the mortgagee will hold the property as against the mechanic. How is it when improvements in the way of additions or repairs to the building are made after such mortgage? The mortgage binds the house; the improvements of the character indicated become a part of the house, and are, as it were, incorporated with it. After the improvements are made, they do not remain separate and distinct from the building. They have lost their distinctive character; the house includes them; they are a part of the house; the mechanic's lien cannot defeat the mortgagee's right; and, for the same reason, section 1855 does not apply to such a case. That section simply provides that a mechanic's lien for work or materials furnished to erect buildings, after the execution of a mortgage on the land, is a paramount lien against the buildings, but is not a lien on the land. But, if the mortgage covers the building, the mechanic cannot enforce his lien against it, and cause it to be sold and separated from the land. These views, we think, are based upon sound principles, and lead to equitable results. Should a contrary doctrine prevail, it would be within the power of a mortgagor to ruin the security of his creditor, by making improvements upon the building covered by his mortgage, which, in fact and in law, would but become a part of the building itself. The case before us serves to illustrate the injustice of such a rule. Another story is added to a house already bound by the mortgage. The story cannot be separated from the house; it is a part of it. It would be a great hardship to the mortgagee to permit his security to be defeated or impaired by the act of the mortgagor in thus adding to his building. The mechanic or material-man cannot complain. He had notice of the mortgage, and knew, or was bound to know, the purposes for which the materials were furnished or work was done by him."

The language copied is taken entirely from Chief Justice BECK'S opinion, on a statute from which ours was in substance copied, and in a case from which ours is not distinguishable in principle. Is there any hitch or faulty link in the reasoning of Chief Justice BECK? Can it be answered? As I undertand the opinion of my Brother COLEMAN, he concedes that Wimberly's mortgage has an older and paramount lien; and he does not contend that the mechanic or material-man can claim a lien for the value or agreed price of the materials and work put into the house. Their lien extends, according to his views, only to the enhancement of price caused thereby, which the house and other property covered by the mortgage will bring when put to sale. Now, how is this to be ascertained? The house must needs be sold as an entirety, and hence the sale will furnish no data for determining the enhancement of price. Is it to be ascertained by a reference, and on opinion evidence? Is it just to a paramount lienee, nay, is it lawful, to carve out of his security a junior incumbrance, placed there without his knowledge, and without his consent, and to fix its value or amount on testimony such as this? The statute gives a lien—a junior lien—for the value of the materials and mechanical labor, and it gives it for the whole value. It gives it in no other form. In a case like this, that lien is on the equity of redemption,—Mulford's ownership of the property. On what principle can that lien be transformed into a lien on the whole property for the enhanced value imparted to it by the material and workmanship furnished, and that lien made enforceable pari passu with the older mortgage lien? The statute confers no such lien, and provides no machinery for carving it out. No adjudged case can be found which justifies such proceeding under a statute like ours. The Illinois cases cited by my Brother COLEMAN are rested on the express language of their statute, which directs in what manner the lien for repairs must be enforced. That court simply followed the statute of that state. We have no such statute, and yet the majority opinion of my brothers supplies the omitted clause, and construes our statute as if it were a copy of the Illinois statute.

An additional argument: When an entirely new building or improvement is erected at the instance of the mortgagor, on land previously mortgaged by him, the statute declares a lien in favor of the mechanic and material-man, and the extent of it. It is on the building or improvement so erected which may be sold and removed from the premises. This is the remedy given by statute, and it gives no other, except a lien on the mortgagor's equity of redemption. It is manifest that the lien on the building, with the right to sell and remove it, would in most cases be very inadequate security. All men know that the sale of a building,—even of a frame building,—if the purchaser be required to remove it from the premises, would yield only a fraction of the value of the materials and workmanship employed in its construction; and, if the building were of brick, this disparity would be much greater. Yet it is manifest that in case of an entirely new building, on land previously mortgaged, sale and removal would be the only means of enforcing the lien of the mechanic and material-man. This, because this statute which secures the lien gives this remedy for its enforcement. Now, under the opinion of the majority of the court, the right and remedy for repairs put on a building which was on the premises at the date of the mortgage would be much more compensating—much more nearly adequate—than if the claim were for an improvement entirely new. Can the legislature have intended this advantage to him who only repairs an old building over the material-man and mechanic who furnish materials and construct a new one? Did the legislature intend to give to the builder this inadequate compensation for an improvement entirely new, and leave it to the courts to secure to the repairer, by interpretation, a full quantum valebat for what he may have added? The present proceeding is in equity. The very nature of the relief granted in the majority opinion in this case forbids that it shall or can be awarded in any court other than one having chancery jurisdiction. Liens secured to mechanics and material-men, under our statutes, are enforceable in equity only "when the amount claimed is not less than one hundred dollars," unless a special ground of equity jurisdiction is alleged and proved. Code 1886, § 3048. I have shown that the complainant is without semblance of equitable right to compel Wimberly to foreclose his mortgage, and have thus shown that the present bill is without "special ground of equitable jurisdiction." Can it be that the legislature intended to grant the special relief my brothers have awarded to complainant in this case, when the value of the repairs amounts to $100 or upwards, and to withhold it when it falls below that sum? Would there be any justice in such discrimination? We presume the legislature intended to deal equally and fairly, and hence should not, by interpretation, stretch this purely statutory, yet beneficial, system to consequences the legislature did not express and could not have intended.

I summarize my own conclusions: First. At the time when the materials and workmanship were furnished in this case, Wimberly's mortgage was on record. This, in law, was the same as if the material-man and mechanic had had actual notice of the mortgage, and that Mulford's ownership was only an equity of redemption. Second. The material-man and mechanic each acquired a lien, but it was inferior to Wimberly's lien, and bound only Mulford's equity of redemption. Third. The only remedy or recourse left to the material-man and mechanic was the right to redeem from Wimberly by paying off the older incumbrance, and then enforcing the collective liens for their benefit; or they could have enforced their claim against Mulford's equity of redemption; or they could await Wimberly's foreclosure, and claim payment out of the surplus, should anything be left. It is my conclusion that the decree in this case should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

CLOPTON, J., concurs in this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. ORR.

NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a railroad company for damages resulting in the death of a brakeman in defendant's employ, the complaint, averring the nature of the defect in the appliances by which the injuries were caused, and that the injury was caused by the negligence of a person in defendant's employ, intrusted with the duty of superintendence, and that plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant, and was in discharge of his duty at the time he was killed, sufficiently states a cause of action, and it need not aver the nature of the superintendency intrusted to the person by whose negligence the injuries were caused, or of the employment of the person to whose orders deceased was bound to conform, or of the orders from conforming to which his injuries resulted.

2. Oral testimony will not be admitted in regard to a rule of the railroad company, printed in a book, when the book is not produced, or its absence accounted for.

3. A general charge which, considered as a whole, and construed in connection with the evidence, states the law correctly, will not work a reversal because some of its provisions are too abstract, when it does not affirmatively appear that the jury was misled.

4. Where the record does not show that the charges refused by the court below were offered in writing, as required by Code Ala. § 2756, the supreme court will not presume that they were.

Appeal from city court of Decatur, WILLIAM H. SIMPSON, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Horace Orr, administrator, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for damages for the killing of plaintiff's intestate. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. For former hearing, see 8 South. Rep. 360.

This action was brought by Horace Orr, as the administrator of Henry Griffin, deceased, and sought to recover damages for injuries resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. There were several grounds of demurrer interposed to the complaint, one of which was sustained by the court, and the others overruled. These grounds are sufficiently stated in the opinion, as are also the averments of the complaint. The circumstances of the accident were that the plaintiff's intestate, while in the employment of the defendant as a brakeman, and discharging his duty as such, was going from one portion of a moving train to another, and in jumping from a gate of a car, called a "gondola," to another car loaded with rock, the gate from which he jumped fell back, and he fell in between the cars, and was run over and killed. It was the custom of the defendant to have the gates of these cars fastened by hooks, but in this instance the gate was not so fastened, and from the place from which the plaintiff jumped he could not see or discover that such gate was not thus properly fastened. All the material facts, as disclosed by the bill of exceptions on this appeal, are substantially the same as when the case was here at a former term, and special reference is here made to the report of the case as found in 91 Ala. 548, and 8 South. Rep. 360. As bearing on the question of negligence, the plaintiff offered in evidence certain printed rules and regulations of the defendant corporation. The defendant objected to the introduction of these rules in evidence, and duly excepted to the court's overruling his objection. These rules are the same as those offered on the former appeal, as shown in the statement of facts in the report of said case. The defendant reserved many exceptions to segregated portions of the court's general charge, which was given in writing; but it is not deemed necessary, in view of the opinion of this court on the present appeal, to state these portions of the general charge excepted to. At the request of the plaintiff in writing, the court gave the following charge: "If the jury believe from the evidence that Henry Griffin was in the discharge of his duty as brakeman when he fell between the cars and was killed, and that the cause of his fall was a defect in the fastenings of the gate of the car, which had not been discovered and remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in defendant's employ, and intrusted by it with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant of defendant were in proper condition, and if they further believe from the evidence that said Henry Griffin did not know of such defect, if any, and that he exercised due care in passing from car to car, and his said fall was not the result of his own negligence or carelessness, and that his own negligence did not contribute to his injury, then the verdict of the jury must be for the plaintiff." The defendant excepted to the giving of this charge, and also separately and severally excepted to the refusal of the court to give many charges asked by it, but it is not stated that the charges asked by the defendant were in writing. The plaintiff had verdict and judgment for $1,583. The defendant prosecutes this appeal, and assigns as error the various rulings of the court upon the pleadings, evidences, and charges.

Brickell, Harris & Eyster, for appellant. Wert, Speake & Callahan and E. W. Godbey, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The grounds of demurrer, the overruling of which constitutes the first five assignments of error, are (1) that the complaint does not state with certainty the act or omission of defendant, or of its servants or employes, which caused the injury to plaintiff's intestate; (2) that it does not show the nature of the superintendency intrusted to a person other than the conductor; nor (3) the nature of the service or employment of the person to whose orders deceased conformed; (4) that it does not show what the orders were; and (5) that it shows the injury was caused by the negligence of deceased. The complaint avers that the defect in the works and machinery by reason of which the injury was caused consisted in the failure to provide fastenings to the gate or drop-door of a car, over which deceased passed in the discharge of his duty as brakeman. It further avers that Price, the conductor, or some person (afterwards averred to be Sullivan) in the employment of defendant, intrusted with the duty of seeing that the works and machinery were in proper condition, was required by the rules and regulations of defendant to see that all gates or drop-doors of the cars were kept fastened and provided with proper fastenings in such way that it would be safe for a brakeman to pass over a train of cars from brake to brake. It also avers that plaintiff's intestate, who was employed by defendant in the capacity of brakeman, and subject to the orders of the conductor, while in the discharge of his duties as brakeman, and passing from car to car in obedience to special instructions given by the conductor, or such other person to whom superintendency had been intrusted, stepped on the gate or door at the end of a flat-car, which gave way, whereby plaintiff's intestate was thrown under and between the cars and killed. Under the rule laid down in Railroad Co. v. George, 10 South. Rep. 145, (present term,) which followed our former rulings, it is not necessary to aver the nature of the superintendency intrusted to the person by whose negligence the injury was caused, nor of the service or employment of the person to whose orders the deceased was bound to conform, nor of the orders or directions from conforming to which his injuries resulted. The complaint avers the other facts essential as a basis of liability under section 2590 of the Code, under which it is framed. It is true, it proceeds to set forth in the alternative two or more of the causes or acts of negligence, thereby imparting uncertainty whether it was intended to aver that the injury was caused by reason of the defects in the works and machinery, or by the negligence of a person intrusted with superintendence, or of a person to whose orders deceased was bound to conform. This was bad pleading, but this ground of demurrer was sustained; in all other respects the complaint is sufficient.

When this case was before us on a former appeal, (91 Ala. 548, 8 South. Rep. 360,) rules 149, 150, and 155 were held relevant and admissible in evidence. Nothing appears from the present record justifying a departure from the ruling then made. The testimony of the witness Price as to the rule requiring brakemen to see that everything connected with the cars is in a safe and proper condition was properly excluded, it having been shown on cross-examination that the rule was printed in a book, which was not produced, nor its absence accounted for. Railway Co. v. Propst, 90 Ala. 1, 7 South. Rep. 635. The general charge must be considered as a whole, not in disconnected parts. Though the segregated parts may state the legal propositions too broadly or may not express all the essential elements of a recovery, yet if the general charge, when considered as an entirety, and construed in connection with the evidence, asserts the law correctly, a disconnected paragraph, though too broad or too narrow, will not work a reversal. Williams v. State, 83 Ala. 68, 3 South. Rep. 743; Gibson v. State, 89 Ala. 121, 8 South. Rep. 98. The general charge was written at length. It seems to have been prepared with care, and was intended to present, and does present, the case in all its phases in which it should be considered by the jury. Considered as a whole, it declares correctly the law on each phase of the facts which the evidence tends to establish; the duty of defendant to provide safe and suitable appliances for its employes; the principles on which the liability of the employer depends when the injury is caused by any defect in the works, ways, machinery, or plant, and as to the contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate, whether it arose from the duty of examining and seeing that the gate or door of the car was in proper condition, or from the want of ordinary care and caution. Counsel, however, do not contend that the disconnected parts of the general charge excepted to state the law incorrectly, but that some of them are abstract. A charge cannot be considered abstract when there is any evidence tending to support its hypothesis, and if abstract, the giving of such charge is not a reversible error if it asserts a correct legal proposition, and it does not affirmatively appear that the jury were misled. As to whether the duty was devolved on the brakeman of seeing that the car was in proper condition, or whether he selected a dangerous when a safe way was apparent to him, or whether he was acting in the discharge of his duty, and exercised due care in passing over the car to his post of duty, the evidence is not undisputed, and inferences are to be drawn therefrom. There is evidence tending to show that the switch upon the main track was the deceased's post of duty in order to uncouple the rear car so that it could remain on the main track and the empty cars push back on the spur track, and that he was going to this post of duty when he was killed. The only error we discover in the general charge is in that part which instructs the jury that a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to authorize a verdict. This, however, was not excepted to, and is not assigned as error. The statute[1] requires that all charges moved for by either party must be in writing. If asked verbally, they may be properly refused. The record does not show that the charges requested by defendant were in writing, and the court will not presume them to be in writing. Myatts v. Bell, 41 Ala. 222. For this reason we cannot consider the charges asked by defendant. Affirmed.

ASSOCIATION—EXPULSION OF MEMBER—CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS.

1. When persons enter into a voluntary agreement and incorporate themselves into an association for the purpose of carrying out the objects and purposes of the association, and one of the members violates the rules of the association, and is fined, and dismissed for non-payment of the fine, he cannot complain if the objects for which the association was created are not contrary to public policy, or some statute regulation, and the fine and dismissal were in pursuance of the rules and regulations of the association.

2. When two labor organizations, in the same line of business, meet in conference, and adopt rules for the government of their members, and these rules are afterwards adopted by each association, and are not in conflict with the constitution and by-laws of the association adopting them, they will be considered as additions to its constitution and by-laws.

mandamus, brought on the relation of Thomas Curtis against the Stevedores' & Longshoremen's Benevolent Association, on the allegations, in substance, that relator is a resident of the city of New Orleans; that he was a member of the Stevedores' & Longshoremen's Benevolent Association of New Orleans from the time of its organizaton until April 14, 1890; that said association is a body corporate under the laws of the state of Louisiana; that said corporation has adopted a constitution and code of by-laws under its charter for the government and control and notice of its members, a copy of which is annexed to and filed with the petition; that the franchise as a member is valuable, as shown in said copy, a member being entitled to money relief when sick, to be buried at death, and other benefits set forth therein; that by article 18 of the said constitution, and section 3, art. 6, of by-laws, no member can be expelled for any offense without having an opportunity of defending himself, which opportunity shall be written or printed notice from the recording secretary that he must appear at a stated meeting to answer the charge or charges brought against him, and he shall also be furnished a copy of the charges preferred; that, notwithstanding these provisions, and notwithstanding the fact that relator was not indebted to said association in any amount, and although no charge or charges of any kind had ever been made against him of any violation of the law, rule, or regulation of said corporation, and no notice of any kind ever served on him, said association illegally and without any warrant, either in law, or in their laws, adopted for the notice of their members, expelled relator from his membership in said corporation; that by said illegal and unwarranted expulsion and deprivation of his rights of membership relator has already been damaged in a sum more than $100, and that he will be damaged each and every day, to the extent of $6 per day,—his wages; that he is excluded from his franchise because he can no longer obtain employment at his occupation as longshoreman, nor can he follow said occupation until he is restored to membership; that he is not only damaged, as aforesaid, by his expulsion, but his membership is worth at least $1,000; that, though relator has been a member of said corporation from its organization up to the time of his expulsion, no charge of any violation of its laws has ever been made against him, nor has he ever been tried or found guilty of any violation of its laws; that the action of said corporation at its meeting held April 14, 1890, expelling said relator, is absolutely null and void, and can produce no force and effect; that relator sought redress at the hands of said corporation, which refused him any relief, and his only adequate remedy is a mandamus. Alternative writs issued, and the corporation responded in substance: First, a general denial of all the allegations in the petition. It then charges that relator was dropped from his membership for a failure to pay a fine inflicted for a violation of the general rules of the association, and more especially of the conference rules of the labor associations, which form part of the laws and regulations of respondent association; that relator was properly tried, and legally convicted and fined, and acquiesced therein, and failed to pay, and was legally dropped; that when the conference rules were made relator was a party to them, has acted thereunder, and is estopped to deny their validity; and that said conference rules are now legally part and parcel of the laws, rules, and regulations of the respondent association. The matter was heard, and the lower court refused the mandamus, and plaintiff and relator appealed.

The defendant association is incorporated under the laws of the state. The constitution and by-laws of the defendant corporation are made a part of the record. There is no rule or regulation in the constitution and by-laws which prohibits the corporation from entering into an agreement for the purpose of carrying out the object for which the corporation was created. Therefore any such agreement, made with the consent of its members, duly ascertained, will be legal and binding upon said members. There is another labor organization in the city of New Orleans, called the "Longshoremen's Protective Union." In order to put an end to a "strike," the two associations entered into an agreement to regulate the conduct of their members working on the levee. These regulations are called "Conference Rules," and were established and adopted by all the members of each association. In adopting these rules the two associations met in joint conference, each presided over by its president, and its organization preserved. It is alleged that the relator was not present when these rules were adopted, but he never protested against them, worked under them, and thus approved them, and is therefore bound by them. Rule 11 of these rules is as follows: "Any member who shall leave a ship at which he is working to go to another ship to work, unless said work has been stopped for the space of five hours, shall be fined the sum of ten dollars for each offense." Rule 8 of said rules is as follows: "All violations of these conference rules shall be tried by the conference committee, and all fines inflicted for violations of conference rules shall be collected by the violating member's association, and one-half of his fine shall be paid over to the other association, through the conference committee, fifteen days from the date of conviction." This conference committee is composed of 24 members, 12 from each association. The relator violated rule 11, and was tried and convicted and sentenced to pay the penalty. He received no notice, in accordance with the rules of the association to which he belonged, but he appeared voluntarily, and submitted to the jurisdiction of this quasi tribunal. He therefore waived the notice. Having neglected and refused to pay the penalty, he was dropped from the roll of membership, in accordance with the provisions of section 2, art. 2, of the constitution, which is as follows: "Any member who does not pay up the full amount of his indebtedness to this association on the second Mondays in January, April, July, and October shall be suspended from all pecuniary benefits for three months; and any member who neglects or refuses to pay up his arrears for six months shall be considered as having renounced the association, and his name [shall be] stricken from the roll." The fine thus imposed became due the association of which relator was a member. It then fell under the rules of the association for collection. It is urged by the relator that this regulation agreement between the two associations was in conflict with and contrary to the constitution and by-laws of the defendant association; that the agreement did not become a part of the constitution and by-laws of the Longshoremen's Benevolent Association; and that he cannot be deprived of his right of membership, as said agreement and conference rules are null and void. But as we have said, there is nothing in the constitution and by-laws prohibiting such an agreement. Conceding, therefore, that they were enacted outside of any provision made by the constitution and by-laws of the association, it is evident that the relator consented to them, and they became at least the by-laws of a voluntary association of which he was a member. He was instrumental in creating the quasi tribunal which inflicted the penalty, and voluntarily submitted to its jurisdiction. He has therefore no right to complain, unless it is shown that the agreement thus entered into by him was contrary to public policy, immoral, unjust, and oppressive, or that the penalty was arbitrarily inflicted, contrary to the rules and regulations prescribed by the rules for the infliction. It appears, however, that these "Conference Rules" were adopted separately by each labor organization at a separate meeting. In adopting them each organization expressly repealed all laws and regulations in conflict with them. It was new matter. There was no rule or regulation changed, altered, or amended, and these conference rules were in reality additional by-laws, made for the government of the members of each association. The by-laws enacted by the association were binding on all of its members. They are positive laws for their government so long as they are members. They are, in fact, a contract between all the members, and must be enforced, like other contracts, unless it appears they are in contravention of some law, contrary to public policy, or immoral. The rules under which the relator was tried were observed. He had an opportunity of being heard, and the conference committee, in inflicting the penalty, was not influenced by malice. The judgment was not against natural justice. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 27, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

TAXATION — ASSESSMENT — DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — VALIDITY OF SALE.

1. Property assessed must be described with sufficient certainty to identify it, so that the owner cannot be misled by the description.

2. When there has been no valid assessment of property, a sale under Act 82 of 1884 is a nullity.

ON REHEARING.

The showing made by appellees justifies a reconsideration of our final decree against them, and a remanding of the cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge. Reversed.

W. S. Benedict, for appellants. Moise & Titche, for appellees.

MCENERY, J. The plaintiffs purchased at tax-sale, under the provisions of Act 82 of 1884, certain property situated in the city of New Orleans. They brought suit to be put in possession of said property. A writ of "seizure and possession" issued. The execution of the writ was enjoined by Edward J. Lawless, who alleged that his minor children were owners of the property, having inherited it from their mother.

Several reasons are alleged for the nullity of the same. Some of them do not require consideration as they have already been passed upon by this court adversely to the claim of the plaintiffs in injunction.

But among the grounds for the nullity of the sale it is averred that the property was not assessed in the name of the owner, and the assessment was illegal for want of certainty in the description of the property. The plaintiffs rely upon the cases of Lake and Douglas, reported, respectively, in 40 La. Ann. 142, 3 South. Rep. 479, and 41 La. Ann. 765, 6 South. Rep. 675. In both of these cases certain indispensable prerequisites were enumerated as being essential to the validity of a tax-sale under said Act 82 of 1884. Among these essentials it was declared that the property must have been assessed. In the case of In re Douglas it was said: "The doctrine is that the legislature may make the tax-deed conclusive evidence of compliance with every requirement which the legislature might originally, in the exercise of its discretion, have dispensed with." The assessment is the foundation for the collection of the tax. The legislature cannot dispense with it. The property assessed must be so described as to identify it, and not mislead the owner. The tax for which the property was sold was for the year 1878. It appears that all subsequent taxes have been paid. It is reasonable to suppose that the tutor of the minor children has been misled by the description of the property on the assessment rolls. The property was described as one lot, "No. 26," or 7 and 8 in square 331, measuring 68 feet front on Canal street, by a depth of 114 feet. The plan of the property and the deed of the property to the defendants vary so radically from the description that it cannot be identified, either by numbers or by measurement. There was, in fact, no assessment of the property. This was essential to a valid sale under Act 82 of 1884. In re Douglas; In re Lake. There was no irregularity in the assessment which was cured by said act, because there was no assessment of the property. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and the injunction herein be perpetuated.

BREAUX, J., takes no part.

ON REHEARING.

FENNER, J. On the showing made by plaintiffs and appellees in this application, we conclude that the interests of justice will be subserved by remanding this case for fuller proof as to the facts concerning the assessment and description of the property. It is therefore ordered and decreed that our former decree be amended by rescinding that portion thereof which perpetuated the injunction, and by inserting in lieu thereof our order that the case be remanded to the lower court for further proceedings according to law, costs of this appeal to be paid by appellees, and those of the lower court to abide the final result; and that in other respects our former decree remain undisturbed.

STATE ex rel. COLTHARP v. HOLMES et al. (No. 10,856.)[1]

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. May 19, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION — WHEN GRANTED — TITLE TO OFFICE — RIGHT TO EMOLUMENTS.

1. Unless it is made evident that jurisdiction has been usurped, the court will not exercise its prohibitive authority.

2. The successful claimant has a right to the emoluments and perquisites, where an incumbent illegally held possession by means of judicial proceeding.

3. An allegation predicated upon that right, accepted by the court of appeals as sufficient, in a matter of jurisdiction, will not be declared insufficient, and the proceeding treated as absolute nullity, by issuing a writ of prohibition.

MCENERY, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of the state ex rel. Albert S. Coltharp for a writ of prohibition. Denied.

F. P. Poché, Thos. P. Clinton, and Charles J. Boatner, for relator. W. H. Rogers and J. G. Hawks, for respondents.

BREAUX, J. The state ex rel. H. B. Holmes brought suit in the parish of Madison, before the eighth judicial district court, against A. S. Coltharp, under the intrusion into office act, contesting his right to hold the office of commissioner for that parish on the board of commissioners of the fifth Louisiana levee district. He (Holmes) avers in his petition that he was commissioned on the 10th day of July, 1890; that he duly qualified by taking the oath of office, and fulfilling every requirement of the law, and is now, and has been since said appointment, ready and willing to serve in said office, to which he has a de jure right; that the defendant usurps, intrudes into, and unlawfully holds and exercises the duties thereof. He also avers that the perquisites and emoluments of said office, during the term of said appointment expiring about 1st of May, 1892, are worth annually about $60. The defendant in said suit, the relator in the application for a writ of prohibition, filed a peremptory exception of no cause of action. It was sustained by the district court, and the suit was dismissed. The relator, Holmes, appealed to the court of appeals, second circuit. The defendant, Coltharp, moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appellate court was without jurisdiction, ratione materiæ, for the reason that the amount in dispute was less than $100. The motion was overruled in March last, and the judgment of the district court was reversed, and the case remanded for trial. In May the trial was stayed by a rule to show cause issued in matter of the application under consideration. For the purpose of the trial before the district court, also on appeal, the plaintiff in exception admitted the verity of relator's petition, not one of the allegations of which is traversed. A question of law was presented. The plaintiff in exception now contends that, by referring to section 3 of Act 44 of 1886, it will be found that no fixed salary, either per month or per annum, is attached to the office of commissioner on the board of said levee district, the provision on the subject being as follows: "The commissioners shall receive a salary of four dollars per day each during the period they are in actual attendance upon the board, and ten cents a mile going and coming, to be paid out of the funds of the levee district; * * * and a like salary shall be paid for each day the president and other commissioners shall serve in supervising the location, construction, and repairs of levees as now provided by said board." The presumption sought to be drawn, that, if the commissioner be not called upon to supervise the location, construction, and repairs of any levees during any given year, the emoluments would be considerably less than $60 per annum, cannot prevail against the admission made by the plaintiff in exception. The issue resolves itself into a question of time. If the emoluments and perquisites per annum should date, under the allegation of the petition, from December, 1890, i. e., the day suit was brought, and not from July, 1890, i. e., the date Holmes was commissioned, the court of appeals was without jurisdiction; but, if from the latter date, it properly exercised its jurisdiction. Only when it is made evident that jurisdiction has been illegally assumed this court will interpose its prohibitive authority.

With reference to the question raised about the right to recover any fees or emoluments at all, and the consequent insufficiency of an allegation founded on that right, to establish jurisdiction, we find an answer in two cases in which it has been decided that during the contest the contestant has a right to the fees and emoluments of the office, although no service has been rendered by the contestant, who was not permitted to discharge the functions of the office. Petit v. Rousseau, 15 La. Ann. 239; Sigur v. Crenshaw, 10 La. Ann. 297. We do not find cause to set aside the decree of the court of appeals, or to treat it as a nullity by granting the writ prayed for. Relator's application for writ of prohibition is rejected, and his petition is dismissed.

FENNER, J., (concurring.) The case involves the question of the jurisdiction of the court of appeals over an appeal taken to that court in a case involving the title to the office of member of the board of commissioners for the fifth Louisiana district. In such case the jurisprudence is uniform that the test of appellate jurisdiction is the pecuniary value of the office, which means the amount of salary, fees, or emoluments attaching thereto. State v. Jastremski, 33 La. Ann. 110; State v. Hayles, 32 La. Ann. 1135; Hubert v. Auvray, 6 La. 598; State v. Lagarde, 21 La. Ann. 18; State v. Judge, Id. 108; State v. Markey, Id. 743; State v. Judge, 22 La. Ann. 49. The petition in the suit alleged that Holmes, the plaintiff, "was on the 11th day of July, 1890, duly commissioned by the governor, * * * and has duly qualified under said commission, by taking the oath and fulfilling every requirement of the law, * * * and is now, and ever since said appointment has been, ready and willing to serve in said office;" also "that said Coltharp, without any legal right thereto, unlawfully possesses said office, and refuses to deliver up the same, although amicable demand has been made for the same." The petition contained the further averment "that the perquisites of said office during the term of said appointment, expiring about May 1, 1892, are worth annually about sixty dollars." This allegation is not contradicted in any manner. The case in the district court was met by an exception of no cause of action, which admitted the allegation of the petition. From a judgment sustaining that exception the appeal was taken to the circuit court of appeals; and the question before us is whether that court exceeded the bounds of its jurisdiction in taking cognizance of the appeal. If the perquisites of the office during the term in contest exceed $100, the circuit court had jurisdiction. It is claimed, however, that the petition does not fix the date at which Holmes qualified. The allegation is that he "had duly qualified by taking the oath and fulfilling every requirement of the law." The law required that he should qualify within 30 days after his appointment, under penalty of vacation of his office. Act 19 of 1878; State v. Beard, 34 La. Ann. 276. If he fulfilled this requirement as alleged, he qualified before August 11, 1890, and the interval between this date and the expiry of the term would be more than 20 months, and the perquisites, at $60 per annum, would exceed $100. As a matter of fact, the pleadings and admissions in Goldman v. Gillespie, (8 South. Rep. 880, decided by us at this term,) and to which we are referred by relator, indicate that he had qualified before August 16, 1890, when that suit was filed.

It is urged, however, that the nature of the perquisites allowed by the law, being only the per diem for actual attendance at meetings of the board, and for actual service in supervising levees, is such as to exclude Holmes from any interest therein when he had not actually rendered the service. This objection is disposed of by two cases, in which it is held that fees earned by the de facto incumbent of the offices of parish recorder and register of the land-office, being only fees for actual personal service performed, were recoverable by the successful contestant. Sigur v. Crenshaw, 10 La. Ann. 297; Petit v. Rousseau, 15 La. Ann. 240. We do not determine that Holmes, if successful, would have the right to recover these perquisites; but only that his asserted right thereto is serious and plausible, and that the jurisdictional allegations based thereon cannot be regarded as so manifestly fictitious and unfounded that they can be disregarded.

Finally, it is urged Act 44 of 1886 provides that the commissioners shall hold "during the term of the executive appointing them, and until their successors are appointed, qualified, and inducted into office;" whence it is claimed that Holmes' title to the perquisites could not begin until he had been "inducted into office." But this claim does not lie in the mouth of relator, who restrained Holmes from taking any steps to induct himself by a judicial injunction. If, in the final decision of this contest, it should be held that Holmes' title to the office was good, (on which point we insinuate no opinion,) the remarks of the court in Petit v. Rousseau would apply: "The defendant ought not to be permitted to derive any advantage from a contest which he provokes, and in which the result proves he was in the wrong. Were a contrary doctrine to prevail, it would be the interest of the incumbent in every lucrative office to contest the election of his successful opponent. We think that justice forbids that the contestant should derive this advantage from his position over his adversary. He ought to account to plaintiff for the emoluments which he has received pending the litigation. Holmes' failure to be inducted being not his fault, but owing to the act of relator, the latter could not be listened to urging it. We are bound to respect the discretion of the circuit court in determining questions affecting its own jurisdiction, and should not annul its judgments, except on the clearest possible showing of manifest error. Such showing is not made in this case. It is a satisfaction to know that this conclusion does not determine the contest, but only reinstates it for determination on the merits.

MCENERY, J., (dissenting.) The court of appeals has no jurisdiction ratione materiæ of this case. This court has enunciated the following principle, and, until this case, has invariably, without turning a hair-breadth from it, affirmed it: Jurisdiction must be tested by the pecuniary amount involved as shown by the pleadings, and as appearing from the nature of the action, and not by the jurisdictional allegations or affidavit of the appellant. The substantive allegations in the pleadings, not the alleged opinion of litigants, are to be considered in all questions of jurisdiction. No allegation and no affidavit can create an appealable amount of interest in a litigation which, from its very nature and essence, cannot involve a pecuniary amount in dispute equal to the lower limit of the jurisdiction of the appellate tribunal. Buddig v. Baldwin, 38 La. Ann. 394; Hite v. Hinsel, 39 La. Ann. 113, 1 South. Rep. 415; Schwartz v. Association, 41 La. Ann. 404, 6 South. Rep. 652. In the last case cited, we said: "In construing jurisdictional allegations, we must be guided by the real pecuniary interest affecting the parties to the litigation, as disclosed by the pleadings taken as a whole, and not by strained allegations of pecuniary interests, which could never be judicially ascertained and determined." This is not a suit for fees or salary of an office, and in this respect differs materially from Sigur v. Crenshaw, 10 La. Ann. 297, and Petit v. Rousseau, 15 La. Ann. 239. This suit is under the intrusion into office act, in which the plaintiff, Holmes, seeks to recover an office to which no fixed fees or salaries are attached. The law creating the fifth levee district allows a per diem to the commissioner when he attends to the session of the board. The present incumbent may not attend any session of the board, and may not earn his per diem. Holmes, therefore, if successful, could only recover, if permissible, money for the number of days for the personal attendance of the present incumbent. This court can have, under the present proceedings, no means of ascertaining the number of days that the present incumbent may attend the session of the board, and the amount of money he may earn. Holmes prays to be put in possession of the office, with the revenues thereof. What are the revenues? We do not know. Holmes did not know when he brought his suit, for he does not ask judgment for them, but for reservation of his right to sue for them. When? When he shall have secured possession of the office, and ascertained the amount due the present incumbent for personal attendance. Under the authority quoted, Holmes' allegation that the office was worth about $60 a year could not give any jurisdiction, in the face of the law under which he claims, showing that it is utterly impossible to fix any determinate sum. On what basis were the jurisdictional allegations made? Why for $60 per annum? It could have been for $1,460 just as well, conjecturing and guessing that the board would sit every day in the year, and the commissioners would be in attendance. If it is worth $60 per annum, from what date is to be calculated the commencement of Holmes' service? Surely from the date he filed his suit to gain possession of the office. This would bring the amount below the lower limit of the jurisdiction of the court of appeals. It must be borne in mind that there are no fees or salary attached to the office which the present incumbent would have to surrender to Holmes. It will not be maintained that the present incumbent would have to surrender to Holmes the amount he collected for personal attendance. Legislators are paid per diem. Who ever heard of a successful opponent receiving the per diem of the ousted member? The present incumbent is a de facto member of the board, and under no circumstances would he be required to pay to Holmes his per diem for actual attendance on the sessions of the board. There is a wide difference between a salary or fees and payment per diem. Suppose Holmes should eventually be successful, and sue for the amount received by the present incumbent for his personal attendance. Could he obtain a judgment? No. The answer would be that the per diem is paid only for personal attendance. Holmes could not say that he attended the sessions of the board, and he could not assert, if he had been admitted to membership of the board, that his attendance would have been the same as that of the present incumbent. A salary goes on whether the office-holder is sick or well, present or absent. Fees accumulate to the office, and are a part of it, whether the incumbent is sick or well, present or absent. The very nature and essence of the case shows that the court of appeals was without jurisdiction. Therefore the jurisdictional allegations of the plaintiff could not give the court jurisdiction. Section 2 of Act 44 of 1886 is decisive of the whole question. This section recites that the commissioners appointed shall hold their offices until their successors are appointed, qualified, and inducted into office. The present incumbent was inducted into office in August, 1888. He is entitled to hold the office until his successor is inducted into office. He is therefore, under the act, not a usurper, and is entitled to the per diem and perquisites, if there were any, until his successor is inducted into office; that is, until he is in full possession of the office. Under the act creating the fifth levee district, Holmes could not claim any sum of money until he had been inducted into office, and given his personal attendance at the sessions of the board. That the court of appeals has no jurisdiction ratione materiæ of the appeal is, to my mind, too clear for argument.

sion into office law, questioning his right to hold the office of commissioner for the parish of Madison on the board of the fifth Louisiana levee district, filed a peremptory exception of no cause of action, which was sustained by the district court, and the suit dismissed. From that judgment plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals, second district. The defendant and appellee moved the court to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appellate court had no jurisdiction, ratione materiæ, for the reason that, on the face of the pleadings, the amount in dispute was less than $100. His motion was overruled, judgment was rendered reversing the judgment appealed from, and remanding the case for trial. After the judgment had been rendered, the relator, Maxwell, applied to this court for a writ of prohibition, directed to James R. McDowell, relator in the original action, and to the district judge, to restrain them from proceeding in the execution of the judgment of the court of appeals. The court of appeals has jurisdiction when the matter in dispute or the funds to be distributed exceed $100, exclusive of interest. In the statement of the case the court of appeals found that the amount involved is more than $100; that the case is within its jurisdiction. After a careful examination of the evidence upon which the statement is predicated, we discover no reason to question its correctness. On the further grounds stated in the case of State v. Holmes, 10 South. Rep. 172, (just decided,) we decline to issue the writ. Relator's application is rejected, and his petition is dismissed.

VIDALAT et al. v. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS. (No. 10,709.)[1]

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. May 28, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

PRIVATE MARKETS—FARMER OF REVENUES OF PUBLIC MARKET.

1. It is settled beyond dispute that the distance of six squares within which no private market can be legally established must be computed by taking the far side of the streets around the public markets, and walking six squares the nearest way. This has been the rule since 1880, and during the term of the plaintiff's contract in 1884–86.

2. In case a farmer of the market revenues of the city of New Orleans seeks to recover damages, on account of losses he has sustained by reason of competition with private markets illegally established within prohibited limits, it is his duty to make clear and satisfactory proof of the existence of such interfering establishments in the mode required by law.

3. The city authorities must be held to a reasonable and proper discharge of duties devolving upon them by its ordinances and the law; but it cannot be mulcted in damages for violation of its contract, upon other than reasonably clear proof of dereliction of duty.

4. Such a case is one sounding in damages ex contractu, entitling plaintiff to reimbursement of loss actually sustained and the profit of which he has been deprived; that is, such as may reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract.

5. In the interpretation of the contract power of a municipal corporation, much the same tests must be applied as those which are applicable to private corporations and individuals.

6. Such inconveniences as fairly result from the making of needed public improvements must be submitted to by all citizens of incorporated towns and cities, without compensation; each individual citizen being supposed to be recompensed by the enhancement of the general welfare and good of the community.

7. It is only in case where there has been an unreasonable or unnecessary delay on the part of the city or contracter, whereby injury has been inflicted on such a lessee, that actionable injury results.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge. Reversed.

Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellant. T. J. Semmes, Legendre, Leonard, Marks & Bruenn, and Frank N. Butler, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. As assignee, S. Vidalat, the plaintiff, claimed of the city of New Orleans $100,000, on the averment that, by the acts and omissions of her officers and agents, his assignors, Vidalat & Co., suffered, during the term of its lease of the public markets, diminution of profits to that extent. His demand is founded on three different causes of action, of similar import, viz.: First, his claim is that, for an alleged diminution of market revenues, arising from competition with the private markets the city had failed to suppress and prevent, as she was in duty and in law obligated to do, he is entitled to demand and recover $75,000; second, that for and on account of eviction from certain spaces adjacent to certain of the market places he had sustained loss of custom and revenues aggregating $10,000; and, third, that on account of the banquette on the south side of Poydras street, in the immediate vicinity of the Pilie market, being torn up, and left in an impassable condition for many months, through the fault and negligence of the defendant, and whereby access to the market on that side was prevented, he had sustained a loss of $15,000; and for which last two items he is likewise entitled to demand and recover the additional sum of $25,000. Plaintiff's claim is that, in October, 1884, Vidalat & Co. purchased at public auction the right or privilege of using and operating the public markets of the city for the period of 26 months, for a consideration of $421,000, payable in monthly installments of $16,200: and under said contract, which was one of lease, the company acquired a right to all the market revenues derivable therefrom under then existing laws and city ordinances then in force. His further averment is that all such laws and ordinances entered into and formed part of the contract; and that the city also bound itself by a special covenant to maintain and enforce such laws and ordinances for its lessee's protection, against unlawful interference with its rights and privileges by private market people, and by all lawful means at its command. On the trial there was a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $75,000, without any specification of the particular demand, on account of which this allowance was made; and, after an unsuccessful effort on the part of the defendant to obtain a new trial, judgment was rendered accordingly, and it has appealed. In this court the plaintiff filed an answer to the appeal, and prayed for the judgment to be so amended as to allow him $85,000.

1. With reference to the first item of damages claimed, the following appears to be a fair summary of facts, viz.: That by official map and other testimony it is estimated that there were established and in operation, during the contract of Vidalat & Co., two or three hundred private markets. The purport of the testimony on this subject is that the distance or radius of six squares is indicated on the map by a series of circles having radii of 2,150 feet, measured on an air-line from the respective market-houses, each corner being taken as the center of a circle, and the line indicating its circumference that of the limit within which private markets were excluded. Within the limits of the different circles, as indicated on the map, plaintiff's witnesses undertake to locate various prohibited private market-houses, by taking streets and their municipal numbers as their guide, and estimating their distances, respectively, from the public markets, by what they suppose to be 2,100 feet. On this theory, lists of such private market-houses have been elaborately prepared and filed in evidence. There was but one witness who professed to have taken actual measurements, as appertaining to the lists; but cross-interrogation revealed the fact that the list he referred to was prepared in 1885–86, during the Vidalat lease, and that the measurements were made only two months previously to the trial, in May, 1890. The lessee gave notice to the proper city authorities of the existence of these private markets, and demanded their suppression. The city made some efforts to abate them, but with practically little success. There were some affidavits made against parties offending the private market ordinances, and some arrests were made, but no convictions secured. There seemed to have been considerable opposition to the enforcement of the law. To this effect is the testimony of the mayor of that time, his private secretary, police officers, and the city attorney. On this subject the latter says: "I have not my docket here, but the private market cases occupied a good deal of my time. There was a good deal of opposition to them. They went to the supreme court several times. * * * Question. I want to know whether you tried to close up the private markets. Answer. I did all I was called upon to do. * * * My associate attorney took them to the recorder's courts, and he attended to those cases; and, if I mistake not, S. P. Blanc, [who] was the attorney for Vidalat & Co., was associated with me in those cases," etc. "The private market men were particularly litigious, and one decision did not seem to have the effect of a final judgment." On the score of losses sustained on account of the private markets, the proof is desultory and suppositious. It shows, substantially, that, for the period between 1859 and 1868, the market revenues were farmed out for $450,000 per annum, and since the termination of the Vidalat lease, in 1886, they have been adjudicated for about $375,000 per annum. There have been constantly in force, since 1868, statutes and city ordinances preventing private markets, and their regulation has been constantly attended with similar difficulties to those which appear to have beset the Vidalat Company. The proof tends to show that during its lease there were many stalls vacant, and that the profits were greatly less than seemed to have been contemplated. In the lease there is a stipulation to the effect that all city ordinances relating to market leases then in force, whereby it was provided that private markets might be established in any portion of the city not within a radius of six squares of any public market, and whereby it was made the duty of the chief of police to prevent any private market being established within prohibited limits, were to form parts of the contract; and the city, as lessor, undertook to maintain and enforce such ordinances, by all lawful means. Taking all in all, this testimony falls short of this purpose, and fails to make out a case for damages against the city on this score, and for several reasons.

(a) In the first place, the modus operandi of establishing the localities in which private markets were situated was entirely incorrect and unsatisfactory. This clearly appears from the testimony of the city surveyor, a portion of which we quote, as follows, viz.: "Question. What is the difference between the radius map [in evidence] and the distance or measurement used by the supreme court? Answer. This, by the supreme court, is in a walking distance of six blocks. Q. Then the map is not a correct guide as to the prohibited markets? A. No, sir. Q. This list of private markets, that you made at the request of Vidalat & Co., * * * which are supposed to be within the prohibited distance, were made with reference to the radius? A. Yes, sir. Q. But that is not the list used by the supreme court, is it? A. No, sir. Q. * * * This list that is introduced here, prepared by order of Vidalat & Co., was prepared according to this 2,100 feet map? A. Yes, sir. Q. And this 2,100 feet map is not a map by which the distance is to be ascertained? A. No, sir," etc. Reference to decisions of this court in private market cases shows this testimony to be entirely correct. State v. Schmidt, 41 La. Ann. 27, 6 South. Rep. 530; State v. Barthe, 41 La. Ann. 46, 6 South. Rep. 531. In the former case it was established, by the testimony of the city attorney of 1880, that the maps in question were made under his instructions, and as a part of ordinance No. 4,798, of which he was author; and that the distance of six squares was, in contemplation thereof, to be computed "by taking the far side of the streets around the market, and walking six squares the nearest way." This has been the rule to which this court has adhered ever since. That rule was inaugurated under the city administration preceding that under which Vidalat & Co. farmed the market, and it was not changed subsequently. The duty was plainly imposed on the plaintiff, at the trial in May, 1890, to have produced such evidence as would have rendered his right clear to recover so large a sum as that demanded against the city on this account. This duty he did not discharge. In so far as the testimony of the single witness, who testified that he had made actual measurements of the distances, is concerned, but little importance can be given to it, because it is manifestly unreliable, it not being pretended that the identical private markets in existence in 1885-86, when the lists were made, had been continued in the same localities to January, 1890, when the measurements were made. And it is evident that actual measurements made in 1890, on the hypothesis that the list made in 1885 was still correct, are unreliable, and such data is of very doubtful character. It is quite unreasonable to suppose that any witness could, with any sort of accuracy, have remembered the identity and localities of two or three hundred private market-houses for such a length of time.

(b) In the second place, there is nothing to show that the city authorities were willfully and flagrantly neglectful of the lessee's contract rights in this particular, or indisposed to perform their duties. Some efforts were exerted in this direction, but difficulties were presented which seemed hard to overcome. The contention of plaintiff's counsel is that the city, having leased the public markets to the plaintiff's assignor, was bound to maintain them in a condition to subserve the purposes of the lease, and could not lawfully do any act to diminish the revenues thereof during its existence; and the city, having expressly contracted to enforce the laws and ordinances relative to private markets for the benefit of the plaintiff as market lessee, was required to close all private markets opened in contravention thereof, and, in default of so doing, it became liable in damages. As applicable to this theory, the case of La Rosa v. Mayor, 4 La. 24, is cited and relied upon. In that case the city adjudicated to the plaintiff the exclusive right of vending oysters at designated stands, and prohibited the sale of oysters at all other places, and the plaintiff was awarded damages against the city in consequence of its failure to enforce the prohibition of its ordinances. But, in the plaintiff's case now under consideration, the right acquired to the revenues of the public markets was necessarily subordinated to the laws and ordinances specially authorizing the establishment of private markets elsewhere, in any part of the city, not within prohibited limits. The element of uncertainty in this case is the failure of the evidence to show that the private market-houses were within prohibited limits, for, in the absence of such proof, they were presumably authorized. The claim of the plaintiff is one sounding in damages ex contractu, and he is only entitled to be reimbursed the loss he has sustained under his contract, and the profit of which he has been deprived; that is, "such damages as were contemplated or may reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract." Rev. Civil Code, art. 1934. Plaintiff's evidence leaves our mind in doubt of his contract having been violated by the city; and if, for the sake of argument, this were conceded to have been made plain, this is not otherwise shown to be a case for the allowance of damages. In the interpretation of the contract powers and duties of a municipal corporation, much the same tests must be applied as those which are applicable to private corporations and individuals. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 935; Walling v. Mayor, etc., 5 La. Ann. 660; Arrowsmith v. Gordon, 3 La. Ann. 105; Smith v. Thielen, 17 La. Ann. 240; Gobet v. Municipality, 11 La. Ann. 300; McCord v. Railway Co., 3 La. Ann. 285; Verges v. Forshee, 9 La. Ann. 294.

2. With regard to plaintiff's eviction from certain spaces adjacent to certain of the market-houses, and the consequent loss of custom he sustained thereby, through the unlawful act of the city, in our opinion a case for damages is not made on the law and evidence. Plaintiff's lease was made and confirmed subject to all existing laws and ordinances relating to market leases generally, and among them was ordinance No. 479, C. S., section 25 of which particularly describes the locus in quo to be leased as follows, viz.: "That the entire areas covered by the several market-houses, including the sidewalks bordering the same, and that portion of certain streets spanned and covered by said market-houses, and also certain squares of neutral ground fronting St. Mary's market, are understood to be devoted to market purposes, except, however, a free and unincumbered passageway on all the said sidewalks bordering the said markets, which passage-way shall be kept free from obstruction." And, for the evident purpose of reinforcing this descriptive enunciation of said ordinance, the provisions of section 32 declare "that it shall be unlawful for any person to occupy any portion of the sidewalks or pavements bordering any of the public markets of the city by depositing for sale, or other purposes, any articles whatsoever, calculated to obstruct the free passage thereof by pedestrians, or to erect, or to continue if already erected, in or over the sidewalks or pavements, any awning, shed, bench, or partition, * * * without permission of the commissioner," etc. During the course of the trial the judge a qua limited and restricted plaintiff's evidence to the requirements of this ordinance, and excluded all other. In this he was evidently correct, and the result was that the evidence adduced failed to show any illegal evictions by the city authorities. From the evidence, it appears that quite a number of persons who, in 1884 and 1885, occupied portions of the open space in front of the French market, and vended their wares and merchandise, such as coffee, soda-water, and cigars, under awnings stretched overhead, were displaced and removed by the city authorities about the first of the year 1886, and were never permitted to reoccupy same thereafter. But those stands were not kept under the aprons of the market, but on the sidewalks or pavements adjacent to the market-house, and formed obstructions to the free use of same, within the terms and plain meaning of the said ordinance, and were removable. Surely, plaintiff has no well-founded claim for damages against the city, on account of loss of custom or diminution of revenues on this account.

3. His claim of $15,000 damages, because access to the Pilie market on the Poydras-Street side was temporarily obstructed, on account of the banquette adjacent to the market-house being torn up, during some two or three months, while the street was undergoing repair, is wholly without any foundation. The proof shows that the Barbour Asphalt Paving Company had undertaken a contract to lay that portion of Poydras street in the vicinity of the Pilie market, with sheet asphalt, and that for that purpose the banquette adjacent was unavoidably torn up or necessarily obstructed. While it is true that this condition of things was suffered to continue much longer than seemed necessary for a speedy and energetic accomplishment of the work, yet we cannot detect anything in the evidence that would justify us in the belief that either the city or the paving company was grossly negligent of their obligations, or willfully did the plaintiff an injury. And it is well established by authority that such inconveniences as may fairly and legitimately result from the making of needed public improvements must be submitted to by all citizens of incorporated towns and cities, without compensation; each individual citizen being supposed to be recompensed by the enhancement of the general welfare of the community. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 990. In contracting for such public street improvements, the defendant evidently acted within the scope of its contracting power. Paving Co. v. Gogreve, 41 La. Ann. 251, 5 South. Rep. 848; section 7, Act 20 of 1882. This is clearly a case of damnum absque injuria in this respect. On the whole, we arise from a very careful examination of the record, and a study of authorities applicable, with the conviction that the plaintiff is entitled to no damages against the city, and that the verdict of the jury, and the judgment thereon based, should be reversed in toto. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered and decreed that there be judgment rejecting plaintiff's demands, at his cost in both courts.

STATE ex rel. CAIRE et al. v. JUDGE OF TWENTY-THIRD DISTRICT COURT. (No. 10,885.)

MANDAMUS—SUCCESSION—FINAL ACCOUNT OF ADMINISTRATOR—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. When the application for an injunction does not show a prima facie right to the same, a mandamus will not issue to compel a district judge to issue the writ.

2. As long as the judgment homologating the final account of an administrator exists of record and unrevoked, it operates as a closing of the succession, and is a bar to further mortuary proceedings, which can only be had after the setting aside of the same.

3. When a succession has been settled, and the administrator discharged, and the property placed in possession of the widow and heirs, a creditor who appears subsequently must pursue them each for his share.

Cross & Cross, for relators. Respondent, in pro. per.

MCENERY, J. This is an application for a mandamus to compel the respondent judge to issue a writ of injunction, which he declined to do, on the face of the papers. The only question presented in the application is, does the petition for the injunction disclose a prima facie right to the injunction? If so, the relator is entitled to the relief demanded. Live-Stock Co. v. Larrieux, 30 La. Ann. 798; Beebe v. Guinault, 29 La. Ann. 795. The facts set forth in the petition are that the Widow Caire administered, by proper appointment, the succession of her husband; that she filed her final account, "in good faith, and under the advice of counsel, all parties believing that the interests of the heirs were fully protected, but that said account was homologated without the heirs being parties, and the minor children were not represented, she never having qualified as tutrix to her minor children; that she was absolutely solvent at the time. The account showed all the debts paid, and the property was therefore turned over to her as usufructuary; all of the same being community property." The petition further shows that Antoine Caire was the holder of certain notes on which the deceased, Jacques Caire, the late husband of Widow Caire, was the indorser. These notes did not appear in the first account, as they were not due; and no opposition to the final account was made by the holder of the notes. Mrs. Caire went into commercial business, failed, went into insolvency, and Antoine Caire was recognized as a mortgage creditor of the community which existed between Mrs. Caire and her husband, Jacques Caire. Judgment was rendered against her, and execution issued, seizing the community property which had been mortgaged to secure the debt. We must presume that the judgment was rendered contradictorily with the widow and heirs in the proceedings to enforce the mortgages, as the petition is silent on this point. From these facts the following reasons for the issuing of the injunction are urged: (1) That the judgment does not support a writ of fi. fa., as it merely recognizes a mortgage on succession property. (2) That said Widow Caire surrendered her usufruct in said property, which has been sold, and the same is in possession of purchasers. That, though relators believe said sale to be null and void, the description of the said property is so vague that bidders will have no notice of the specific property offered for sale, and such indefinite description would be injurious to the heirs. (3) That said heirs have accepted the succession of their father, Jacques Caire, under benefit of inventory, and that the liquidation of the debts can go on only by an administration of the property of the succession. That the judgment homologated the final account of the administratrix, and turning the property over to her as usufructuary did not discharge her as administratrix until the debts of the succession were paid; and that the judgment of the honorable court recognizing said mortgage can only be executed under the probate jurisdiction. The relators, in their petition for the injunction, refer to the judgment in the insolvent proceedings of Mrs. Caire, in which Antoine Caire intervened. The case was appealed to the circuit court of appeals. The return of the respondent judge shows that the judgment rendered was under ordinary proceedings by said Antoine Caire against all parties in interest, each for his virile share. A fi. fa. then was the proper writ to issue under the judgment.

On the second cause alleged for the injunction it is unnecessary to comment, as the disposition of the usufruct by the widow can in no way influence the execution of the judgment, and the alleged wrongful description of the property cannot be injurious to the heirs.

On the third point urged the petition shows that the succession of Jacques Caire had been administered, and the administratrix discharged. The property was turned over to her as widow in community. When the suit of Antoine Caire was instituted there was no succession in existence. It had been settled and passed out of existence. The widow was in possession of the property for herself and minor heirs. As long as the judgment homologating the final account of an administratrix exists of record and unrevoked it operates as a closing of the succession, and is a bar to further mortuary proceedings, which can only be had after the setting aside of the same. Beauregard v. Lampton, 33 La. Ann. 828; Succession of Thibodeaux, 38 La. Ann. 716; Augustin v. Avila, 29 La. Ann. 837. After the widow and heirs had been placed in possession of the property each became liable for his share, and the debts of the deceased, Jacques Caire, become the debts of the heirs. Succession of Dunford, 25 La. Ann. 56. The only remedy left to the creditor, Antoine Caire, was to sue the widow and heirs, as the succession had been closed, and the property mortgaged to secure his debt was in their possession. The petition for the injunction does not disclose a prima facie right to the same. It is therefore ordered that the relief prayed for by relators be denied, and the rule granted herein be discharged, at their costs.

STATE ex rel. BAKER v. JUDGE OF SECOND RECORDER'S COURT. (No. 10,882.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—COURT EXCEEDING JURISDICTION.

1. It not appearing that a pending prosecution of the relatrix for a violation of a city ordinance is the same offense as that with which she stands charged under a previous affidavit, made under the same ordinance, the recorder had jurisdiction thereof to try and determine the same, notwithstanding the relatrix has appealed suspensively from a judgment and sentence under said previous charge.

2. It is unquestionably settled that, until a plea to the jurisdiction of a court has been made and overruled, an application for a writ of prohibition cannot be entertained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of New Orleans; A. M. AUCOIN, Judge.

Application by Catherine Baker for writs of prohibition and certiorari. Writs denied.

James C. Walker, for relatrix. Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City. Atty., for respondent.

WATKINS, J. The purport of relatrix's complaint is that on the 9th of August, 1891, she was arrested on the complaint of one W. G. Seelhorst with willfully and maliciously and unlawfully keeping an assignation-house at 336 Dauphin street, between Esplanade and Kelerec streets, in the city of New Orleans, in violation of section 8 of city ordinance 4434, C. S.; the complaint being that on the date named, before and after, she was thus unlawfully engaged and employed. Subsequently, to-wit, on the 10th of September, relatrix was put upon her trial, and convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine, or to be imprisoned in default of making payment thereof. In answer to this complaint in the recorder's court, the relatrix, inter alias, set up as a defense that her arrest and detention were "without due process of law," and said court "without jurisdiction to inquire into the subject-matter of said affidavit," and coupled therewith a special and general denial. From the sentence and decree therein pronounced the relatrix appealed, and gave bond according to law. That, notwithstanding her said appeal, she has again been arrested on the selfsame charge of violating same ordinance, upon the affidavit of same complainant, and of keeping an assignation-house at the selfsame municipal number; which affidavit was made and filed in same recorder's court on the 8th of October, 1891, during the pendency of her perfected appeal aforesaid. Her averment is that "the matter and fact set forth in the affidavit first mentioned, and the matter and fact set forth in the second affidavit, and severally mentioned, are one and the same matter and fact, and not divers and different matters and facts." It is on this hypothesis that relatrix avers that the recorder exceeded the bounds of his jurisdiction, he having no authority to take cognizance of and try and determine the subsequent charge and complaint, during the pendency of her suspensive appeal from the final judgment and decree rendered upon said former judgment and decree. Certiorari was intended to bring up the record of the recorder's court for inspection. The respondent returns that it is not a fact that the relatrix was arrested and held to bail upon an affidavit charging her with the same offense, and based upon identically the same fact, which is set forth in the affidavit first referred to. He avers that she was arrested on the second affidavit for an infraction of said ordinance committed subsequent to the date set forth in the first affidavit. He further avers that the eleventh section of the city ordinance in question provides that each day any person shall continue to violate the provisions of the same shall constitute a separate offense. He further avers that in the second affidavit she was charged with a new and separate offense, committed on a date different and subsequent to the offense first charged against her. On this ground respondent claims the right to exercise jurisdiction, and prays that the writs be denied. He further pleads and avers that no plea to the jurisdiction was ever tendered in his court in said last-named cause, and that it has not been tried and disposed of. Reference to the eleventh section of the said ordinance discloses the correctness of the respondent's averment, for it declares "that each day any person shall continue to violate the provisions [thereof] shall constitute a separate offense;" and, in our opinion, that provision is conclusively against the complaint of the relatrix. The first affidavit was made on the 9th of August, and the latter on the 8th of October, 1889,—two months intervening. There is no room for doubt of there having been two different and distinct charges preferred against the relatrix, and of the respondent's jurisdiction in the premises we entertain no doubt, and it was not questioned by plea in his court before this suit was filed. State v. Davey, 39 La. Ann. 507, 2 South. Rep. 44, is precisely in point. In addition to this, it has been repeatedly held by this court that, "until after a plea to the jurisdiction has been made and overruled, an application for a writ of prohibition cannot be entertained." State v. Judge, 37 La. Ann. 843; State v. Steele, 38 La. Ann. 569; State v. Judge, 40 La. Ann. 607, 4 South. Rep. 485; State v. Justice, 41 La. Ann. 908, 6 South. Rep. 807. It is therefore ordered that the prayer of the relatrix be refused, and said writs denied, at her cost.

MAGINNIS' ESTATE v. NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE & MUTUAL AID ASS'N. (No. 10,833.)

MUTUAL AID ASSOCIATION—NON-PAYMENT OF ASSESSMENTS — SUSPENSION — ACTION ON CERTIFICATE.

1. In a mutual aid association, a particular method of notice of assessments falling due, having been agreed upon and made a part of the charter, is binding on all members.

2. It being also provided that when a member neglects or refuses to pay any assessment he shall be suspended and treated as no longer a member, in case of death during the period of such suspension the holder of the benefit certificate cannot recover, unless the association is estopped by its own acts, or has waived the effects of the suspension.

3. The assessed had failed to pay the assessment within the time specified, and it remained unpaid at the time of his death.

4. There can be no recovery under his certificate.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge. Reversed.

Action by the estate of John H. Maginnis against the New Orleans Cotton Exchange & Mutual Aid Association on a certificate of membership in defendant association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Bayne, Denegre & Bayne, for appellant. W. S. Benedict, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The defendant company, organized as a mutual life insurance association, is composed of members of the Cotton Exchange who choose to become members. The holder of a benefit certificate is entitled at the death of the assured to receive an amount equal to the assessment levied on each surviving member. One of the articles of the charter provides, upon proof of the death of a member, that each surviving member shall within 10 days pay the sum of $10, and that any member not paying shall be suspended, and treated as not being on the roll of membership, and in case of his death the holder of the benefit certificate shall be without right against the association; upon payment of dues within 30 days the suspension to cease. Only the board of directors, after the expiration, have authority to reinstate a member who has defaulted in paying assessments. The members are notified of assessment by posting in the rooms of the exchange. One of the members died on the 6th of June, 1889. Notice of the assessment was posted as required, and, in addition, two postal-cards were mailed to and were received by J. H. Maginnis. The assured J. H. Maginnis died at Ocean Springs on the 4th of July, 1889. The executor of his estate, about 10 days after his death, offered to pay the amount. The defendant refused to receive it. The debtor may be put in default by the terms of the contract. Civil Code, art. 1912. The defendant contends that the member was in default, and that the terms of the charter operated an immediate suspension. The default is proven, payment not having been made in compliance with the charter. When considering whether there was suspension, the thought occurs that in a voluntary association, in which the initiation, notices, payment of dues, assessments, suspension, and reinstatement are governed by its laws, each member is bound to comply with the obligations he assumes. When a charter contains an article suspending a member for the non-payment of an assessment, it is conclusive and binding. This regulation of the defendant association is self-operative, and takes effect after notice, unless it is estopped, or has waived the suspension. In Gunther v. Association, 40 La. Ann. 777, 5 South. Rep. 65, this court held that the article respecting suspension is self-enforcing, and that a member is suspended upon the non-payment of assessment after notice and delay. The decision was for plaintiff. The court held in that case: "There is not the slightest ground for attributing the failure to pay the assessment to any other cause than the want of notice." There was suspension of the member, but the association was estopped by its fault in matter of notice of assessment.

If the defendant company voluntarily caused the late member, Maginnis, to believe that the members were not bound, by the notice posted on the wall, to pay within 10 days after the posting, or that the first postal-card mailed to him was a waiver of the suspension, or that the second card, notifying him that the assessment was due, gave right to postponement of payment, the plaintiff should recover. If, on the other hand, the first notice is binding on the members of the Cotton Exchange who are members of the association, having free access to its room of meeting, and if the postal-cards were issued ex gratia, the defendant company is not estopped from pleading the suspension and claiming its effect. The deceased was a member at the time the charter was amended, and as a member of the association consented that posting should be sufficient notice. As a member of the Cotton Exchange he had ample opportunity to see the notice. Its inefficiency is not proven. The postal-cards were not misleading. The notice posted on the wall notified the members that assessment 62 was due and payable on or before the 17th day of June, 1889. Precisely the same notice was given by postal-cards. In the second postal he was only informed that his assessment was due on the 17th of that month. On the 4th of July at the time of his death he had not complied. Some 10 days afterwards the executor of his estate offered to pay the amount. It was then no longer possible to comply with the regulation of the association. It was an agreement in due form, binding on all the members, that in case of death during suspension the right to recover on a certificate was lost. We are only enforcing a condition the members have made a law unto themselves. The suspension and notice were completed before death, and nothing in the nature of a waiver to avoid the effect of the suspension is shown. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be set aside, annulled, and reversed, and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the demand of plaintiff be rejected, with costs of both courts.

HACKETT v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 10,831.)

INSOLVENCY—MEETING OF CREDITORS—OPPOSITION—APPEAL FROM ORDER ACCEPTING SURRENDER.

An appeal from an interlocutory order, accepting the surrender made by an insolvent debtor, will not interrupt the 10-days time in which an opposition to the meeting of creditors is allowed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge. Opposition dismissed.

Michael Hackett, an insolvent, made a voluntary surrender to his creditors. An appeal was taken from an order accepting the surrender, but was dismissed. Afterwards the Ullman Goldsborough Company, a creditor, instituted proceedings to set aside the order, but such opposition was filed more than 10 days after the meeting of the creditors.

W. S. Benedict, for appellant Ullman Goldsborough Co. Augustus Bernau, for insolvent appellee.

MCENERY, J. This case was formerly on appeal to this court from an order accepting the surrender made by the insolvent debtor. Hackett v. His Creditors, 43 La. Ann. 124, 8 South. Rep. 587. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that the order accepting the surrender was not a definitive judgment,—that is, was a mere interlocutory order, the execution of which could not cause an irreparable injury; that it did not belong to that class of judgments which could be stayed by an appeal. After the appeal was dismissed, the complaining creditor instituted proceedings to to set aside the interlocutory order accepting the surrender of the insolvent. The appeal from the interlocutory order in the case of Hackett v. His Creditors, referred to and reported, 43 La. Ann. 124, 8 South. Rep. 587, did not have the effect of staying the proceedings; hence the 10-days time prescribed by section 1802, Rev. St., was not interrupted by the appeal. The complaining creditor, the Ullman Goldsborough Company, having filed its opposition after the 10 days prescribed by section 1802, within which time an opposition to the meeting of creditors is allowed, its opposition must be dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

NEWMAN et al. v. IRWIN. (No. 10,824.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ASSIGNMENT—NOTICE—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

1. In order to maintain and enforce an assignment of a credit or incorporeal right in respect to third persons, due proof must be made, not only of the transfer, but of notification having been given to the debtor of such transfer having been made antecedent to any third persons having acquired rights thereon.

2. A judgment is the highest evidence of a debt, and the title merges in the judgment. A judgment neither creates, adds to, nor detracts from a debt. It only declares its existence, fixes the amount, and secures to the creditor the means of enforcing it. A judgment on a promissory note extinguishes its negotiability. It is only transferable as other credits are.

3. One who charges the simulation or other illegality in the consideration of the transfer of a promissory note is held bound to make clear proof of his allegations, as in all other cases of contract. Such proof does not go to the validity of the cause, or consideration of the note, as between the maker and payee.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge. Affirmed.

Executory proceedings by Hand C. Newman for the seizure and sale of mortgaged property. Defendant, James E. Irwin, by his answer sought to enjoin such proceedings on the ground that the mortgage debt had become extinguished by compensation previous to plaintiff's acquisition of the mortgage notes, and that plaintiff's title to the notes was simulated. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Fergus Kernan, for appellant. White, Parlange & Saunders, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. When this case was last before us, the averments of defendant's answer were carefully stated, the interlocutory decree rendered therein by the district judge refusing an injunction reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Newman v. Frevin, 42 La. Ann. 720, 7 South. Rep. 799. Recurring thereto, it appears that there are but two questions for decision, and they are: (1) The extinguishment vel non of the notes proceeded upon, by compensation, prior to plaintiffs' acquisition of them; and (2) the simulation of plaintiffs' title to the notes themselves. The defendant, as maker of the notes sued on, does not gainsay plaintiffs' title to them, but the intervener does. The theory on which the defendant insists that compensation was accomplished is that, on the 2d of October, 1889, he purchased and acquired an undivided interest or share in a certain judgment, which was rendered by a competent court in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, in a suit styled and entitled "Bank of Commerce of St. Louis v. Katz & Mayer," upon the defendant's promissory notes of $10,000. Bank v. Mayer, 42 La. Ann. 1033, 8 South. Rep. 260. That the interest thus purchased was that of the bank against Albert Mayer, one of the members of the defendant's firm, who is alleged to have been the owner of the notes in pending suit, at the time of this transfer and assignment, and was affected thereby. That the plaintiffs assumed to purchase said notes of Albert Mayer, subsequently to said transfer, to-wit, on the 9th of October, 1889, whereas, in truth and fact, said notes had no existence at that time, having become extinguished by compensation antecedently, as stated above. That in the aforesaid acquisition of said undivided interest in said judgment the defendant transferred and assigned to the said bank the property mortgaged as an equivalent therefor; and by this means the "defendant expected to extinguish by compensation his mortgage notes to Mayer, discharge the mortgage from the property he had transferred to the bank, and thus secure to it an unincumbered title." 42 La. Ann. 722, 7 South. Rep. 799. The question presented to us at the threshold of the discussion, and one of serious and vital import to the defendant, is whether or not he really and legally accomplished and perfected his alleged acquisition of an interest in the judgment which the bank held against Mayer. To this question all others are subsidiary. It is needless to discuss the divisibility of a judgment without the judgment debtor's consent, if, in point of law, there has never been a transfer at all; and much the same may be said of other questions in the case. True it is that in our former opinion it is stated that it was alleged in the answer that the defendant acquired by purchase from the bank an interest in the judgment it held against Mayer for a larger sum, "with due notice to him of the transfer;" but, in the course of the argument of defendant's counsel in this case, the admission was made that such was not a fact, there being in the transcript no proof of any such notice having been given to Mayer. The contention of the defendant is that he gave to the bank a title to the mortgaged property in consideration of its transfer of an interest in the judgment it held against Katz & Mayer to him. He does not profess to have paid the price in money, but he claims to have given land in payment of the purchase price. Under our law, a giving in payment is an act by which a debtor gives a thing to his creditor, who is willing to receive it, in payment of the sum due. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2655. This transaction evidently was a giving in payment to the bank, and the bank, in consideration of this giving in payment, assumed to transfer to Irwin an interest in its judgment. The law further declares that it is perfect only when followed by delivery. Id. art. 2656. That, in the transfer of credits, the delivery takes place between the transferrer and the transferee, by the giving of the title, (Id. art. 2645;) but the transferee of a credit is only possessed, as regards third persons, after notice has been given to or accepted by the debtor that the transfer has taken place, (Id. art. 2643.) These principles of law were examined in Bernard v. Bank, 43 La. Ann. 50, 8 South. Rep. 702, and applied to a credit in bank for which a check was drawn; but, notice of same not having been given to the bank officers during the life-time of the drawer, the checkholder was held without right to recover. The drawing of the check was deemed to be a giving in payment of a debt due the checkholder, the effect of which was confined to them, the credit in bank being unaffected, without notice to the bank; and, the maker having in the mean while died, the contract lapsed, and the credit passed to the succession of the maker. This credit in bank was deemed to be a chose in action, and controlled by the provisions of Rev. Civil Code, art. 2642. In the instant case, the thing which the defendant claims to have acquired by the transfer of the bank to him is a judgment or an interest in a judgment. A judgment is also a credit, a chose in action, an incorporeal right; and, like the credit, it cannot be negotiated otherwise than by assignment and due notice to the judgment debtor. "A judgment is the highest evidence of a debt, and the title merges in the judgment. So, when a judgment is had upon a note, the latter is merged in the former, from which only by its reversal or rescission can it be severed. * * * The debtor cannot then plead against the claim, thus merged in the judgment, any prescription but that which bars the latter." 1 Hen. Dig. p. 726, No. 6, and authorities. "A judgment neither creates, adds to, nor detracts from a debt. It only declares its existence, fixes the amount, and secures to the creditor the means of enforcing its payment." Id. No. 8, and authorities. It matters not that suit was brought and judgment rendered upon negotiable promissory notes. As the title to the debt merged in the judgment, its negotiability, as commercial paper, ceased; and not the precepts of the lex mercatoria, but those of the Civil Code, apply to its transfer and assignment. This being the case, the bank's assignment to Irwin of an interest in the judgment was unavailing, without notice thereof to Mayer, the judgment debtor, antecedent to his transfer of the notes in controversy to the plaintiff. The question of the compensability of the notes and judgment need not be discussed, as it could only arise after the perfection of the assignment. In respect to the intervener's complaint of the bona fides of the plaintiffs' purchase of the notes from Albert Mayer, little need be said. Inasmuch as plaintiffs do not contend that they acquired them before their maturity, they are in their hands, confessedly, subject to all offsets and equities existing between the maker and payee. But no such equities or offsets are urged or proved. The only doubt or distrust the allegation or evidence of the intervener purports to throw upon the transaction is in relation to the price plaintiffs paid therefor. That does not appertain to the cause or consideration of the notes themselves. They are unquestioned and unquestionable. In respect to the consideration paid by the plaintiffs, the evidence leaves no doubt in our mind as to its reality and genuineness. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. QUAID. (No. 10,642.)

GAMING—"PIN-POOL."

The game ordinarily known and designated as "pin-pool" is not a gambling game, in the sense of the constitution and the law, and a city ordinance denouncing it as such is illegal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of New Orleans; WILLIAM B. MURPHY, Judge. Reversed.

Thomas Quaid was convicted and sentence to pay fines for gambling, and appeals.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellant. Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for the State.

WATKINS, J. The defendant is appellant from five different convictions and sentences to pay fines for alleged violations of city ordinance 4034, Council Series, which denounces as an offense "gambling with dice, cards, or other means, or keeping a banking game or gambling-house." The charge made in each of the several cases is as follows, viz.: "That Thomas Quaid did then and there violate ordinance 4034, Gen. St., by keeping a gambling game known as 'pin-pool,' upon which money is bet; said gambling game being played in the above-mentioned house," etc. The contention and answer of the defendant are that "pin-pool is not a gambling game, and therefore [it] is not in the contemplation of [said] ordinance; and, in the alternative, it is alleged that, if said ordinance was intended to embrace the game of pin-pool, [it] is illegal, null, and void; that the business of keeping a pool-table is recognized as legal by the state and city, which impose licenses on same; and that these licenses were paid by defendant." The proof shows that the game of pin-pool is played on a table on which five pins are set in a small square,—one being in the center of the square, and each pin being numbered from 1 to 5, respectively. The game is played by a number of persons, each one of whom uses a cue and balls, wherewith the pins are knocked down, and the player is credited on his score with the respective numbers of the pins thus knocked down. At the beginning of the game the game-keeper puts a number of marbles in a leathern bottle, on each one of which is a number printed, and, after thoroughly shaking it up, he casts one to each of the players. These balls indicate the order of preference among the players, and each one is entitled to credit on his score for the number marked on his ball. When, in the progress of the game, one of the players makes a total score of the precise number fixed as the winning number, he is entitled to the pool; and it consists of the total amount the players contributed thereto. The proprietor of the establishment furnishes the entire paraphernalia, and charges so much per game, according to the number of players, and, as soon as the game has been completed, he deducts same from the pool, and the residue goes to the winner. The players very frequently venture bets on the result of the game, but that is entirely optional with them. In such bets the proprietor has no interest, and assumes no risk whatever. It matters not, so far as he is concerned, what the amount or number of the bets may be, the proprietor gets no more nor receives any less a consideration for the game. The theory of the game is that the proprietor simply charges for the use of the table and appliances, and it is of no consequence to him whether one or all of the players pay for it, or whether the players contribute ratably in money, in advance, or agree that the fee be paid out of the pool by the winner. All of these things are purely conventional, and as agreed upon by the parties at the commencement of the game. This game is not in any correct sense a gambling game, such as is denounced in the constitution and laws. If the argument and reasoning on the subject needed re-enforcement, the necessary aid would be supplied by the acts of the state and city in demanding of and receiving from the defendant licenses for the prosecution of this business. The "keeping of a gambling game," in the sense of the law, is such as "implies loss or gain between parties" who are participating in the game. But the defendant, as proprietor, is not a participant in the losses or gains incident to the result of the game. That the players did engage occasionally in betting on the game did not constitute it a gambling game. On the contrary, it is exclusively a game of skill, and does not contain any element of chance. The ordinance in question does not rightfully apply to or legally embrace the game of pin-pool, and the conviction and sentence of the defendant were illegal. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgments and sentences appealed from be annulled and set aside; and it is further ordered and decreed that the various proceedings and prosecutions against the defendant be abated and discontinued, and that he be relieved from the payment of costs.

GAST v. BOARD OF ASSESSORS. (No. 10,826.)[1]

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 16, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

TAXATION—EXEMPTION—MANUFACTURER OF WIRE FURNITURE.

1. A manufacturer of wire furniture is not exempt from taxation under article 207 of the constitution.

2. Where the constitution exempts the manufacturer of furniture "and other articles" of wood, the words quoted relate to and qualify the antecedent "furniture."

3. A limiting clause is generally to be restrained to the last preceding antecedent, and not to be extended to what follows it, unless clearly so intended.

4. Statutes conferring exemption should be strictly construed. This is emphasized by jurisprudence, in cases requiring the construction of exemption clauses. "Doubt is fatal; plausible hesitation warrants an adverse finding." City of New Orleans v. Robira, 42 La. Ann. 1102, 8 South. Rep. 402.

5. This court having heretofore held "that the manufacture of furniture and other articles of wood * * * convey an idea of similarity in the subject contemplated," the onus being with plaintiff, held, that the right to the exemption is not established.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge. Reversed.

Action by G. Gast to cancel an assessment of taxes on him as a manufacturer of wire furniture. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellants board of assessors and the city of New Orleans. Wynne Rogers, for appellant state tax collector. Morse & Cahn and A. L. Tissot, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The plaintiff, a manufacturer of wire furniture, claims exemption from taxation under article 207 of the constitution. He is assessed for $6,000. Eleven-twelfths of the property is used in the manufacture of wire furniture, and the remainder is used in carrying on business not exempt from taxation. All the facts necessary for exemption are shown, if the manufacturer of furniture of wire is such a manufacturer of furniture as exempts him from taxation. The district court ordered the cancellation of the assessment in excess of $500. The sole question for our decision is whether, in so far as relates to furniture, the exemption is limited to wooden furniture. The article under which the exemption is claimed reads: "There shall also be exempt from taxation and license, for a period of twenty years from the adoption of the constitution of 1879, the capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of textile fabric, cotton, shoes, harness, saddlery, hats, flour, machinery, agricultural implements, manufacture of ice, fertilizers, and chemicals, and furniture and other articles of wood, marble, or stone, soap, stationery, ink, and paper, boat-building and chocolate: provided that not less than five hands are employed in any one factory." The furniture of which plaintiff is manufacturer is made of wire; such as chairs, lounges, baths, beds, etc. The authorities representing the defendant state contend that wire furniture is not within the exemption contemplated. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that at the time of the adoption of the law it was well known that furniture was made from other material than wood; that it can be and was made of iron, brass, wire; that in interpreting this law the court must be guided by the rule that generic terms cover every species, unless the term, in its extent, is specially limited; that, if it was the intention of the makers of the law to construe the meaning of the generic term, and place a limitation on its scope, they would have used words to do so, and not left the presumption which might with a phrase have been made certain. The district judge, for whose judgment we entertain high regard, in his opinion states "that the first impression which one derives from reading this article is probably that, in so far as the exemption is intended to be extended to furniture, it is indefinite, and limited by the adjective 'wood,' which follows; and hence that only furniture manufactured of that particular article or substance is within the meaning of the language." That a "more careful consideration of the subject led him to the conclusion that the first impression is an erroneous one, and that the main adjective 'wood,' as well as those which follow it, limit or modify, not the word 'furniture,' but the phrase, 'and other articles,' which succeed it; and that furniture, no matter of what substance, is exempt, while with respect to 'all other articles' they must be of some one or the other of the substances designated in order to avoid such exemption." We will affirm the first impression of the court, for after careful consideration we are led to accept it as correct. The question is not free from difficulty; the meaning is doubtful. The exemption is stated by the word "furniture," but immediately after follow the words, "and other articles of wood." If it be a qualifying phrase, it applies to "furniture." "And other articles of wood" conveys the meaning that the exempted property is of that material. The word "articles" connotes furniture as well as other property. By "other," "furniture" is qualified. The word "other" must relate to the preceding or last antecedent, unless it is clearly evident from the nature of things that it is not a qualifying term. It is urged with some force that, had the law-making authority intended to limit the exemption as contended by the defendant, they would have used the qualifying adjective "wooden," and would have exempted "wooden furniture." The word "wooden" was not used as a qualifying adjective just preceding "furniture;" but immediately succeeding we have, "furniture and other articles of wood." The question is propounded by plaintiff's counsel: "Manufacturers of shoes are exempt. The constitution reads: 'Leather, shoes, harness, and saddlery.' If the manufacturer of a cloth shoe was before the court, would the court hold that only shoes manufactured of leather came within the meaning of the law?" The question propounded does not suggest any ambiguity, and answers itself in the negative. If, instead, the exemption clause were to read, "Shoes and other articles of leather," the manufacturer of cloth shoes would not be exempt. If "other" does not qualify "furniture," it serves no purpose. In so far as it relates to articles of wood, marble, stone, and other materials, if intended to qualify them, it is used idly, and signifies nothing. The second rule of interpretation "is to give all doubtful words or expressions that sense which makes them produce same effect." Potters' Dwar. St. p. 736. In the construction of a statute a limiting clause is to be restrained to the last antecedent, unless the subject-matter requires a different construction. Cushing v. Worrick, 9 Gray, 382. In the pending case we have not discovered that the subject-matter requires a different construction. "General words are not to be extended to what follows, unless clearly so intended." Coxson v. Doland, 2 Daly, 66. The range of argument suggests the importance of stating that our conclusion relates to furniture of wire. We do not decide that "other articles" limit the exemption to furniture. This matter received consideration in the case of Martin v. City of New Orleans, 38 La. Ann. 397, and is not now before the court. We decide that furniture and the "other articles of wood" must be of wood in so far as relates to the qualifying words and their antecedent. The well-known and universally prevailing principle of interpretation that statutes conferring exemption should be strictly construed is specially emphasized in the jurisprudence of this state. "In such case doubt is fatal. Plausible hesitation warrants an adverse finding." City of New Orleans v. Robira, 42 La. Ann. 1102, 8 South. Rep. 402; Carre v. City of New Orleans, 41 La. Ann. 998, 6 South. Rep. 893, 42 La. Ann. 1121, 8 South. Rep. 399; Dennis v. Railroad Co., 34 La. Ann. 958. In the case of Jones v. Raines, 35 La. Ann. 998, it was held: "It is worthy of note that in the enumeration each kind of manufacture is treated as a distinct and separate subject, and all are separated from each other by a comma, except the manufacture of furniture and 'other articles of wood,' which are not thus separated, and thus convey an idea of similarity in the subject contemplated or provided for." From the case of Carre v. City of New Orleans, 41 La. Ann. 999, 6 South. Rep. 893, we extract: "The articles of wood mentioned in the article of the constitution are, therefore, those which, like furniture," etc. The article of the constitution. The words "furniture and other articles of wood." The application of the rules of construction and the decisions of courts have forced on us the conclusion that the plaintiff is not exempt from the payment of taxes. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now decreed that there be judgment in favor of defendants, denying plaintiff's claim to exemption, and maintaining the validity of the assessment in its entirety, and that plaintiff pay the costs of both courts.

Succession of SCHWENCK.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 30, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

WILLS—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—COMMUNITY SETTLEMENT.

1. The judgment of the district court on the provisional account is fully sustained by the evidence.

2. The evidence entirely rebuts and disproves the charge of undue influence as a ground for annulling the decedent's will.

3. Debts due by the deceased husband as head of the community of acquets and gains by a first marriage, and paid out of the earnings of the community under a second marriage, must, in a settlement between them, be charged to the first and credited to the second community.

4. The evidence sustains the adjustment made by the judge of the accounts between the two communities.

5. The allowance made for the revenues of the separate property of the minors, making no deductions for their expenses, is at least as much as they are entitled to. The question as to whether their expenses should be deducted is referred to, but appellee asks no amendment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge. Affirmed.

James B. Rosser, Jr., for appellant. Henry P. Dart, for appellee.

FENNER, J. Jacob Schwenck was married thrice. His first wife died without children, and that marriage may be eliminated in this case. He then married Christina Seibel, who died in January, 1880, leaving three children, issue of the marriage, who are represented by P. O. Rosenstream as their dative tutor. In February, 1882, Schwenck married Wilhelimina C. Rausch-Kolb, by whom he left two children. He died on January 22, 1889, leaving a nuncupative will, executed on his death-bed, by which he constituted his wife his sole executrix, gave her the usufruct of all of his property, and the whole disposable portion in full ownership. This record presents three contests, which, though originally distinct suits, were covered by one judgment, and are practically consolidated. These are: (1) An action by the minor children of the decedent's previous marriage to annul his will; (2) an opposition on their behalf to the provisional account filed by the widow and testamentary executrix of said will; and (3) a partition suit instituted against the minors of the previous marriage by the said second wife, individually and as executrix and tutrix of the two minor children, issue of her marriage with decedent.

1. In the suit to annul the will several grounds were urged, all of which are abandoned in this court except one, viz., a charge of undue influence exercised over the mind of the testator by Charles L. Rausch-Kolb, a brother to the wife, who was present in the room and one of the witnesses to the will. This may be disposed of very briefly. Waiving all questions of law, the evidence in the case, of witnesses introduced by the assailant of the will in his own behalf, conclusively negatives and annihilates the charge.

2. All the grounds of opposition to the account of the executrix are abandoned except to three items of bills put on the account as paid by her, and which opponent claims are not proved. We have examined the testimony, and find them fully proved.

3. Without undertaking a tedious statement of all the complicated issues involved in the partition suit, we shall confine ourselves to disposing of the particular objections to the judgment below which are urged by appellant in this court. The most important questions arise in the settlement of the accounts between the first and second community. The widow claims that the first community was, at the date of its dissolution, insolvent, and owed a large amount of debts, which were paid after the origin of the second community, and out of the earnings thereof. This is strongly disputed by the tutor of the minors of the first community. It appears that the decedent's business, before and after his last marriage, was the keeping of a bar-room and restaurant, which was his only source of income. The tutor shows that business was at least as profitable, and probably more profitable, before than after his second marrige; and he suggests the intrinsic improbability that the business should have left the decedent insolvent and largely in debt at the date of his last marriage, while the same business, in the years between that and his death, enabled him to pay off all debts, and, besides, to make considerable outside investments. Impressed with this suggestion, we have made a very critical examination of the evidence in the case, but we can find nothing to justify us in disturbing the finding of the district judge, who sustained the contention of the widow. It is incontestably proved that the decedent did owe large debts at the date of his last marriage, and there is not a word of evidence to show or indicate that he had any funds on hand with which to pay them, or any property other than that which remained at his death, and which was partly incumbered by the debts referred to. These debts were undoubtedly paid off during the last marriage, and, in absence of any evidence to the contrary, as well as in proper consideration of positive evidence to that effect, we are bound to hold, as did the district judge, that the payments were made with community funds. Neither the widow nor the court was bound to explain what became of the earnings of the prosperous business conducted by Schwenck prior to his last marriage. It is very certain that they did not prevent him from incurring large debts. Nor are the accumulations from the business during the last community, employed in paying off prior debts and in some investments of no great amount, intrinsically improbable or unreasonable. The business, during the existence of this community, extending over a period of seven years, is proved to have been profitable, averaging a gross income of about $35 per day, or nearly $13,000 per annum. It was closely and economically managed, with the active co-operation of the wife, who was an intelligent and hard-working woman; and the net profits were large. If the net results were so much more favorable after than prior to the marriage, it will not be the first time that the assistance of an intelligent, industrious, and saving wife, especially in that rank of life, has changed the financial condition of the husband from one of embarrassment to one of prosperity.

Appellant further disputes the proof of payment as to several items, viz.: (1) The Bultman debt. This debt was evidenced by a mortgage note for $6,000, and had been contracted prior to the last marriage. It had not been paid at the date of the marriage. It was paid off during the marriage. The only question is as to the amount paid during the marriage. The books of Jacob Schwenck, kept in his own handwriting, show the dates and amounts of the various payments running from May 31, 1882, to July 6, 1886, when the final payment was made. A. F. Bultman, the son of Mrs. Bultman, who held the note, attended to these collections from a certain period in 1884, and he renders an account of payments made, beginning November 19, 1884, which substantially corresponds with Schwenck's books. The prior payments had been made to Mrs. Bultman, who kept no memorandum of them, and could throw no light on the dates and amounts of payments. The presumption is overwhelming that Schwenck's entries are correct, and it is confirmed by all the evidence. We pay no attention to trifling inconsistencies in Bultman's evidence, much dwelt on by appellant. They amount to nothing. His own statement shows that he knew nothing about payments prior to 1884, and his reference to them in his testimony obviously arose from a mere confusion of dates. (2) The Dutrey debt. It is clearly shown that the debt existed and was unpaid in 1884. It was evidenced by a note for $500, which had been destroyed, and nobody could prove its date. But the holder accepted the face of the note without interest, and Schwenck told his wife at the time that he was glad enough to get that, as the note was prescribed. Of course, if there was any question as to prescription, the date must have been prior to the marriage. We are satisfied, besides, that, if the debt had been contracted during the marriage, Mrs. Schwenck would have known it. (3) The debt due to the mother of Schwenck. He undoubtedly owed her the full amount claimed as capital at the date of the last marriage. The debt had been satisfied in principal and interest. Although the mother's recollection of the actual amount paid is confused, she does not dispute that she accepted the payment in full settlement of the debt, and proclaims her perfect confidence in the integrity of her son. A memorandum book is produced in Schwenck's handwriting, showing dates and amounts of expenditures for her account, and payments made, which went to the extinguishment of the debt. We will not waste further time in discussing evidence as to other items. We consider that all allowed by the judge are satisfactorily proved. We consider that appellant has no cause to complain of the allowance made by the judge for the revenues of the separate property of the minors, without any deduction on account of their expenses. Had appellant claimed an amendment in this matter, grave questions would have been presented. See Handy v. Parkison, 10 La. 98; Mercier v. Canonge, 12 Rob. (La.) 385. The case of Succession of Applegate, 39 La. Ann. 403, 2 South. Rep. 42, refers to the last-quoted case, and differs from the case then before us in particulars which do not exist in this case. On the whole, we think justice has been done.

CARROLL v. BANCKER et al. (No. 10,725.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 27, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

JURISDICTION—ENFORCEMENT OF PRIVILEGE—DOMICILE OF DEBTOR—SEIZURE OF PROPERTY — EFFECT OF APPEARANCE — LOSS OF PRIVILEGE—PLEDGE OF FACTOR—LIEN OF LESSOR.

1. Act 64 of 1876, amending article 168 of the Code of Practice, confers jurisdiction on the courts of this state to enforce a lien or privilege on property within their jurisdiction, notwithstanding the domicile of the debtor or owner be elsewhere; but the effect of the decree must be restricted to the property that is proceeded against or its proceeds.

2. It is of no consequence that the property itself has not been seized. It is sufficient if the suit appears to be an action quasi in rem, and has for object to define the status of designated property, or to determine a lien or privilege on it.

3. It is permissible, under the law and jurisprudence, for a citizen of a parish different from the one in which he is cited to appear and answer to the merits, and by thus voluntarily submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court, the judgment therein rendered is not coram non judice.

4. Whatever may have been the course of judicial opinion under Code Prac. art. 288, and Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2705, 2709, it is clear that under the provisions of Act 66 of 1874, and Act 44 of 1882, amending same, the right of pledge of a factor who makes advances of supplies to a planter is subordinate to the lien of the lessor who rents the land on the crops produced thereon; and the right of sale which is conferred upon the factor, coupled with the right to appropriate the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of his claim, cannot be so construed as to defeat or lessen the privilege of the landlord for rent.

5. When the "effects" of a lessee consist of agricultural products, like sugar and molasses, and same have been pledged under the act of 1874 to a factor for advances of plantation supplies, and afterwards consigned to him for sale, his right to appropriate the proceeds is thereby restrained and subjected to the lessor's claim for rent, and same are subject thereto in the factor's hands.

ON REHEARING.

Plaintiff's privilege as lessor upon the crop of sugar and molasses was lost by him, as he did not, in accordance with article 2709 of the Civil Code and article 288 of the Code of Practice, seize it before it was shipped to the market to be sold, nor within 15 days after it had been removed from the leased plantation. WATKINS, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Daniel R. Carroll against George W. Bancker and another to enforce a lessor's lien. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Henry L. Lazarus, for appellant. Rice & Armstrong and Charles Hernandez, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. The object of this suit is the enforcement of a lessor's lien upon the proceeds of sugar and molasses produced and manufactured on the leased premises of plaintiff, and alleged to be in the possession of the defendant Hernandez. The claim of the plaintiff is that he leased to the defendant Bancker, for the year 1886, his certain sugar plantation in the parish of St. Martin, for the price of $2,500, which became due on the 10th of November of that year. That to secure the payment of the rent he had a lien and privilege on the crops produced on the leased premises; and, as a part of the crops on which his lien rests, he specifies 52 hogshead of sugar and 49 barrels of molasses, worth the sum of $2,500, that his lessee shipped to Hernandez; and he avers that same, or the proceeds thereof, are in his possession. A writ of sequestration was obtained, a seizure thereunder demanded by the sheriff, and a denial made on the part of Hernandez of his possession of either the products specified or the proceeds thereof. A rule was taken to traverse the truthfulness of his statement, and some testimony was reduced to writing; but the rule was voluntarily discontinued by plaintiff, and on the same date, or soon afterwards, he filed a supplemental petition, in keeping with the averments of his original petition, making Hernandez a party, and praying a judgment against him for the crops produced, or their proceeds. On the same date counsel for Hernandez filed an exception and answer, both being incorporated in the same paper: (1) No cause of action; no lawful ground for sequestration; petition too vague and indefinite, and the like. (2) That at the time of demand being made on him he had not, nor has he since had, any sugar or molasses belonging to the defendant, nor any proceeds thereof. But he avers that he furnished Bancker with supplies for the cultivation of his crop in 1886, as will be shown by his duly-recorded act of pledge, which is annexed to and made a part of his answer; and that when said crops were sold he applied the proceeds of sale to his account, as he had a right to do. He subsequently excepted further, that he cannot be thus proceeded against, on the ground that there is no suit pending on the original petition against Bancker, and, he being a resident citizen of the parish of St. Martin, and "not having voluntarily appeared therein, and there having been no seizure of his property, the civil district court is without jurisdiction of the matter." These exceptions were sustained to the extent of requiring plaintiff to amend the second time, and this was accordingly done. To this amendment Hernandez filed an answer, pleading a general denial; and shortly afterwards Bancker appeared, and filed a similar answer and denial.

This analytical statement of the pleadings was necessary in order to clear the case of some confusion in which the statement of counsel had involved it. This case comes clearly within the principle of Act 64 of 1876, which amends the 163d article of the Code of Practice, and confers jurisdiction upon the courts of this state to enforce a lien or privilege on property within their jurisdiction, notwithstanding the domicile of the debtor be elsewhere, the operation and effect of the judgment being limited to the value of the property that is proceeded against. It matters not that the property itself has not been actually seized. Such a suit is substantially an action in rem, and has for object to define the status of the property, and to determine an apparent lien upon it. See Young v. Upshur, 42 La. Ann. 362, 7 South. Rep. 557, and authorities cited. In this class of cases we have frequently held that our courts have jurisdiction to bind the citizens of other states, and to hold them by their judgments, to the extent that their property domiciled here may be affected thereby. Young v. Upshur, 42 La. Ann. 362, 7 South. Rep. 557; Robbins v. Martin, 43 La. Ann. 488, 9 South. Rep. 108; Duruty v. Musacchia, 42 La. Ann. 357, 7 South. Rep. 555. Independently of these considerations, the suit is chiefly directed against Hernandez, who is a resident citizen of the parish of Orleans, and is to be affected by the decree; and it is not doubted that Bancker has parted with the crops that are sought to be reached thereby, in the hands of Hernandez, though not against the proceeds thereof. Plaintiff does not pretend that Hernandez is bound in any way for the payment of the rent, and no personal judgment is asked by him against Bancker. But it is a complete answer to Hernandez's objections to the jurisdiction of the court to state that Bancker has submitted himself thereto. That is conclusive against Hernandez. Phipps v. Snodgrass, 31 La. Ann. 88; Gomila v. Milliken, 41 La. Ann. 117, 5 South. Rep. 548; Code Prac. art. 93. In so far as the other exceptions of Hernandez are concerned, we need only mention the fact that their being incorporated in his answer is necessarily fatal to them. Robbins v. Martin, 43 La. Ann. 488, 9 South. Rep. 108, and cases therein cited.

On the merits we find the following to be a fair statement of facts, viz.: That the plaintiff leased his plantation to the defendant Bancker as stated, and he has paid no part of the price of the lease, and nothing has been paid him from the proceeds of the sale of the crops produced on the leased premises, and which his lessee had shipped to Hernandez, as his factor, residing in the city of New Orleans, these shipments having been made for the most part after plaintiff's rent had become due. On the 9th of June, 1886, the plaintiff's lessee executed in notarial form an act of pledge in favor of Hernandez for the sum of $2,000, due and payable on the 15th of December following. In this act it is stipulated that this sum is to cover the amount and value of necessary supplies which were thereafter to be furnished for the "cultivation and raising of a crop of sugar and molasses during the present year on * * * a certain sugar plantation situated in the parish of St. Martin, * * * belonging to Mr. D. R. Carroll, * * * which said plantation is leased by the said Bancker." It further stipulates that Bancker grants in favor of Hernandez "the lien and privilege recognized by law in favor of furnishers of supplies, and, moreover, pledges and pawns * * * all the crops of sugar and molasses that will be raised on said plantation during the season of 1886-87." In addition to these stipulations, Bancker specially covenanted and agreed that he would ship to Hernandez, "as soon as ready for market, all the sugar and molasses that he shall grow on said plantation, and that Hernandez was to sell the same for his account and apply the proceeds thereto." This act was duly registered in the clerk's office of the parish of St. Martin on the date of its execution. It appears from the transcript that Hernandez rendered to Bancker accounts of sale of certain sugars and molasses which were sold on the 22d, 23d, 26th, 27th, and 29th of November and the 1st of December, 1886, respectively, though none of said accounts were rendered until subsequent to the filing of this suit on December 3, 1886. It is admitted that the sugar and molasses Hernandez received from Bancker were so received on the days they were shown to have been sold, and that such dates were the dates of shipments from the plantation. It appears that Bancker cultivated another plantation, which belonged to his wife, and adjoined the Carroll plantation, and to which Hernandez likewise furnished supples, though neither this plantation nor the supplies to be thereto furnished are made mention of in the act of pledge. Bancker, as a witness, states that the first shipment of sugar and molasses from his wife's plantation was made on the 29th of November, 1886,—not more than four barrels, prior to that date; that all previous shipments had been made from the Carroll place. The account current filed in evidence by Hernandez shows that subsequent to the 29th of November the total sales aggregated only $866.42, and, as this sum must be attributed to his account for supplies that were furnished the plantation of Bancker's wife, and with which Carroll has no concern, it must be deducted from the total proceeds of crops received; and making this deduction will give us the following statement, viz.: The total proceeds of crops, $2,711.56; deducted for account of Bancker's plantation, $866.42; balance for account of Carroll plantation, $1,845.14. But, inasmuch as Bancker's account shows a total debt of $3,606.32, the sum of $866.42 must be subtracted therefrom, and, as Hernandez holds other collaterals of Bancker, which are worth approximately $1,000, that value must be likewise subtracted therefrom. Making these alterations, we have this statement, viz.:

Amount to Bancker's debit....		$3,606 82
Less Bancker's plantation crops.....	$ 866 42
Other collaterals.....	1,000 00	1,866 42
Balance due Hernandez...		$1,739 90

On this showing Hernandez is in possession of values to the extent of $105.34 over and above his claim, whereas Carroll, the lessor of Bancker, has received nothing at all. It further appears that all credits appearing on Hernandez's account against Bancker as appertaining to the Carroll plantation as of dates antecedent to the 22d of November, 1886, only aggregate $817.13, and, deducting this sum from the total amount of credits attributable thereto, viz., $1,845.14, and we find that $1,028.01 is the net amount realized from crops which were shipped from the Carroll plantation within 15 days previous to the institution of this suit, and the notification of plaintiff's writ of sequestration to Hernandez, and the sheriff's demand on him for the crops or their proceeds. All of the transactions here detailed took place subsequent to the maturity of plaintiff's claim, and prior to that of Hernandez; and Hernandez, as a witness, admits that the sums shown on his account to have been applied to Bancker's credit were thus applied after he had received notice of plaintiff's sequestration, and that Bancker was subsequently notified thereof.

On this state of facts the question for solution is whether Hernandez, holding possession of the crops of Bancker that were produced by the latter on a plantation under lease from Carroll, and which were consigned to the former as his factor under bills of lading, had the right after sale thereof to apply the proceeds to Bancker's account for supplies furnished, to the prejudice of Carroll's claim for rent. This question appertains, under the foregoing statement, to the proceeds of products which were received by Hernandez prior to the 22d of November, 1886, viz., $817.13, as the remainder were received and sold within the 15-day limit. While it is fully admitted and conceded by counsel for Hernandez that under the provisions of Act 66 of 1874 he acquired, by virtue of his act of pledge, a right subordinate to the lessor's lien on the crop produced on the plantation Bancker leased from Carroll, yet, because of the latter's failure to assert his right against the crops affected thereby while they are yet upon the leased premises, or within 15 days after their removal therefrom, same has lapsed; and that in no event does the landlord's lien extend to proceeds derived from the sale of property removed from the premises leased. It is provided in the Code of Practice (article 288) that the lessor may seize, even in the hands of a third person, objects which are subject to his lien, if same have been removed by the lessee "within fifteen days previous to his suit being brought;" and in Rev. Civil Code, art. 2709, it is provided that "in the exercise of his right of pledge the lessor may seize the objects which are subject to it before the lessee takes them away, or within fifteen days after they are taken away, if they continue to be the property of the lessee, and can be identified." But our attention has been attracted to an alteration in the textual provisions of the Civil Code by Act 66 of 1874 (as amended by Act 44 of 1882) in the following particulars, viz.: That while, under the provisions of section 1 of the former act, the planter may pledge his growing crop for advances of necessary supplies in favor of a merchant advancing same, yet the effect of such pledge is subordinate to the claim of the landlord for rent of land. That while, under the provisions of section 2 thereof, the advancing merchant to whom such agricultural products have been consigned by bill of lading shall have a right of pledge thereon "from the time the bill of lading thereof shall be put in the mail," and shall confer upon such pledgee the right to sell said products and "to appropriate the proceeds of sale to the payment of the amount due for such advances as may have been made thereon," yet it is also specially provided that nothing (therein) "shall be so construed as to defeat, or lessen the privileges of * * * landlords in this state * * * for rent," etc. That while, under the provisions of section 3 of that act, merchants or factors who have a balance of account due them by planters, who consign to them any agricultural products for sale, have a pledge upon the same from the time the bill of lading therefor "is deposited in the mail," and are authorized "to appropriate the proceeds of sale to the payment of the amount due" them, yet it further provides "that nothing herein shall be so construed as to defeat or lessen the privilege of * * * landlords in this state * * * for rent," etc. The latter act makes no alteration of the former except to extend the provisos contained in sections 2 and 3 thereof to "other valid existing privileges or liens." Whatever may have been the course of decision under the cited articles of the Codes, it is clear that under the terms of these statutory enactments the lien of the factor who makes advances of supplies to a planter is subordinate to that of the lessor who rents the land on the crops that are thereon produced; and that the right of sale which is conferred upon the factor, coupled with the right to appropriate the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of his claim, is not to be so construed as to defeat or lessen the privilege of the landlord for rent. While under the provisions of Rev. Civil Code, art. 2705, "the lessor has, for the payment of his rent, and other obligations of the lease, a right of pledge on the movable effects of the lessee, which are found on the property leased," and which pledge may, under the provisions of Rev. Civil Code, art. 2709, be exercised against the objects which are subject to it before they are removed by the lessee from the leased premises, or within 15 days after they are taken away, yet when such "effects" consist of agricultural products, like sugar and molasses, and same have been pledged under the act of 1874 to a factor for advances of plantation supplies, and are afterwards consigned to him for sale, his right to appropriate the proceeds is thereby restrained and subjected to the lessor's claim for rent, and same are subject thereto in the factor's hands. In the instant case the act of pledge in favor of Hernandez expressly mentions the plantation to which he contracted to furnish supplies as one Bancker had leased from Carroll, and he cannot be permitted to disavow or gainsay the information he thus admitted was in his possession. He is conclusively bound by this admission, made in a quasi judicial act. As he was Bancker's factor, and had received his consignments of sugar and molasses, and claims the right to apply the proceeds to his own account, he must have known that Carroll had been paid nothing therefrom, and he was necessarily put upon inquiry as to his rights. Plaintiff acted promptly, and filed his suit, and gave Hernandez notice before his debt against Bancker became due, and thereafter pressed his claim vigorously. We are of opinion that plaintiff's right to recover of Hernandez is clear to the extent of the amount of the proceeds of the sugar and molasses that were produced and manufactured on the land he rented to Bancker, viz., the sum of $1,845.14, with legal interest from judicial demand. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed in so far as it rejects plaintiff's demands against Hernandez, and it is now ordered and decreed that same be so amended as to adjudge and decree that the plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendant Hernandez the sum of $1,845.14, with legal interest from judicial demand, and that, as demanded, same be affirmed, at the cost of defendant in both courts.

ON REHEARING.

(Nov. 30, 1891.)

BREAUX, J. This suit has for object the enforcement of a lessor's privilege on the proceeds of a crop of sugar and molasses consigned by one of the defendants to his commission merchant, who sold it in this city.

PLEADINGS.

Plaintiff alleged that he had a privilege, sued for a writ of sequestration, and prayed for judgment against George W. Bancker, the lessee. Hernandez, the pledgee, was not made a party to the suit. Notice of the writ which issued in the case was served on him on the day it was issued, viz., December 3, 1886. On the 14th of December, on rule served on him, he was ordered to answer interrogatories in court. They were answered. Evidence was heard on the trial of this rule. On motion of plaintiff's counsel, this rule was discontinued on January 27, 1887. On the 18th day of April, same year, plaintiff filed a supplemental petition, alleging that defendants had conspired to defraud him, and that in consequence Hernandez had become responsible. An exception of no cause of action was filed and maintained with leave to amend. At a subsequent date another supplemental petition was filed, in which it was charged that Hernandez knew of the lease made by plaintiff, and that he schemed with lessee to remove the sugar and molasses from the plantation leased, and to hastily sell them, in order to defeat the lessor's lien. On issue joined the case was tried. The district judge decided for plaintiff and against the defendant George W. Bancker for the rental, with legal interest. The demand against Hernandez was rejected, and the suit of sequestration dissolved. From this judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

The consignor, G. W. Bancker, in 1886 cultivated two plantations in the parish of St. Martin,—one the property of his wife; the other adjacent that of the plaintiff, from whom he leased for $2,500 per annum. There was no sugar-house on the leased place. On the 7th of June, 1886, the defendant Bancker executed an act of pledge, under Act 66 of 1874, in favor of Hernandez, to secure the sum of $2,000, payable on the 15th day of December. This was a loan to enable him to cultivate his crop. The pledgor obligated himself in this act to consign to the pledgee all the sugar and molasses made on the plantation as soon as ready for market, to be sold, and the proceeds to be applied to the payment of amounts due to the pledgee. The contract shows that the plantation was leased by plaintiff to Bancker. This act was in due time recorded in the clerk's office. Hernandez, whose testimony is not contradicted, testifies that the note due by Bancker for advances "was held as collateral." "His account was to be paid as he shipped." Bancker, the only other witness who testifies with reference to this matter, corroborates this testimony. In September, Bancker shipped to his merchant, the pledgee, 34 barrels of molasses, products of the crop on the leased place; in October 1 barrel; and the remainder of that crop was shipped at different times from the 9th to the 24th of November. The account of sales credits the proceeds of the sale of the last sugar and molasses made on the Carroll leased plantation on December 1st. The last entries on Bancker's account on the credit side are: November 29, 1886, 8 hogsheads of sugar, $220.91; December 1, 1886, 8 hogsheads of sugar, $260.67; December 1, 1886, 10 barrels of molasses, $115.86; December 4, 1886, 16 hogsheads of sugar, $489.89. The last sugar—the 16 hogsheads—was sold on the day notice was given to Hernandez of the sequestration. The 16 hogsheads were not made on the leased plantation, but on the Bancker place. The only testimony we have on the subject is the following, by Bancker: "Question. Do you remember what were the last shipments made by you to Mr Hernandez prior to December 3, 1886? Answer. The last shipment I made was eight hogsheads of sugar on the 30th of November. Q. And next prior to that? A. On the 29th of November. Q. What did you ship then? A. Eight hogsheads of sugar. Q. Where was that sugar—those two lots—shipped from? A. They were from Mrs. Bancker's plantation. Q. On which of the plantations, if either, had the cane which produced the sugar been raised? A. On Mrs. Bancker's. Q. Had any portion of the cane out of which these 16 hogsheads of sugar were made been raised and been at any time upon the plantation leased from Mrs. Carroll? A. No, sir." This witness also testified that the crop made on the leased place was removed from the place more than 15 days before it was shipped to the merchant. The cane was cut and hauled to the sugar-house, and manufactured into sugar. This, he says, occupied more than that number of days. That in time the sugar and molasses were hauled to the depot. They were marked in the name of the lessee, Bancker, in whose name the bills of lading were issued, and by whom they were mailed to the merchant. That it was all sold prior to the 2d of December. Hernandez, testifying, states: "Sales had been rendered on the 4th of December. After the writ of sequestration had been served, 16 hogsheads of sugar; that is all." His testimony and that of Bancker makes it evident that this sugar was not from the Carroll place, also that the proceeds from the sale of the sugar from cane on the Carroll place was credited on Bancker's account before service of the writ of sequestration, and that Hernandez did not know that the rental was still unpaid. He testifies: "Question. Did you know as a matter of fact that Mr. Bancker had not paid the rental to D. R. Carroll for the lease of the plantation? Answer. I did not, sir." No other witness testifies as to this matter except Bancker, who corroborates Hernandez. Relative to undue haste in selling the crop, the only witness is Hernandez himself, who was called in and examined as a witness for D. R. Carroll, plaintiff, and testified that he did not know whether the sugar came from the plantation of Bancker or from that of plaintiff, and that he sold it on its receipt, as he sold other crops. On the trial of the rule, which was afterwards discontinued, the counsel for Hernandez admitted, "for the purpose of this rule, but not as a matter of fact, that the sugar received from Mr. Bancker by Mr. Hernandez was received by him on the days on which it was shown to have been sold, and that such date was the date of shipment from Mr. Bancker's plantation."

ON THE MERITS.

Plaintiff has not argued that the 15 days had not elapsed after the removal of the crop. That fact is referred to in his brief in the following terms: "While it is true that plaintiff did not assert his rights within fifteen days after the removal of the cane from the plantation, it is likewise true that when he did assert his rights it was not by the application of the conservatory writ of provisional seizure." The question for solution is whether a lessor can recover the lessor's privilege, 15 days after removal, on sugar and molasses consigned by the planter, in due course of business, to his merchant, to whom he is indebted for more than the amount of his crop. The plaintiff contends that the second section of Act 66 of 1874 provides for the shipment of the crop by the farmer, and the right of the consignee to sell the property and to appropriate the proceeds of the sale to payment of amount due for such advances as may have been made thereon, but that the effect of the section is therein limited "so that nothing shall be construed so as to defeat or lessen the privileges of the laborers and landlord in this state for wages and rent by lien," and in argument directs attention to the fact that the act of 1874 was amended in 1882 by extending the reservation, so that the removal of the property and its consignment to the merchant would not have the effect of defeating or lessening "any other valid existing privilege or lien." Act 44 of the Acts of 1882, p. 56. These statutes have not added to the security of the lessor, nor have they repealed article 2709 of the Civil Code. "In the exercise of this right the lessor may seize the objects which are subject to it before the lessee takes them away, or within 15 days after they are taken away, if they continue to be the property of the lessee, and can be identified."

The effect of removal of property subject to the lessor's lien has received consideration in a number of decisions. In Denistoun v. Malard, 2 La. Ann. 14, relied upon in support of the proposition that the privilege held after the 15 days have elapsed since the removal of the property, the court held that those who opposed the lessor's lien could not place themselves in a better position by fraudulently removing the goods beyond the landlord's reach and frustrating search. The goods had been clandestinely removed in the nighttime by one who was not a purchaser in good faith. The plaintiffs, by supplemental petition, made the purchasers parties to the suit, and charged that the assignment was a fraudulent preference to deprive them of the landlord's lien. The court decided that it was a fraudulent preference by an insolvent debtor, and that there was, besides, a breach of good faith towards the landlord, and a violation of his rights in the removal of the goods, and that the object of the removal was to defeat the lien. There is marked dissimilarity between that case and the case at bar. The latter is not revocatory action. It is not alleged that the defendant is insolvent. It is not proven that the party "with whom the debtor contracted was in fraud as well as the debtor." Civil Code, art. 1982. In Desban v. Pickett, 16 La. Ann. 350, it was decided, on the authority of article 2709 of the Civil Code, that the lessor's right of privilege for the payment of rent on the movable effects of the lessee was extinguished by the removal and sale of the effects of the lessee for a valuable consideration, although 15 days between the removal by the lessee and the seizure by the lessor had not expired. Similar conclusion was reached in Hotel Co. v. Tarbox, 23 La. Ann. 715. In Washburn v. Frank, 31 La. Ann. 427, the testimony proved that the property was removed to defraud the lessor, and that a simulated sale was made to defeat the privilege. If the plaintiff had proven the allegations of fraud, these decisions would apply, and our conclusion would be different. Without any evidence of fraud the court will not order an amount realized on a crop openly manufactured, and placed on the market to be paid by the pledgee to the lessor, who remained inactive until several days after the sale. Reverting to the decisions quoted, why would the court dwell upon the issue of fraud, and decide it, if the landlord's privilege is not limited to 15 days after removal? With or without fraud, it would be subject to the privilege, and there would be no necessity to prove it in order to recover. The consignment of the crop cannot have the effect of defeating or lessening "any other valid or existing privilege or lien." The sale was made, and the proceeds credited, before any rights were asserted. This presents the insurmountable difficulty to the recovery of plaintiff's claim. The sale of this crop was not made pendente lite, in so far as Hernandez is concerned. If it be conceded that the mere notice given on the 3d of December was sufficient to bring the property within the grasp of the law, although no copy of petition nor citation were served on the merchant,—only a notice of a writ issued as against Bancker,—it is made manifest by the uncontradicted testimony of the only two witnesses who testified with reference to that matter that the crop from the Carroll place had been sold before this notice was given, and at least four months before Hernandez was cited. The writ of sequestration issued in the usual form in a suit by plaintiff against his lessee. In executing the writ, the notice given to a third person will not make him a party to the suit, and compel him to deliver the proceeds of property properly sold, and for which he contended he held a superior claim. The plaintiff earnestly contends that the lessor's privilege is to be construed as in the seizure of property by the sheriff on which the lessor has a privilege. That officer holds the property or the proceeds of its sales subject to the legal rights of the creditors. It is, in that case, the possession of the law for the protection of their rights. It is not in commerce to the detriment of the creditors, but is held that their rights may be determined. In any case a privilege is lost if the property can no longer be identified. When, in due course of business, property is sold, and the proceeds are applied to the payment of a pledge to a creditor, without objection, after the 15 days succeeding its removal, articles 2709 of the Civil Code, and 288, Code of Practice, apply.

When the case was tried on its merits the following entry was made: "Counsel also offers and introduces in evidence the testimony of Chas. H. Hernandez, taken in this suit in open court on January 21st, 1887," i. e., the testimony received on the trial of the discontinued rule. We have not given any effect to this admission, for the reason that it was part of the evidence on a rule discontinued. An admission is not reproduced when the testimony of a party to the suit is offered and admitted without any reference to the admission of counsel on the trial of a previously discontinued rule. The offer of the testimony of a witness taken in another case does not carry with it an admission by counsel of record. It was not the evidence of the defendant in rule that was admitted, but his testimony as a witness. "The testimony is a species of evidence by means of witness." The broader term "evidence" includes that which is given by witnesses, or offered by documents. If the admission on rule were before the court, what would it prove? That for the purpose of the trial of the rule, not as a matter of fact, "the sugar was shipped from Bancker plantation the day it was received and sold by Hernandez." The admission must be given effect as a whole, and which amounts to the following: That not as a matter of fact, but for the purpose of the trial of the rule, sugar was shipped, etc. This does not conflict with the testimony of the uncontradicted witness that the crop was removed from the plaintiff's place more than 15 days before it was shipped to the merchant. The plaintiff's privilege was lost.

On application for rehearing by plaintiff on oral argument, the case having been considered, the previous decree of this court may be set aside, and the case decided without granting a rehearing. It is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that our former decree be set aside, and that the judgment of the district court appealed from is affirmed, at appellant's costs.

WATKINS, J., (dissenting.) This case presents a controversy between Carroll, as the lessor of Bancker, and Hernandez as the factor; and as the proceeds realized from the products raised on the leased premises are insufficient to pay both, the question for decision is whether the former is entitled to preference in receiving payment therefrom over the latter. Bancker shipped his entire crops of sugar and molasses to Hernandez for sale, and when sold, they realized $1,845.14. Sales of products were made antecedent to the institution and service of this suit, but notification thereof was not given to Bancker until afterwards. At date of suit Carroll's rent was due, but the supply account of Hernandez was not; therefore, when suit was filed, no application of the proceeds had been made, or could have been made, by Hernandez; but same were in his hands, as the factor and agent of Bancker, his customer. Hernandez's claim and pretension are that he had applied the proceeds to his supply account, though subsequent to his being notified of Carroll's suit, and, confessedly, before his account was due. Hernandez has no legal right to thus appropriate to himself the identical thing which is involved in Carroll's suit, pendente lite. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2543; Act No. 4 of 1878. Hernandez's relation to the proceeds in his hands was that of factor of Bancker. Lallande v. His Creditors, 42 La. Ann. 705, 7 South. Rep. 895. We must therefore deal with the proceeds in his hands in the precise situation they were at the date Carroll served Hernandez with notice. Now, what was that situation? On the 9th of June, 1886, Bancker executed an act of pledge in favor of Hernandez upon the crops to be grown on the plantation he had leased from Carroll, knowledge of which Hernandez confessed in the act. In that act Bancker contracted to ship the crops to Hernandez, and authorized him to sell the same and apply the proceeds to his account. This act was drawn in pursuance of the terms of the act of 1874, which confers upon the factor a right of pledge subordinate to the lien of the lessor under the provisions of the Civil Code, for that statute declares that nothing therein "shall be so construed as to defeat or lessen the privilege of the landlord for rent." Hence it is clear that the stipulations of the act were binding on the parties, but not on Carroll, the lessor; the pledge of the act being subordinate to the privilege conferred by the law on the landlord for rent of land. Therefore the question is, can the lessor's lien be defeated by a removal of the crops from the leased premises by the lessee, their shipment to his factor, and his conversion of them into proceeds?

1. Claiming the right to apply the proceeds to his account against Bancker by reason of the pledge he acquired under the act of 1874, Hernandez seeks "to defeat or lessen the privilege of [Carroll] the landlord, for rent," in direct violation of its express prohibition. Notwithstanding the Code of Practice declares that the lessor's lien may be enforced against the objects affected by it "in the hands of third persons" within 15 days after removal from the leased premises, it does not declare that same cannot be seized after the lapse of 15 days if same continue to be the property of the lessee, notwithstanding their removal from the leased premises. Surely such would be an absurd declaration for the Code to make, because the property of an ordinary debtor may be seized, anywhere it is found, under ordinary process; and it is not readily perceived why the law should place the lessor at so great a disadvantage as this suggestion would imply. Hernandez does not possess the products or their proceeds as owner, but as the factor of Bancker, his customer. Lallande v. His Creditors, 42 La. Ann. 705, 7 South. Rep. 895. At the date of service Hernandez had not applied them to his account, and he was not permitted to do so afterwards. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2543. Bancker's indebtedness was not then due. Hernandez was not a third person in respect to Carroll or Bancker; and Hernandez cannot interpose his possession as factor with any greater show of success than Bancker could against the demands of Carroll, his lessor. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2709; Code Prac. art. 288. Whatever judicial opinion may have prevailed in respect to the provisions of the Codes, it is certainly true that Hernandez cannot claim any precedence over Carroll, under the prohibitive terms of the statute on which he founds his right. It is of no importance to inquire whether 15 days had elapsed or not, for the act declares that its provisions shall not be so construed as to defeat or lessen the privilege of the landlord for rent of land. Whatever may be the measure of protection accorded to third persons and bona fide purchasers by the provisions of the Codes, it is quite certain that the act of 1874 accords none to the factor over the lessor's lien for rent. Hernandez cannot escape the prohibition of the act. It was not in the power of Hernandez and Bancker, by any covenant of theirs, to defeat or lessen Carroll's lien for rent, neither by the pledge of the crops, their shipment, sale, nor application of their proceeds, all alike coming under the effect of the prohibition of the statute. Hernandez's conversion of the products into proceeds which remained in his hands as factor of Bancker, did not impair Carroll's right. In my opinion, Dennistoun v. Malard, 2 La. Ann. 14, is applicable to the question at bar. It appears that the plaintiff leased a small shop to Malard, who, being in insolvent circumstances, made a sale of his stock to certain of his creditors, without paying his rent. The court say: "We entirely agree with the judge of the lower court in the conclusion to which he came, both that the assignment was a fraudulent preference by an insolvent debtor, and that there was, besides, a breach of good faith towards the landlord, and a violation of his rights, in the removal of the goods. We consider the court below was justified in the opinion that the agent of the [creditors of the lessee] was aware that the lessor had not been paid, and that the object of the removal was to defeat [the lessor's] lien. It is said that the lien was gone, because it was not exercised within the fifteen days, by a levy on the property. * * * It is clear that the landlord's lien is superior to that of the vendor who has made delivery, and it cannot be contended that [the creditors of the lessee] could place themselves in a better position by fraudulently removing the goods beyond the landlord's reach, and frustrating his search. To recognize such a doctrine would be to say that a party could, by his own wrong, place a fair creditor in duriori causa." While it is true that Hernandez did not possess himself of the crop of Bancker fraudulently, but through the instrumentality of his contract of pledge, he is none the less attempting to breach the contract rights of Carroll, the lessor of Bancker, by appropriating their proceeds, in direct violation of the statute. Hernandez knew of Carroll's lease to Bancker, as it was mentioned in the act of pledge to him. He must have known that Carroll's rent had not been paid, as the total proceeds of Bancker's crops are in his hands. It is manifest that in thus attempting to impute said proceeds to his own account Hernandez sought to defeat the claim of Carroll for rent, in spite of the act of 1874, and as this court said Malard and his creditors could not do. It was of no consequence that the 15-day limit had expired. Hernandez does not possess as owner, and is not, in any sense, a third person. He was in duty bound to abide, as a faithful agent and custodian, the prohibition of the statute, and deal fairly by the landlord, of whose rights he was advised.

2. Hernandez founds his right of detention of the proceeds exclusively on his contract of pledge under the planter's act of 1874. That act confers only the right of pledge, for it says "that, in addition to the privilege now conferred by law, any planter or farmer may pledge his growing crops of cotton, sugar, or other agricultural products for advances of money, goods, and necessary supplies, * * * which recorded contract shall give and confer on the merchant or other persons advancing money, goods, and necessary supplies for the production of said agricultural products a right of pledge upon the crops," etc. Section 1, Act 66 of 1874. It confers no lien or privilege whatever. This pledge is, in turn, subordinate to the lessor's lien under existing laws, for it says: "Nothing herein shall be so construed as to lessen or defeat the privilege of the laborers and landlords in this state for wages and rent, as now existing by law." Id. § 2. What, then, is the lien which the law then existing conferred on a lessor? The Civil Code declares it to be a privilege on the crops of the year. Rev. Civil Code, art. 3217. But, in addition to this privilege, the law declares that the lessor has "for the payment of his rent," etc., a right of pledge on the movable effects of the lessee, etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2705. "Privilege" and "pledge" are totally different things, for the Code says: "'Privilege' is a right the nature of a debt gives to a creditor, and enables him to be preferred before other creditors, even those who have mortgages," (Rev. Civil Code, art. 3188;) "but a 'pledge' is a contract, by which a debtor gives something to his creditor as a security for his debts." Rev. Civil Code, art. 3133. Therefore the effect of the act of 1874 on the farmer was to authorize him to pledge in advance a growing crop to his factor for future advances, and to remove them from his plantation to ship same to said factor for sale, although the plantation be one the farmer has leased. To this extent the statute enables the planter to impair or lessen the landlord's right of pledge, just as an ordinary creditor of the lessee might do by effecting a seizure under a fi. fa., and making sale of crops pledged to a lessor. To this extent the provisions of the Civil Code are amended by implication. But the statute does not enable a planter or factor to defeat or lessen the landlord's lien on the crops or their proceeds. The right of any ordinary creditor to seize and sell crops that are stricken with a lessor's pledge, and convert them into proceeds, and thus relegate the landlord to the assertion of his lien thereon by way of this opposition, is "every-day practice," and it is sustained by numerous authorities. On this question it is only necessary for me to cite the case of Pickens v. Webster, 31 La. Ann. 870, wherein all adjudicated cases were collated and compared, and in which the court with deliberation held and affirmed the correctness of this doctrine. The interpretation which our original opinion places upon the act of 1874 rests upon the same foundation as those authorities do. The true conception of the legislature in adopting that statute appears to have been to enable the planter, under the exceptional circumstances stated therein, to ship his crops to market, and his factor to sell same and convert them into proceeds; but in so doing it did not intend to authorize either "to defeat or lessen the landlord's lien for rent." Under the provisions of this act the landlord's rights and remedies are precisely the same as though the crops had been seized and sold under fi. fa. and the proceeds placed in the custody of the sheriff. In lieu of such legal custody the act of 1874 supplies the trust of the factor. In no case or event does either a lien or right of pledge prevent a sale of the thing pledged or affected thereby, for the Code says: "The pledgee acquires the right of possessing and retaining the movable which he has received in pledge as a security for his debt, and may cause it to be sold." Rev. Civil Code, arts. 3165, 3220. These are the articles which authorize an ordinary creditor to seize and sell pledged goods and effects, as the act of 1874 does the factor of the lessee; and thereby the creditor's lien on the thing in each case is not extinguished, but transferred to the proceeds, which may be distributed ratably and in concursu. In construing these provisions the court said, in Robinson v. Staples, 5 La. Ann. 712, that "article 2675 [the present article being 2705 of the revised edition] of the Civil Code declares that the lessor has, for the payment of his rent and other obligations of the lease, a right of pledge on the movable effects of the lessee. * * * The right to levy a provisional seizure, even before the rent be due, is given by the statute of 1839 to the lessor who has reason to believe that his tenant is about to remove his property. We do not consider this statute as creating the privilege, but as providing a conservative remedy for its enforcement. It is not, therefore, well argued by plaintiffs' counsel that the lessors cannot have their privilege in this case, because they did not make a provisional seizure under the statute." In that case the landlord's lien was recognized and enforced on the proceeds in the sheriff's hands, and, under the statute of 1874, Carroll is equally entitled to take them from Hernandez.

3. In my opinion, the 15-day limit fixed in the Civil Code exclusively relates to the pledge of the landlord, and not to his lien and privilege for rent. It says: "The lessor has, for the payment of his rent and other obligations of the lease, a right of pledge on the movable effects of the lessee which are found on the premises leased." Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2705, (2675.) In a subsequent article, in the same connection and chapter, it says: "In the exercise of this right the lessor may seize the objects which are subject to it before the lessee takes them away, or within fifteen days after they are taken away, if they continue to be the property of the lessee, and can be identified." Rev. Civil Code, art. 2709, (2679.) The words of this last article, to-wit, "in the exercise of this right," clearly refer to "the right of pledge," mentioned in the former article. The lessor's privilege is not mentioned anywhere in the title "of lease" in the Code. The gravamen of said two articles is that the right of pledge may be exercised within 15 days if the property continues to be that of the lessee, which, under those articles, is a sine qua non. Those articles confer no right of enforcing this conservative remedy against goods which have been alienated by the lessee. This is the law of pledge. It is the Code of Practice which confers on the lessor the right to provisionally seize the goods of a lessee in the hands of a third person within 15 days. That is a method of procedure in the enforcement of the lien of the lessor, and not a matter of law. That such is the case, the decisions that are quoted in the present opinion of the court will attest, for in Desban v. Pickett, 16 La. Ann. 350, the court said: "The right of seizure after removal is made to depend upon the continued ownership of the lessee." The same is true of the case of Hotel Co. v. Tarbox, 23 La. Ann. 715, in which the court said: "In this case the evidence shows that the furniture claimed by the intervenors had ceased to belong to the lessee;" citing Desban v. Pickett. According to my reading of those two cases, there is nothing therein to indicate that seizures were made after the lapse of 15 days, and hence there could have been nothing decided therein in reference to the extinction of the lessor's lien on that account. Those cases turned exclusively on the fact of sale having been made by the lessee, and, as it is not pretended that Bancker has disposed of the proceeds of his crops to any one, those decisions do not apply to the case at bar against the lessee's agent. How can a mere failure to exercise a remedy provided by the Code of Practice, which is merely permissive,—"may seize, even in the hands of third persons," says Code of Practice, art. 288,—extinguish a privilege which the nature of the debt confers upon the lessor? Surely, the debt itself is not thus extinguished, and the effects which are stricken with a lessor's lien may be removed before the debt falls due. If it be true, as the court decided in Dennistoun v. Malard, that a lessor's lien could be successfully asserted against movable property after the expiration of 15 days, because it had been fraudulently removed; if it be true, as the court held in Pickens v. Webster, that an ordinary creditor can break the lessor's pledge by a seizure under fi. fa., and relegate the lessor to the proceeds; if it be true, as the court held in Robinson v. Staples, that the Civil Code, art. 2705, does not confer a privilege, but a right of pledge, only, as a conservative remedy for the enforcement of a privilege,—what becomes of the theory that the property affected with a lien must be seized within 15 days, or it is lost? But those decisions are in perfect keeping with the Civil Code, which declares, viz.: "Privileges become extinct (1) by the extinction of the thing subject to the privilege; (2) by the creditor acquiring the thing subject to it; (3) by the extinction of the debt which gave birth to it; (4) by the prescription [of the debt.]" Rev. Civil Code, art. 3277. Unless a sale be considered the extinction of a thing stricken with the lessor's lien and right of pledge, the lien of Carroll has not yet become extinct. If that be true, however, then all those cases were necessarily decided wrong. That principle which, in those cases, the courts decided as a matter of jurisprudence, was, in the act of 1874, consecrated as matter of law, viz., that its provisions should not be so construed as to defeat or lessen the lien of the landlord for rent. It is that principle which, in my opinion, the present decision of the court sets at naught.

4. But conceding, for the argument, that all of the foregoing propositions are not well-grounded in law, and that the failure of the landlord to assert his privilege on Bancker's crops within the 15-day limit was fatal to his claim, let me examine and see how the case stands in point of fact. The contention of Hernandez's counsel is that the evidence shows that the crops of Bancker, grown on the premises he leased from Carroll, had been removed more than 15 days when Carroll's suit was filed. The statements of Bancker in some respects give color to this contention; but the admission of Hernandez (the purport of which is given in the original opinion) negatives its effect, and it is binding on him.

(a) Counsel for Hernandez denies the force and correctness of his alleged admission; and he also denies that such admission was offered and filed in evidence on the trial of the merits of the cause. The present opinion of the court accedes to this view; and as the only fair way of reconciling conflicting statements of fact is to refer to the transcript, I will submit to that test the accuracy of the statement contained in the original opinion of the court. On the 21st of January, 1877, certain testimony and notes of evidence "were taken by E. M. Brewer, stenographer, in behalf of Carroll, plaintiff in rule, in presence of H. L. Edwards, counsel for plaintiff, and Charles S. Rice, counsel for defendant. The notes of evidence show that "Mr. Charles Hernandez," witness, was "called on behalf of plaintiff in rule," and was duly sworn on "direct examination." Same witness was cross-examined. At the conclusion of that witness' cross-examination, on page 13 of the transcript, is to be found the following admission, viz.: "For the purpose of this rule, but not as matter of fact, it is admitted that the sugar received from Mr. Bancker by Mr. Hernandez was received by him on the days on which it was shown to have been sold, and that such date was the date of shipment from Mr. Bancker's plantations." Then follows immediately this phrase: "Mr. Hernandez, recalled. By Mr. Edwards." All of this transpired on the 21st of January, 1887, on the trial of plaintiff's rule; and on the 17th of June, 1890,—just two days prior to the date of the judgment that is appealed from,—the following occurred, viz.: "Counsel offers and introduces in evidence, on behalf of Charles Hernandez, the account marked 'A,' with reference to his evidence. * * * Also offers and introduces in evidence the testimony of Charles Hernandez, taken in this suit in open court on January 21st, 1887. Both sides closed." The foregoing is an exact reproduction of extracts from the transcript, and I candidly and confidently submit that said admission formed part of the defendant's evidence on the trial of the rule. It is physically incorporated in it, and, as such, appears in the transcript. On the trial of the merits of this case the testimony of Hernandez, taken on the trial of the rule, was offered and filed in evidence on his behalf, though the rule has been discontinued. This is shown by reference to name, date, and case; and across the face of the evidence is plainly written this indorsement, viz., "Filed June 17th, 1890;" corresponding with the minute entry quoted above. If there is any escape from the conclusion that said admission was offered and filed in evidence on the trial of the merits, I am at a loss to discover where it is.

(b) But learned counsel is pleased to submit that the so-called "admission" was, in point of fact, no admission at all; and, with apparent seriousness, immediately quotes statements selected from the brief of plaintiff's counsel as completely binding on him. That an admission of defendant's counsel made in open court, in the presence of his client, then on the witness stand, incorporated in his written testimony, and brought up in the transcript, unaccompanied by any statement of error, does not bind the defendant, while a statement of fact, volunteered by counsel for plaintiff in his brief, is conclusive on his client; that the declaration that because an admission of record is prefaced by the words, viz., "For the purpose of this rule, but not as a matter of fact, it is admitted," etc., it is not the admission of any fact, — are propositions I can neither appreciate nor argue.

(c) But further conceding, for the argument, that all we have said is unfounded, and how does the case stand on the evidence of Hernandez and Bancker? Let us see. Bancker testified as follows, viz.: "Question. How many days are occupied from the time the cane is laid down at the sugar-house until the sugar is ready for shipment, — necessarily occupied in the manufacture of sugar before it is ready for shipment? Answer. From seven to nineteen days." This is from his direct examination in behalf of Hernandez. Again: "Question. When did you ship this sugar you made on Carroll's place to Hernandez? You testified that the last shipment was off the Bancker place. Now, I wish you would fix the date of the last shipment you made of sugar made from the cane raised on the Carroll place. Answer. From the 9th to the 24th of November." Again: "Question. How, then, could you, by looking at the account, distinguish it from the molasses made on the Bancker place? Answer. For the reason that I shipped all the sugar and molasses from the Carroll place before I ground the cane on the Bancker place. Q. When was the first shipment made from the Bancker place? A. Made on the 29th of November." Again, (on cross-examination, he said:) "Question. From the time the sugar left, on the 29th and 30th, to the 3d of December, it was not fifteen days? Answer. No, sir. * * * By Mr. Rice: Q. All the sugar on the 29th and 30th and thereafter, was from Mrs. Bancker's plantation? A. Yes, sir." Inasmuch as from seven to nineteen days are required for the manufacture of sugar ready for shipment, and from the fact that the last shipment of sugar and molasses from the Carroll place was made between the 9th and 24th of November, it does not affirmatively appear that any part of same was either manufactured off the Carroll place or shipped therefrom more than 15 days prior to the institution of this suit on the 3d of December, 1886. But, inasmuch as Bancker admits that the first shipment from his wife's plantation was made on the 29th of November, it is thereby tacitly admitted that all sales antecedent to the 30th of November were made of the crop raised on the Carroll plantation. The burden of proof being on Hernandez, it was his duty to have made out this defense clearly and satisfactorily. When interrogated on this question, he said: "Question. Did you receive any sugar from the plantation owned by Mr. Carroll from the parish of St. Martin, leased by George W. Bancker, during any day within fifteen days dating from the 3d of December? Answer. I would have to refer to my books to be able to answer that question, though my account will show it." Recurring to Hernandez's account, to be found on pages 60 and 62 of the transcript, and we find and extract therefrom the following data, to-wit:

"	26.	" 12 " "		120 24
"	26.	" 6 hogsheads of sugar..		182 88
"	27.	" 10 " "		302 47
"	27.	" 6 barrels of molasses..		71 53
"	29.	" 9 hogsheads of sugar..		220 91
		Aggregate value.....		$1,028 01

This is the identical amount that is stated in the original opinion to be "the net amount realized from crops which were shipped from the Carroll place, within fifteen days previous to the institution of this suit and notification to plaintiff's writ to Hernandez, and the sheriff's demand on him for the crops or their proceeds." It was on that evidence that our original opinion proceeds, though it was not therein reproduced, as it now is. I respectfully submit that, whatever may be said on the question of law in reference to that part of the crops that was shipped antecedent to the 15-day limit, Carroll is at least entitled to judgment for $1,028.01 as the amount of proceeds of that part of the crops that was shipped from his plantation within said limit. I therefore adhere to the views expressed in the original opinion of the court, and dissent from those expressed in the present opinion of the court.

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—REVIEW.

In the exercise of the supervisory jurisdiction over inferior tribunals this court will not investigate the intrinsic merits of a controversy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of De Soto; W. P. HALL, Judge. Writ denied.

Application by Charles Canion for a writ of prohibition.

Wm. Goss, for relator. W. P. Hall, in pro. per.

MCENERY, J. The defendant was indicted for violating a labor contract, under Act 138 of 1890. He moved to quash the indictment for several reasons. The motion was dissolved. He now applies for a writ of prohibition to arrest further proceedings in the case. It is not denied that the court had jurisdiction of the case. No irregularity is shown in the progress of the trial. It is elementary that in the exercise of supervisory jurisdiction over inferior tribunals the intrinsic merits of the case will not be investigated. It is therefore ordered that the relief prayed for by relator be denied, and that the rule granted herein be discharged.

LEVEE TAXES—ASSESSMENT AND LEVY—POWER OF POLICE JURY.

Act 33 of 1879 constituted Bossier parish a sublevee district, and authorized the police jury to discharge the duties of levee commissioners. Under this authority it levied a tax of 10 mills for the erection and repairs of levees. Held, that this power was withdrawn from the police jury by the adoption of the constitution of 1879, and has never been restored to it, with the exception of the power to repair and protect completed levees; that article 214 of the constitution did not authorize the police jury of Bossier to levy the tax, as the police jury could not act as a board of levee commissioners.

Appeal from district court, parish of Bossier; J. T. BOONE, Judge. Reversed.

Suit by S. J. Zeigler against A. R. Thompson, sheriff, and ex officio tax collector, for an injunction. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Land & Land, for appellant. J. A. W. Lowry, Dist. Atty., for appellee.

MCENERY, J. Act No. 33 of 1879 established certain levee districts in the state. The parish of Bossier was not put in any district, but the act provided that it should be a subdistrict, and that the police jury should discharge the duties incumbent upon the levee commissioners in the districts established by the act. The police jury in the several districts were charged with the care and preservation of completed levees. Under Act 33 of 1879, the police jury of Bossier parish levied a tax of 10 mills for the year 1890 on the property situated in the alluvial portion of said parish, to construct and repair levees. Real and personal property owned by the plaintiff was assessed and advertised for sale to enforce the collection of said tax. He enjoined the sale of his property, on the ground that the tax was illegal and unconstitutional, violating articles 209 and 214 of the constitution of 1879. Under Act 33 of 1879 police juries had no power to build levees. They were only intrusted with the care and the preservation of levees constructed by the state, and turned over to them. A fair construction of the act conferring upon the police jury of Bossier the duties of levee commissioners would confine these duties to the care and preservation of completed levees. In the case of Surget v. Chase, 33 La. Ann. 838, we said: "Previous to the legislation contained in Act No. 20 of 1866 and Act 115 of 1867, the police juries in this state were vested with all powers relating to public levees, but from that time to the date of the adoption of the constitution of 1879 this power was absolutely withdrawn from them, and was never restored to them, with the exception of the power to repair and protect completed levees. No greater power on the subject was conferred by Act 88 of 1880." And in the same case we said "that any legislation which would have attempted to confer on police juries the power to build public levees and to levy special taxes for the costs of building levees would be glaringly unconstitutional, and could not be enforced by the courts, unless the authority be found in articles 209 or 242, on which we express no opinion now." It is necessary that police juries exercising the taxing power should point to some authority to justify them in so doing. This levy is a special tax of 10 mills, under amended article 214 of the constitution of the state. This article authorizes the commissioners of the levee districts to levy the tax. It does not give the power to police juries. Police juries are subordinate political corporations of the state. Their duties and powers are specially limited by the constitution of 1879, and their powers cannot be enlarged beyond the limitations therein expressed. They cannot be made levee commissioners, because it would destroy their organization as police juries, and be conferring upon them a dual capacity, totally in violation of the spirit, if not the text, of the constitution. It was contemplated by article 214 of the constitution that levee districts should be distinct corporations, with special powers, entirely separate from the political corporations of the state. They are administered by commissioners, who have the power alone to levy the district tax, and who alone have the authority to build levees under legislative sanction. We do not intimate that the levee districts have such control of the levees as to exclude the paramount authority of the state, nor do we intimate that the legislature cannot make one parish a levee district under article 214 of the constitution. We therefore conclude that the police jury had no legal mandate to levy this tax, and that all its proceedings in attempting to levy and collect the same were without legal authority, and thereby unconstitutional, null, and void. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the lower court be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now ordered that the ordinance of the police jury of Bossier parish levying a special tax on the property situated in the alluvial portion of said parish be declared unconstitutional, null, and void, and that the defendant tax collector be perpetually enjoined from collecting said tax, and that he be condemned to pay the costs of both courts.

STATE v. SPILLMAN. (No. 308.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 22, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. The refusal of a continuance on the ground of an absent witness will not be interfered with, when the testimony does not touch the issue of guilt or innocence, but only goes to impeach the testimony of an expected witness for the state, who has not testified, may not testify, and, if testifying, may admit the facts charged against him.

2. The exclusion of testimony entirely foreign to the issues of the case, and offered to show the animus of opposing witnesses, will not be held as impairing the proceedings, when the possibility of injury therefrom is remote and insignificant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Caddo; A. W. O. HICKS, Judge. Affirmed.

Indictment of Humphrey Spillman for larceny. Defendant was convicted, and appeals.

John W. Jones, for appellant. J. Henry Shepherd, Dist. Atty., for the State.

FENNER, J. The appeal stands on two bills of exceptions. The first is taken to the refusal of the judge to grant a continuance grounded on the absence of a witness by whom, the affidavit of defendant states, "he expects to prove, and can prove, that the witness Y. I. Dowden said to him, at different times, that he would compromise the suit, and not appear and prosecute the same, if he would pay him fifteen dollars; that he was the prosecutor in the case, and that he was mad at the time he made the arrest, and that if he would pay him fifteen dollars he would not appear before the grand jury to prosecute the case." The indictment was for larceny. It is manifest that such evidence does not bear on the material question of defendant's guilt or innocence. The utmost effect it could have would be to impeach the testimony of the state witness referred to. The same facts, if true, might have been proved by that witness himself. If questioned, he may have admitted them, which would have rendered the testimony of the absent witness superfluous. The record does not advise us whether the state witness referred to was questioned on the point, and what his answers were. We cannot interfere with the large discretion vested in the trial judge in refusing a continuance on such a ground, where the evidence of the absent witness does not touch the question of guilt or innocence, but only tends to impeach the testimony of another witness who had not yet testified, might never testify, or, if testifying, might admit the facts charged. If injury did result to defendant from the absence of his witness, it might have been made to appear on a motion for new trial.

The second exception arraigns the exclusion, by the judge, of evidence of a witness to the effect that he was arrested by two of the state witnesses while on the road in charge of a loaded wagon and team, and that they refused to allow him time to provide for the wagon and team, but brought him away, leaving them standing on the road. The evidence was offered to show the animus of the witnesses, and to weaken the effect of their evidence. The testimony is utterly foreign to the issues of the case, and the possibility of injury from its exclusion is too remote to demand consideration. People who arrest a man for stealing their property are not usually animated by very kind feelings towards him. Judgment affirmed.

Action by D. W. Pratt, tax collector, against J. J. Holmes. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Drew & Stewart, for appellant. Watkins & Watkins, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. The defendant is sued for a license tax for carrying on the occupation of broker. He answers, denying that he conducts a brokerage business. There is no issue suggested by the pleadings in any way involving the legality or constitutionality of the tax. There is only a question of fact at issue, whether or not the defendant conducts and carries on the business for which the license is demanded. Article 81 of the constitution as amended; State v. Frank 42 La. Ann. 225, 7 South. Rep. 674. The amount involved is less than $2,000. It is therefore ordered that the appeal be dismissed.

PLEDGE—POSSESSION BY ONE OF TWO PLEDGEES—RIGHTS OF PLEDGEES.

1. In case a single collateral is pledged by two separate and distinct contracts to two creditors, whose claims aggregate the value of the collateral, possession by one is a possession for the benefit of the other, and in this respect each is the agent of the other pro hac vice.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Caddo; S. L. TAYLOR, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Simon Levy, Jr., against William Winter. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Land & Land, for appellant. Wise & Herndon, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This is a suit for the recovery and restitution of certain sums of money the plaintiff claims to have paid the defendant in error under the circumstances related in his petition. A certain promissory note for the sum of $7,000, drawn to the order of and indorsed by S. N. Ford, and payable at a future date, was by the maker and indorser delivered to one Adolph Cahn as a collateral security for Ford's indebtedness to Cahn of something more than $3,500. Levy v. Ford, 41 La. Ann. 873, 6 South. Rep. 671. Subsequently Ford pledged this note, which was secured by special mortgage, to the present defendant, with Cahn's consent, thereby intending to secure, with the surplus in excess of Cahn's claim against Ford, certain indebtedness of W. P. Ford and S. N. Ford to him, and also the indorsement of S. N. Ford on the Borquin rent-notes that were antecedently pledged to said defendant. Levy v. Ford, supra. Cahn brought suit against Ford for the foreclosure of that mortgage, and joined Winter as a co-defendant, and prayed for judgment attributing the proceeds of sale to the payment of his debt by preference. To this prayer the defendants in that suit made no objection. Levy, the present plaintiff, intervened, and, denying Cahn's ownership of the mortgage collateral, alleged that he had an interest in having it adjudged that Winter be preferred to Cahn in the distribution of the proceeds, and he prayed judgment to that effect. In this court it was held that the question of preference in payment was one purely personal to Cahn and Winter, and with which Levy had nothing to do, and the demands of Levy were rejected. Cahn v. Ford, 42 La. Ann. 965, 8 South. Rep. 477. During the pendency of this suit the mortgaged property was sent to sale under a junior mortgage held by Levy, and it was purchased by him at the price of $12,500, of which he retained the sum of $7,000 and upwards, to meet taxes and prior incumbrances. Out of the remainder of this sum he paid Winter $1,547.75 on account of the indebtedness of W. P. and S. N. Ford, and the further sum of $1,558.37 on account of S. N. Ford's indorsement of the rent-notes. These are the sums plaintiff seeks to recover from Winter on the ground that they were paid in error of law and fact. The contention of plaintiff's counsel is that, because Winter surrendered to Cahn the custody and possession of the mortgage collateral for use in that suit, and whereby he was enabled to obtain judgment thereon, coupled with his failure to make any defense therein, he waived and lost whatever right or interest he had in the pledge of said note.

The plaintiff further urges the judgment and decree of the court in the aforesaid suit of Cahn v. Ford, supra, as forming res adjudicata as to the defenses set up by Winter here. These questions may be summarily disposed of. In Levy v. Ford, supra, all of these questions are gone into and decided in respect to Winter, and those affecting Cahn were gone into and decided in Cahn v. Ford, supra. The questions settled by those two decisions in this respect were that Ford first pledged the $7,000 mortgage note to Cahn to secure an indebtedness of about $3,500, and subsequently, and with Cahn's consent, this note was also pledged to Winter for the surplus above Cahn's claim. This was most clearly and definitely understood and agreed upon by and between the three parties,—Ford, Cahn, and Winter. One note was, by two separate contracts, pledged to two different parties. It being payable to bearer, no formal written act of pledge was necessary or made. It was, under the circumstances, a matter immaterial whether the physical possession and actual custody of the pledge was in Cahn or Winter. They had a perfect right to hold and use it indifferently. The fact that when Cahn sued Ford and Winter the former called for and the latter furnished the note, to be filed as the evidence of this right of Cahn, is of no consequence to Levy. The suit of Cahn was founded on Ford's indebtedness to him, and the collateral note was employed and used only as an adjunct and accessory thereof. The judgment therein rendered did not extinguish the obligation of that note. Nothing but the seizure and sale of the mortgaged property, and the payment of the proceeds thereof to Cahn, did extinguish it, and then only pro tanto. Cahn and Winter had both a fixed interest in the collateral; and when, by means of judgment, seizure, and sale, and payment to Cahn of his debt, with interest and cost, his claim was extinguished, the right of Winter to demand and receive the residue became absolute and determinate. As the learned judge of the district court aptly phrases it: "Possession by one was a possession for the benefit of the other, and in this respect each was the agent of the other pro hac vice." We are of opinion that neither by that suit nor by its conduct or management were any of the rights of Winter in any manner affected. No right of his was impaired by the judgment and decree therein rendered; and same cannot be given the affect of res adjudicata. One pledgee may lawfully seize and sell effects pledged to another, without prejudice to the subordinate or alternative rights of the other on the pledge. Horner v. Dennis, 34 La. Ann. 389; Pickens v. Webster, 31 La. Ann. 875.

STATE v. JEFFERSON. (No. 296.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—APPEAL.

1. In case the proof shows that the accused was the aggressor in the affray which resulted in the homicide, proof of an attack made by the deceased upon the accused on the day previous thereto is inadmissible for the purpose of establishing the status of the accused as acting in his own right, or that he acted at the time of the homicide under the belief that he was in imminent danger of death or of great bodily harm.

2. The trial judge charged the jury that "it is incumbent on the state to prove the offense charged, or legally included in the indictment, to [their] satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt; and before they can convict the accused they must be satisfied from the evidence that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." He said, "A reasonable doubt, gentlemen, is not a mere possible doubt; it should be an actual or substantial doubt. It is such a doubt as a reasonable man would seriously entertain. It is a serious, sensible doubt, such as you could give a good reason for." This is a concise and absolutely correct exposition of the law as applicable to reasonable doubt.

3. The supreme court will not interfere with district judges in the manner of conducting their courts, or of enforcing rules of propriety and decorum on the officers of their courts.

4. It is not good ground for an application for a new trial that, in the course of his argument before the jury, the district attorney made use of improper remarks, unexcepted to at the time, which had the tendency to improperly influence the jury against the accused.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge. Affirmed.

Indictment of Seymour Jefferson for murder. Defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals.

W. F. Kernan, for appellant. J. Henry Shepherd, Dist. Atty., for the State.

WATKINS, J. The defendant was indicted for murder, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state penitentiary for seven years, and prosecutes this appeal therefrom on the several grounds enumerated in the record.

1. The first question presented for consideration is whether the trial judge erroneously excluded evidence offered for the purpose of showing that the deceased beat the defendant on the head with a large, heavy club, causing the blood to flow freely, and that this occurred on the evening antecedent to the homicide,—this testimony being offered for the purpose "of establishing the status of the accused as acting in his own right," and of showing that "at the time of the homicide he acted under the belief that he was in danger of death or grievous bodily harm, and that he had reasonable grounds for such belief." Counsel states in his printed argument that he did not offer this evidence for the purpose of justification in killing the deceased, but that it was offered for the purpose of establishing "the status of the accused as acting in his own right, and that, at the moment of killing, he had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, he was in danger of death, or of grievous bodily harm." This, in our opinion, is a distinction without a difference, for the only ground upon which such evidence could be admissible is that it justified the homicidal act; and it is a well-established rule that, in order that such testimony should be admissible, there must be satisfactory proof of an actual physical attack, or hostile demonstration, made by the deceased at the time of the homicide; for, if such were not the case, the accused could not reasonably believe he was in imminent danger of death or of great bodily harm. If there were a question as to whether the attack was made by the deceased or the accused in the fatal rencounter, it would be competent to show, by prior declarations of either party, that the attack made was the one he intended to make. It is likewise permissible to prove antecedent acts and declarations for the purpose of showing the quo animo, or of rebutting the charge of malice. Whart. Hom. 694, 695. But in this case it clearly appears that the accused was the attacking party, armed for the fray, and that he actually killed the deceased, while he was making an effort to arm himself for his defense. This being the situation of the parties, the proffered evidence of the attack made by the deceased on the defendant upon the evening previous was not competent. It constituted no part of the res gestæ. Instead of mitigating the crime, it would have had rather a tendency to aggravate it.

2. The second question in the case is whether the judge properly charged the jury on the question of a reasonable doubt. Defendant's counsel requested the court to charge the jury as follows, viz.: "The accused is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt is not a mere possible doubt; it should be an actual and substantial doubt, not mere possibility or speculation. The evidence should be so clear and conclusive as to satisfy your minds, to a moral certainty, that the accused is guilty of the crime charged; otherwise you should acquit." The court refused to give this charge as requested, but instead thereof charged the jury as follows, viz.: "It is incumbent on the state to prove the offense charged or legally included in the indictment to your satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt; and, before you can convict the accused, you must be satisfied from the evidence that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt, gentlemen, is not a mere possible doubt; it should be an actual or substantial doubt. It is such a doubt as a reasonable man would seriously entertain. It is a serious, sensible doubt, such as you could give a good reason for. It is not sufficient you should believe his guilt only probable. In fact, no degree of probability merely will authorize a conviction; but the evidence must be of such a character and tendency as to produce a moral certainty of the prisoner's guilt to the exclusion of reasonable doubt. The evidence should be such as to satisfy your minds to a certainty, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of the crime charged; otherwise you should acquit." The court adds: "The court charged verbatim all except the last sentence, and refused that on the ground that in the written charge in the record it had already charged the jury fully upon reasonable doubt, and substantially and almost in the same words of the said last sentence of said requested charge." In our opinion, the charge given by the judge was clear, concise, and exactly in keeping with the law on the subject. In the main, it follows the language contained in the defendant's requested special charge, and we cannot discover any well-grounded objection to it. On the contrary, it meets our unqualified approval.

3. The third question in the case is in reference to certain remarks made by the district attorney in the course of his argument before the jury, and to which defendant's counsel excepted, and reserved a bill of exceptions. The remark objected to was that "if jurors do not convict people who have been so clearly shown to be guilty as this defendant has been, in this case, you might as well tear down the court-house." This statement is a strong one, and one possibly unauthorized by the evidence; but we are not prepared to say the judge erred, in not directing the district attorney to withdraw it, or in not instructing the jury to disregard it altogether. The jury are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts given in evidence, and upon that evidence they must determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. The judge is prohibited from charging the jury on the facts in evidence. Had he denied the correctness of the statement of the district attorney, he might have been understood by the jury as expressing an opinion on the facts as favorable to the accused as that of the district attorney was unfavorable to him; and, in thus attempting to correct one error, committed another one. In State v. Garig, 43 La. Ann. 365, 8 South. Rep. 934, we gave full and exhaustive consideration to a similar question, and, after making a collation of pertinent authority, said: "So, in this case, had the judge acceded to the wishes of the prisoner's counsel, and permitted him to have made an explanation to the jury, in reference to the questioned statement of the district attorney, they might have received the impression that the judge conceded the correctness, and allowed such impression to have influenced their verdict." As we had occasion to say in State v. Duck, 35 La. Ann. 764, "this court cannot and will not interfere with district judges in the manner of controlling their courts, or enforcing rules of propriety and decorum on the officers of court," so we repeat here. We think the district judges can be safely intrusted with the proper control and management of their courts and the conduct of business therein. In the present instance we cannot say that the judge erroneously exercised his discretion.

4. The fourth ground of objection is that, on application for a new trial, the defendant's counsel was not permitted to prove that the district attorney had made, during the course of his argument, certain other prejudicial statements. The district judge assigned, as his reason for rejecting the evidence, that the defendant's counsel urged no objection to such statements at the time they were made, and reserved no bill of exceptions; and consequently same could furnish no ground for a new trial. In this ruling the judge did not err. If the defendant's counsel made no objection, and retained no exception, at the time such objected statement was made, we cannot perceive with what propriety same can be assigned as relievable error in an application for a new trial. This question does not come within the principle announced in State v. Selley, 41 La. Ann. 146, 6 South. Rep. 571. That case relates to a question of the admissibility of certain alleged dying declarations in evidence, and, in aid of the court in determining that question, it was held that the accused had the right to have the testimony reduced to writing, and annexed to a bill of exceptions. Here the question is whether an isolated and independent fact, altogether disconnected from the evidence, and to the accomplishment of which no objection was urged at the time, can be proven in support of an application for a new trial. There is no similitude between the two cases. There is no doubt of the fact that the strong and impassioned appeals of prosecuting officers often exercise strong influence over the minds of jurors, but it is the duty of the presiding judge to correct any such impression as they may make by a concise and emphatic charge, to which all right-minded jurors will listen, and act accordingly. We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

STATE v. OLIVER. (No. 309.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—THREATS.

1. When the question is one of a previous threat having been made by the accused against the deceased, it is perfectly competent for an isolated and complete sentence containing a threat to be given to the jury in evidence, notwithstanding the witness did not hear and could not relate the whole of the conversation on other subjects in the same conversation.

2. It is not competent for parol proof to be made of the purport and effect of the testimony of absentees from the state, who were present and testified on a former trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Webster; J. T. BOONE, Judge. Affirmed.

George Oliver was tried and convicted of murder, and appeals.

Watkins & Watkins, for appellant. J. A. W. Lowry and J. H. Shepherd, Dist. Attys., for the State.

WATKINS, J. The defendant is appellant from a conviction of the crime of murder without capital punishment, and a sentence to life-time imprisonment in the state penitentiary, relying on three bills of exception.

1. The first bill of exceptions relates to the alleged illegal reception on the part of the prosecution of proof of previous threats made by the accused against the deceased. The judge states that the witness said he heard the beginning of the conversation, and could repeat the substance of it. That he said that he left the parties standing together, but did not know what they said after he left them. That he further said "that Maria Roan walked up to where the accused and others were standing, and asked, 'Have you heard the lies George Sikes [deceased] told on his wife?' Defendant said, 'Yes,' and if he owned it to him to-day he would shoot the top of his head off." The objection urged by defendant's counsel was that the witness was not able to repeat the entire conversation, and that it was not competent for the court to admit an isolated phrase or part of a conversation; that the accused was entitled to have the whole of it, or to have the whole excluded from the jury. The objection is grounded on a general and well-recognized rule of evidence; but we are of opinion that the language quoted by the judge as the testimony of the witness constitutes a distinct threat, which was admissible; and that evidently was the sole object of the district attorney in introducing the evidence. It may be true that much more may have been said in the course of the conversation between the accused and the persons mentioned by Maria Roan, upon different topics, which she did not hear. That is immaterial. But, if more was said on the same subject, it was the duty of defendant's counsel to have introduced those other persons, and proved that fact, and not left it open to inference. We regard the testimony competent.

2. The second bill relates to the rejection of parol proof of the purport and substance of the testimony of certain absent witnesses, who, since the former trial of this cause, have permanently removed from the state. The objection urged to the competency of the proffered testimony is that it is hearsay evidence. While it is true that Greenleaf lays down the general proposition that the testimony of deceased persons given in a former trial between the same parties may be proven by other persons who were present, and who may testify from their recollection of what it was, and that the same author says "it is also receivable if the witness, though not dead, is out of the jurisdiction of the court, or cannot be found after diligent search, or is insane, or sick, and unable to testify," etc., (1 Greenl. Ev. § 163,) and that "in all cases when the party has, without fault or concurrence, irrevocably lost the power of producing the witness again, whether from physical or legal causes, he may offer the secondary evidence of what he testified in the former trial," (Id. § 168,) yet this rule—possibly a perfectly safe one in civil cases—cannot with propriety, in our opinion, be extended to criminal trials. We are aware of no case within the range of our jurisprudence in which this has been done. Mr. Bishop, after discussing the question very exhaustively, and citing a number of English cases and precedents, says: "This principle applies, not only to these formal depositions, but likewise to the evidence of what a witness testified to orally at a previous trial. It, moreover, provides, not only in civil cases, but in criminal, and in general, in the United States as well as in England. But the admission of the evidence is limited, or nearly so, to the case in which the witness is deceased, and in this case it is the general American doctrine to receive equally the deposition, taken as before mentioned, and evidence of the formal oral testimony. But when the witness is merely in another state, or otherwise beyond the power of the court, this is not sufficient. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. (2d Ed.) § 1098; Id. (3d Ed.) §§ 1194, 1195. We think this is the safe and conservative doctrine, and, while operating injuriously in exceptional cases, it will operate as a mutual safeguard to the state and accused persons generally. But it is proper to observe that this expression of opinion is limited to the sole question of the reproduction, by this means, of the parol evidence of absentees; and on this ground we approve of the judge's ruling as correct.

3. The third bill of exceptions relates to the judge's declination of the motion of the defendant for a new trial. As it relates exclusively to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the allowance vel non by the district judge of a new trial is a question that is addressed to his sound legal discretion, and with which this court cannot deal. Judgment affirmed.

TAXATION—EXEMPTION—MANUFACTURER OF LEATHER AND OF SHOES.

Action by A. G. Ricks & Co. against the board of assessors. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

Henry Renshaw and Carleton Hunt, City Attys., for appellants. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellees.

FENNER, J. The only question presented in the case is whether plaintiffs, as manufacturers of "shoe-uppers," are exempt from taxation under article 207 of the constitution, which exempts "capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of textile fabrics, leather, shoes, harness, saddlery," etc. Manufacturers of leather are exempt, and manufacturers of shoes are exempt. Plaintiffs do not pretend to manufacture the leather out of which their shoe-uppers are made, and therefore they clearly do not fall within that exception. Are they manufacturers of shoes? Obviously not. A shoe is ordinarily composed of uppers, soles, and heels, sewed or otherwise joined together in such manner as to constitute an article of apparel for the feet. A shoe-upper is no more a shoe than is a shoe-sole or shoe-heel. It is axiomatic that exemptions from taxation are strictly construed, but even extreme liberal construction could not bring plaintiff's business within the grasp of the provisions of article 207 of the constitution. Nothing short of a judicial amendment of the constitution could accomplish it. The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed and annulled, and it is now adjudged and decreed that there be judgment in favor of defendants rejecting plaintiffs' demand, at their cost in both courts.

STATE v. TAYLOR. (No. 10,897.)

INDICTMENT — MOTION TO QUASH — DEFECTS IN DRAWING JURY.

1. A motion, made at the same term of court in which the indictment was found, before arraignment, to quash the indictment for irregularities in drawing the jury, is seasonably made. In such a case the defendant could not file a motion on the first day of the term.

2. Defects in the drawing of the jury cannot be taken advantage of unless it appears that some fraud has been practiced, or some great wrong committed, in the drawing and summoning of the jury, that would work a great and irreparable injury to the defendant. Section 10, Act 44, of 1877.

3. This act refers to and embraces the irregularities committed by the commission. When a person not a jury commissioner intrudes upon their deliberations, and takes part in them, this will vitiate the proceedings, and the ventre drawn should be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Lafayette; ORTHER C. MOUTON, Judge. Affirmed.

Indictment of Willie Taylor for murder. The indictment was quashed, and the state appeals.

Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State. Joseph A. Chargois, Wm. Campbell, Crow Girard, and L. I. Tansey, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. The defendant was indicted for murder, and the indictment was returned and filed in court on the 8th October, 1891. On the next day—October 9th—the defendant was called for arraignment. His counsel objected, and asked for time in order to file a plea for the defense, if necessary. The motion was overruled. On the 14th October he filed a motion to quash the indictment for irregularities in the drawing of the jury which presented the indictment. For some of the irregularities the alleged indictment was quashed. The state has appealed. The attorney general urges that the motion was filed too late, and ought to have been filed in accordance with section 11 of Act 44 of 1877 on the first day of the term. In the case of State v. Sterling, 41 La. Ann. 680, 6 South. Rep. 583, we held that the state did not require impossibilities. The jury was drawn after the first day of the term, and the indictment presented at the same term of court. It was therefore impossible for the accused to file his objection to the irregularity of drawing of the jury on the first day of the term. He asked for time to prepare for his defense when arraigned on the day following the finding of the indictment. The motion was overruled. The judge assigned as his reasons therefor that if, after examining the indictment, the defendant desired to file any plea, he would permit him to withdraw his plea to the arraignment. The motion to quash was filed on the 14th October, of the same term, only six days after the defendant was indicted. He has brought himself within the exception which relieved him from filing his plea on the first day of the term. He filed the plea seasonably, as the defect did not appear upon the face of the papers or proceedings, and could only have been discovered after the first day of the term. If indicted at the same term of court for which the jury is drawn, the defendant can, before arraignment, at the same term file his objection to the irregularity in the drawing of the jury. State v. Williams, 30 La. Ann. 1028; State v. Vance, 31 La. Ann. 398; State v. Bradley, 32 La. Ann. 402; State v. Thompson, Id. 879; State v. Conway, 35 La. Ann. 350; State v. Strickland, 41 La. Ann. 514, 6 South. Rep. 471; State v. Sterling, 41 La. Ann. 679, 6 South. Rep. 583. In section 10, Act 44, of 1877, it is provided that no defect or irregularity in the drawing of the jury in the summoning of it shall be sufficient cause to set aside the venire unless it appears that some fraud has been practiced, or some great wrong committed, in the drawing of and the summoning of the jury. There were gross irregularities in drawing the jury. The clerk omitted to perform the duties specially assigned to him under the act, and the box was not of that kind, provided with lock and key, as the law directs. But these were irregularities only, and it is not shown that they were done for the purpose of injuring the defendant, or with any fraudulent intent, or that some great wrong had been done him. It is essential to show these facts in order to set aside the indictment for such irregularities as are alleged. The irregularities, however, embraced within the meaning of section 10 of Act 44 of 1877 refer to those committed by the jury commissioners. Where a person not a commissioner intrudes himself upon their deliberations, and does acts which it is their duty to perform, these acts are not those of the commissioners, but of one who has no authority to perform them, and are absolutely null and void. The record discloses the fact that one Gustave Lascoste was permitted to participate in the proceedings of the jury commission, and the name of one of the jurors was not written by any member of the commission, but by him. It is the duty of the clerk or a member of the jury commission to perform the official acts in the drawing of the jury assigned to him by Act 44 of 1877, and we again reiterate what we said in relation to his duties in the case of State v. Conway, 35 La. Ann. 350. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. CLAVERY. (No. 10,907.)

JONES v. LAKE, Sheriff, et al. (No. 304.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Oct. 28, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

MORTGAGE — FORECLOSURE SALE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER — INJUNCTION AGAINST JUDGMENT CREDITORS OF MORTGAGOR.

1. A purchaser of real property at sheriff's sale, made under fi. fa. in the foreclosure of a special mortgage, cannot acquire or take title to any other property than that coming within the description recited in the act of mortgage.

2. As against a seizing creditor of such purchaser's vendor, said purchaser, seeking to arrest the sale by injunction, on an allegation of his ownership as adjudicatee of the property seized, is in duty bound to make out his title by clear and indisputable written evidence.

3. In such an injunction suit neither the verity nor validity of the judgment is put at issue, and it is clearly incompetent for plaintiff to attack or question the right of the plaintiffs in execution in any other respect.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Caddo; S. L. TAYLOR, Judge. Reversed.

Petition by John R. Jones against John Lake, sheriff, and another, for an injunction. Judgment for petitioner. Defendants appeal.

R. J. Looney, for appellants. Wise & Herndon, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. Petitioner, alleging ownership and possession in good faith of the following described real property, viz., "all that portion of lot or block sixty-eight (68) of the city of Shreveport, north and east of Bosworth's boundary line, owned by Mrs. M. D. C. Cane in 1874;" and that he acquired the same at sheriff's sale made in 1886, in the foreclosure of a special mortgage executed by Mrs. Cane in favor of one Leavenworth in 1874; and that in the procès-verbal said property is described as "all of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's boundary line,"—enjoins the seizure and sale of the same under an execution issued under a judgment in the suit entitled "M. J. McCormick vs. M. D. C. Cane." He alleges the death of the plaintiff in execution, and represents that his heirs are Mrs. Anna B. Stockwill, Mrs. Williamina B. McCormick, and Mr. William B. McCormick; and he avers that Mrs. Stockwill has no interest in said judgment or execution, because she has long since conveyed her interest therein to S. B. McCutchen, who denies having authorized the issuance of said writ. He prays judgment for $500 general damages, and $250 attorney's fees, against Williamina B. and William B. McCormick in solido, and perpetuating his injunction. The two defendants named moved to strike from the petition the allegation in reference to the assignment by Mrs. Stockwill to McCutchen, and his denial of authority for the issuance of the writ of execution, on the ground that they are foreign to any legal investigation of this case; and no right or interest, as such, of McCutchen can be determined in this case, as the plaintiff must stand against the world on his own title; and, further, because neither Mrs. Stockwill nor McCutchen are made parties to this suit. This motion being overruled, the two defendants named filed an answer, in which they first plead a general denial, and then urge, as a special defense, that they caused to be seized, in the execution of their judgment, "a certain lot of ground in that portion of block sixty-eight (68) adjoining and to the north and north-east of the land sold by S. Bennett and Mrs. M. D. C. Cain to Geo. M. Nicholls, in April, 1848, and since said time has remained a separate and distinct portion of block sixty-eight, and is the property of Mrs. Cane, and that her title thereto has never been divested." Their answer then avers that plaintiff's petition and annexed documents disclose no grounds for this action; and it further avers that the execution enjoined runs in favor of Anna B. Stockwill as a co-heir of the two defendants named, and the injunction bond does not run in her favor. They pray the dissolution of the injunction, with $500 general damages, and $500 special damages awarded against the plaintiff. On these issues the parties went to trial, and there was judgment in plaintiff's favor perpetuating his injunction without damages.

1. It is our opinion that the defendants' motion to strike from the plaintiff's petition the allegations referring to the assignment of Mrs. Stockwill to McCutchen of her interest in the judgment, execution of which is enjoined, should have prevailed, because such an issue cannot be litigated in this suit. The controversy presented by the plaintiff, primarily, is title vel non of the property seized, and it is of no consequence to him what particular person is owner of the judgment under which same is seized. The injunction is directed against the seizure and sale of particularly described real property, and not against the judgment. This suit is only a third opposition coupled with an injunction. We cannot, in the present state of the case, remedy the error, otherwise than by declining to consider the averments referred to. The informality suggested in the injunction bond cannot be considered either, as there was no motion made to dissolve on that account filed in limine.

2. The controversy, being narrowed within proper limits, may be stated in this wise: The defendants seized the property claimed, among others, as that of Mrs. Cane, and the foundation of plaintiff's claim of ownership is the mortgage from Cane to Leavenworth, which he, as assignee, executed against the mortgaged property, and became the adjudicatee of same at execution sale. Hence the question at issue and to be determined is whether the plaintiff acquired title thereby to the particular property in dispute; and that must be ascertained by reference to the act of mortgage and sheriff's sale. If these fully and sufficiently describe the property to convey a title the plaintiff's injunction must be perpetuated, leaving the defendants to assert whatever adverse right they have in some other proceeding. The defendants were seeking, by an execution of a judgment via ordinaria, to collect a debt. There was no effort to enforce a mortgage. There is no claim of that kind set up in their answer. Plaintiff enjoined the sale of particular property, on the ground that he had acquired title from Mrs. Cane in the foreclosure of the Leavenworth mortgage. He can take nothing by this action other than that Mrs. Cane mortgaged to Leavenworth, for the plain reason that, in the confessed foreclosure of that mortgage, he could not cause to be seized and sold any property other than that which she had hypothecated to his assignor. Referring to the authentic act of mortgage from Cane to Leavenworth, we find the following is the description of the property which is therein hypothecated, viz.: "All that portion of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's east boundary, now owned by Mrs. M. D. C. Cane." The same description is contained in the fi. fa. under which sale was made to the plaintiff under judgment in the suit entitled "John R. Jones vs. Mrs. M. D. C. Cane." The advertisement thereof contained the same description, omitting the words, "now owned by Mrs. M. D. C. Cane." The judgment recognizing the mortgage, and ordering sale of the hypothecated property, recites the same description as that contained in the act of mortgage. The sheriff's procès-verbal of sale contains the same description. This is identically the same description as that contained and set out in the plaintiff's petition. The description of the property, as given in the advertisement of sale enjoined, is as follows, viz.: "Part of block sixty-eight, (68,) in the city of Shreveport, beginning at the north corner of lot sixteen, (16,) in block fifty-four, (54;) run thence, on a prolongation of the north-west boundary line of Spring street, along the Hamilton Oil-Mill line, to Cross bayou; thence, down the bayou, to a point from which a line parallel with the first-described line will strike the north corner of lot sixteen, (16,) in block fifty-five, (55;) thence along the north-west boundary line of block fifty-five, (55,) and the prolongation of the same, to the point of beginning,—containing about an acre and a half, fronting on Cross bayou on one side, and the Texas & Pacific Railroad on other." The question to be solved is whether the property claimed by the plaintiff is contained in the description of the property as advertised for sale. Then we must ascertain what is the property described in plaintiff's deed as "all that portion of block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's boundary line." There is nothing ambiguous or uncertain in this description. "Bosworth's boundary line" is a fixed and definite limit, and can be easily located; and hence "that portion of block sixty-eight (68) north and east" of that line is easily located. No one examining the map of the city of Shreveport could easily mistake its locality or the extent of its area. In their printed brief defendant's counsel aver that "they never contested plaintiff's title to that portion of block sixty-eight (68) covered by his deed, or by the mortgage of Leavenworth." Page 7. Reference to the maps in evidence discloses that block 68 fronts on Cross bayou on the north, is of an irregular frontage on that side, and extends on the south side nearly the entire width of three adjoining blocks. At one time this property was owned by Mrs. Cane and one Bennett, and they sold off a portion of it, situated in the center, in March, 1848, to George M. Nicholls. The description of the property sold is as follows, viz.: "The following piece of ground in the town of Shreveport, and known as a part of block No. sixty-eight, (68,) and described and bounded as follows, to-wit: Commencing at the corner of block No. 54, and corner of lot No. 9 of said block, it being the north-west corner of said lot and block, and running in a direct line as a continuation of the north-east boundary (line) of Market street, until said line reaches Cross bayou; and running down said bayou, until it reaches a line drawn from Cross bayou, parallel to the line first above described, and extending from the bayou to the north-west boundary line of block numbered fifty-four (54) in the prolongation of said line; thence, along said last line, to the starting point, so as to include within these boundaries two and five-eighths (2⅝) acres." By this conveyance, block 68 was completely severed, and subdivided into three distinct and separate lots, each one distinct and well-defined, as will appear from the De Voe map in evidence, the 2⅝-acre lot sold to Nicholls reaching across block 68, from the corner of lot No. 9, in block 54, to Cross bayou, and completely covering the intervening area. The portion of block 68 to the north and east of the Nicholls lot, which is the portion now in controversy, and precisely the same as that contained in the advertisement of the sale which is enjoined, is found to contain 1⅓ acres. That portion of block 68 to the west and south of the Nicholls lot was much larger than either of the other two lots, the distance from front to rear being greater. The portion sold to Nicholls was adjudicated to W. E. Hamilton by same description, in December, 1868, and thereon he erected and established his oil-mill plant, as indicated on the De Voe map. On the 7th of December, 1871, Mrs. Cane and Mrs. McCormick conveyed to A. W. Bosworth the following described lot, viz.: "Being a part of block sixty-eight (68) in said city, according to the original map, said lot or block sixty-eight (68) having been allotted to these vendors in the partition of the original Shreveport Town Company of record, and the land herein conveyed is that part of said block or lot sixty-eight (68) bounded as follows: By projecting the dividing line between lots eleven (11) and twelve (12) of block thirty-seven (37) to Cross bayou, running back on said projected line two hundred (200) feet; thence running a line eighty (80) feet in length perpendicular to said projected line, and parallel to the north-west front of said block thirty-seven, (37;) and thence running a line one hundred eighty-nine and one-half (189½) feet to Cross bayou; and thence along said bayou to the point where the projected line between lots eleven (11) and twelve (12) of block thirty-seven (37) strikes the said Cross bayou; and the property herein conveyed corresponds to lots twelve (12) and thirteen (13) of the proposed plan in future extension of a block between Market and Edwards streets and Cross bayou," as will be shown by the H. P. Leavenworth survey of November 27, 1871, shortly antecedent to this scale. Subsequently there was a partition between Mrs. Cane and Mrs. McCormick, and on the 16th of January, 1874, Mrs. Cane consented to the Leavenworth mortgage aforesaid, by the description given supra, to-wit: "All that portion of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's east boundary;" and not as stated in the plaintiff's petition, viz., "all of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's boundary line,"—the two decriptions being materially different. A full and complete description of the Bosworth purchase has been given, in order to show that the "Bosworth's east boundary" was a fixed and established line, by the Leavenworth survey of November 27, 1871, antecedent thereto; the surveyor becoming subsequently the mortgagee of Mrs. Cane, Bosworth's vendor. We have also given a full and complete description of the property Nicholls purchased from Cane and Bennett in 1848, for the purpose of showing what is meant by the "north-west boundary line of Spring street, along the Hamilton Oil-Mill line," which occurs in the advertisement of the enjoined sale; and to show that, ever since 1848, the Hamilton Oil-Mill's property has had a definite and fixed eastern boundary line, as will appear from the De Voe map. It is upon these descriptions, thus established by contemporaneous public records, that the defendants rely for the assertion in their answer that Mrs. Cane, their judgment debtor, still owns "that portion of block sixty-eight (68) adjoining and to the north and north-east of the land sold by S. Bennett and Mrs. M. D. C. Cane to George M. Nicholls in April, 1848," etc.; and that the plaintiff did not acquire same under the Leavenworth mortgage in 1886. In January, 1874, when Mrs. Cane consented to a mortgage to Leavenworth, she, as the vendor of Nicholls and of Bosworth, respectively, knew, and is conclusively presumed to have known, the "Bosworth east boundary line" as well as "the Hamilton Oil-Mill east line," and Leavenworth, who made the survey of the locus in quo, in November, 1871, must also have known them when he accepted the mortgage of Mrs. Cane in 1874.

Under these circumstances it seems quite clear that when Leavenworth accepted the mortgage of Mrs. Cane on "all that portion of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's east boundary," situated on the extreme north-western part of that block, he did not acquire a mortgage on "that portion of block 68 adjoining and to the north and north-east of the land sold" by Cane and Bennett to Nicholls in 1848, situated on the extreme north-eastern part of that block, and between which two properties the Hamilton Oil-Mill property of 2⅝ acres has intervened since 1848. It appears that in 1886 the plaintiff instituted suit against Mrs. Cane in the foreclosure of the Leavenworth mortgage, of which he was the assignor, and became the adjudicatee of the hypothecated property, by the identical description given in the mortgage,—thereby placing himself in Leavenworth's place and stead,—paying therefor $100. It further appears that under expropriation proceedings in 1881—subsequent to the mortgage, though antecedent to this sale—the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company acquired a small portion of block 68, situated east and south of the Bosworth lot, for which they paid on the Leavenworth mortgage $2,750; same being equal to the capital of the mortgage debt and costs. In 1871, Bosworth paid for the small lot he purchased $5,300; Nicholls paid in 1848 for the 2⅝ acres he purchased of Cane and Bennett $2,625; and Hamilton paid, in 1868, for the same property, $8,000. Is there any reason to suppose that the lot in question, adjoining, as it does, the Hamilton Oil-Mill property on the east, of 1⅞ acres, was not worth as much proportionately? Can it be supposed that this valuable property, in addition to the residue of the property adjacent to the Bosworth property, would have been adjudicated to the plaintiff for $100 in 1886? Such suppositions are repugnant to reason, in view of the fact that the testimony in this case shows that the property in controversy is alone worth $5,000. To fully disclose the plaintiff's contention, we quote the following pertinent extract from the brief of plaintiff's counsel at pages 4 and 5, to-wit: "This is the description: The said Mrs. M. D. C. Cane declares that she does by these presents specially mortgage and hypothecate unto and in favor of the said F. P. Leavenworth, his heirs and assigns, the following described property, situated in the city of Shreveport, La., to-wit: All that portion of lot or block sixty-eight (68) north and east of Bosworth's east boundary, now owned by the said Mrs. M. D. C. Cane. It is admitted she owned the land in controversy at date of mortgage, and it is averred in answer that she owned it in 1848. Now, she mortgages all the land east and north of the Bosworth tract, and then adds, 'now owned by the said Mrs. M. D. C. Cane.' That is, if she owned any more land in block or lot 68, she mortgaged that also, as we will show further on." Counsel subsequently adds the following, viz.: "The extreme portion of said block 68, east of Bosworth's east line, is the tract marked 'Jno. R. Jones,' and is the tract in controversy. W. R. De Voe, the city surveyor, made this map, and says this tract is east of Bosworth's tract, and a portion of lot or block 68 of the city of Shreveport." We do not consider the language of the act of mortgage as hypothecating all the land east and north of the Bosworth tract, then owned by Mrs. Cane. Had she so intended, she would have employed different and more comprehensive language, better calculated to have conveyed such an intention. The statement of De Voe, as a witness, is strictly true, but it does not throw any light on the question. The learned judge, in his exceptionally able opinion, says: "If in the mortgage to Leavenworth, and sale to Jones, the land had been merely described as all the land then owned by her (Mrs. Cane) in block 68, it would have been sufficient. No one could have been misled by such a description, and no difficulty could have been met in identifying the property." But he fails to state that such was not the case; and that is the precise reason why we are of opinion that the Leavenworth mortgage did not cover all the land Mrs. Cane then owned in block 68. For this reason we consider the judge's conclusion clearly a non sequitur. The learned judge cites the fact that the defendants remained inactive and silent while Jones' sale was pending, as an evidence of their manifest acquiescence in his purchase. But the same question recurs: The purchase of what property? The argument is self-destructive. He also cites the expropriation proceedings supra, and her acquiescence in the application of the proceeds as a credit on the Leavenworth mortgage debt, as an acquiescence in the existence of a mortgage on the property. But the question instantly arises, what property was mortgaged? To each and all the questions the answer is the same. Reference is made in the brief of the plaintiff's counsel to an averment made by Mrs. Cane in her answer in the expropriation suit to strengthen the Leavenworth mortgage and Jones' title; but that document forms no part of the evidence offered, was not referred to in the plaintiff's petition, and is not mentioned in the judge's reasons for judgment. To that suit neither the plaintiff nor the defendants were parties or privies. The defendants are Mrs. Cane's grandchildren, and are endeavoring to execute a judgment against her, but they are not her heirs, because she is still living. It is not possible for us to give it any effect. The plaintiff must stand or fall upon the title he derived at sheriff's sale. The testimony shows that plaintiff has been, since his purchase in 1886, exercising some rights of ownership in the property,—such as grading and the like. His right to claim compensation therefor should be reserved, but the judgment in his favor must be reversed, and his injunction dissolved, with costs, but without damages; the defendants' right being, in this respect, reserved also. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is, annulled and set aside; and it is now ordered and decreed that there be judgment dissolving plaintiff's injunction at his cost, and without damages, the right of defendants being reserved in this respect.

RECORD ON APPEAL—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT—AFFIDAVIT FOR DEFAULT.

1. Where a motion is made, subsequent to final judgment entered by the clerk after default for want of appearance, to open such default and to vacate such final judgment, and exhibits, in the shape of affidavits, etc., are presented to the judge to sustain or to resist such motion, the fact that such papers or exhibits were presented to and considered by the judge upon such motion must be evidenced by a bill of exceptions signed and sealed by the judge, or in some other manner tantamount to such bill of exceptions, otherwise such papers and exhibits cannot be considered by this court upon writ of error for want of the proper evidence that they were in fact used or considered in connection with such motion.

2. Where the affidavit or proof upon which the clerk enters a final judgment after default fails entirely to establish any count in the plaintiff's declaration, such final judgment is illegal, and will be reversed on writ of error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

John E. Hartridge, for plaintiffs in error. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for defendants in error.

TAYLOR, J. On the 22d day of March, 1888, the firm composed of H. A. Steinwender, A. C. Sellner, and G. A. Steinwender, doing business under the firm name of Steinwender & Sellner, instituted their action in assumpsit, upon an account for goods sold, etc., in the circuit court of Duval county, against William H. Hellen and George F. Acosta, as partners, doing business under the firm name of Hellen & Acosta. Summons ad respondendum was issued March 22, 1888, returnable to the rule-day in April, 1888, and the following return was made thereon by the sheriff: "Received this summons March 22, 1888, and served the same March 22, 1888, by delivering a true copy thereof in the county of Duval to the within named defendant William H. Hellen, of the firm of Hellen & Acosta." The declaration was not filed until the rule-day in May, 1888. The defendants failed to enter any appearance either on the return-day of the summons in April, or on the rule-day following in May, when the declaration was filed; and, on the rule-day in May, the plaintiff caused default judgment to be entered for want of appearance. On the 17th day of May, 1888, a term of the circuit court being then in session, the plaintiffs applied to the clerk for and obtained the entry of a final judgment for the sum of $866.03, inclusive of costs. Afterwards, on the 21st day of June, 1888, the plaintiffs caused execution to issue. On the 22d day of June, 1888, the defendants, by their counsel, served the following notice upon the plaintiffs' counsel: "Take notice that we will on Monday, the 25th day of June, at ten o'clock A. M., or as soon thereafter as we can be heard, move before the Honorable JOHN F. WHITE, Judge, at Live Oak, Fla., to open the default entered, and to set aside the judgment rendered and entered in this case, on the ground that the defendants, William H. Hellen and George F. Acosta, partners as Hellen & Acosta, have a meritorious defense to this suit, and were never at any time indebted to the plaintiffs, and were never in any way served with process in this case." The hearing of this motion was had before the judge of the third circuit, because of the absence from the state of the judge of the fourth circuit, where the cause was pending. The motion was denied, and from the judgment and the order denying the motion the defendants have taken a writ of error to this court.

At the hearing of this motion before the judge of the third circuit, a demurrer, and various pleas, affidavits, and other exhibits copied into the record here, purport to have been presented to the judge in support of, and in resistance to, the motion. These exhibits cannot be considered by this court, because the fact that they were formally presented to and considered by the court below in connection with said motion is not evidenced to this court by any bill of exceptions, or in any other manner recognized by our statutes or practice. In Broward v. State, 9 Fla. 422 the court says: "The proper way to get facts before an appellate court, in such form as to render them evidence, is to make a statement of them in the shape of a bill of exceptions, and then get the circuit judge to sign and seal it, and order it to be made a part of the record." There must be something, either a formal bill of exceptions, or that which is tantamount thereto, evidencing the fact that such papers were considered on the hearing of the motion, before we could consider them on writ of error. Carter v. State, 20 Fla. 754.

The declaration in this case is as follows: "H. A. Steinwender, A. C. Sellner, and G. A. Steinwender, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Steinwender & Sellner, by their attorneys, A. W. Cockrell & Son, sue William H. Hellen and George F. Acosta, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Hellen & Acosta, hereinafter called defendants, for this, to-wit: (1) That heretofore the plaintiffs bargained, sold, and delivered to Isadore M. Acosta and Joseph S. Hellen, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Hellen & Acosta, hereinafter called Hellen & Acosta No. 1, certain goods, wares, and merchandise, more particularly set forth in the bill of particulars hereto attached as part hereof, for which the said Hellen & Acosta No. 1 promised to pay the plaintiffs the sum of eight hundred and fifty-two 32-100 dollars; but nevertheless the said Hellen & Acosta No. 1 wholly refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, and still doth refuse so to do; and notwithstanding the said Hellen & Acosta No. 1, soon after receiving said goods, or about the time of actually receiving the same into their place of business on Bay street, in the city of Jacksonville, said county and state, with the intent to defraud the plaintiffs, claimed they had sold the said goods, wares, and merchandise to the defendants, the said Joseph S. Hellen being the brother of William H. Hellen, and the said Isadore M. Acosta being a brother of the said defendant George F. Acosta; and then and there the defendants, under said name of Hellen & Acosta, formed a partnership as aforesaid, and continued the business of the said Hellen & Acosta No. 1, at the said place of business, and then and there took possession of all and singular the said goods, wares, and merchandise, and converted the same to the use of themselves, the said defendants; notwithstanding the defendants then and there knew that the plaintiffs had not been paid for the same, or any part thereof, and notwithstanding the defendants then and there knew the said Hellen & Acosta No. 1 intended thereby to defraud the plaintiffs as aforesaid. And thereby the defendants greatly damaged the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs claim the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

"(2) And for a second count the plaintiffs allege by this reference to all heretofore alleged, excepting the last paragraph next above, and further allege, and the defendants then and there promised to pay the plaintiffs the sum of $852.32, but nevertheless the defendants wholly failed to pay the plaintiffs said sum, or any part thereof, and still doth refuse so to do; and the defendants have wholly failed to pay the plaintiffs the value of said goods, or any part thereof, and the plaintiffs claim fifteen hundred dollars.

"(3) And for a third count the plaintiffs sue the defendants for this, to-wit: The defendants promised to pay the plaintiffs for certain goods, wares, and merchandise, set forth in detail in the bill of particulars hereto attached as a part hereof, sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, as much as the said goods were reasonably worth, and the same were then and there reasonably worth the sum of $852.32, of which the defendants had notice; and being so indebted, the defendants, in consideration thereof, promised to pay the plaintiffs said sum, but nevertheless the defendants wholly refused, and still doth refuse, to pay the same, or any part thereof, and the plaintiff claims $1,500.

"(4) And for a fourth count the plaintiffs sue the defendants for $852.32, money due and payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs on account stated between them, and plaintiffs claim $1,500.

"(5) And for a fifth count the plaintiffs sue the defendants for $852.32, money due and payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs for goods bargained and sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and plaintiffs claim $1,500.

"(6) And for a sixth count the plaintiffs sue the defendants for $852.32, money due and payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, and plaintiffs claim $1,500.

To this declaration there is attached, as a part thereof, an itemized account for various goods, aggregating $852.32, which account is made out against Hellen & Acosta, without stating the individual names of the parties composing the firm. After the entry of the default for want of appearance, the following affidavit, with the following account appended, was filed with the clerk of the circuit court, upon which he entered the final judgment appealed from:

"State of Missouri, city of St. Louis—ss.: Before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for the city and state aforesaid, duly commissioned and qualified for a term expiring June 29, 1889, personally appeared on this fourteenth day of May, A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, A. C. Sellner, of lawful age, to me known, who, being by me duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says that he is a member of the firm of Steinwender & Sellner, the within-named claimants, (said firm being composed of Herman A. Steinwender, Gustavus A. Steinwender, and this affiant;) that the within demand against the copartnership of Hellen & Acosta, of Jacksonville, Florida, is, within the knowledge of affiant, just, due, and unpaid; that full credit has been given by claimants to said copartnership of Hellen & Acosta for all payments and offsets to which they are justly and legally entitled; and that the amount of eight hundred and fifty-two and 82-100 dollars, as within claimed, is justly due. A. C. SELLNER.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 14th day of May, 1888. Witness my hand and notarial seal. [Seal.] AUGUST AHRENS, Notary Public City of St. Louis, Missouri."

The errors assigned are as follows: "(1) The court erred in entering the default in this case; (2) the court erred in rendering and entering a final judgment in this case; (3) the court erred in overruling the motion of the plaintiffs in error to open the default and set aside the judgment herein." And counsel for plaintiffs in error urges the second assignment on the ground "that the proof does not pretend to show the delivery to the defendants, or to any one for them; nor does it pretend to show that they derived any benefit therefrom."

We think the second error assigned is well taken. The plaintiffs in the first count of their declaration disclose the fact that the bill of goods sued for were sold and delivered to Joseph S. Hellen and Isadore M. Acosta, as copartners, doing business under the firm name of Hellen & Acosta; while the suit is brought against William H. Hellen and George F. Acosta, as copartners, under the same firm name of Hellen & Acosta; the purchasers named in the declaration not even being made parties to the suit. The second count in the declaration reiterates the allegations contained in the first by reference, and then alleges a distinct promise on the part of the defendants to pay the plaintiffs for said goods. The first and second counts, coupled together, constitute, in substance, an allegation that the defendants became liable for and promised to pay the debt contracted by Joseph S. Hellen and Isadore M. Acosta, as partners. The third count alleges that the defendants promised to pay the plaintiffs for certain goods set forth in detail in the bill of particulars thereto attached. This bill of particulars is also referred to in the first count as being an exhibit of the goods sold to Joseph S. Hellen and Isadore M. Acosta. The fourth count is for money due and payable upon an account alleged to have been stated between plaintiffs and defendants. The fifth count is for money due and payable for goods bargained and sold by plaintiffs to the defendants. The sixth and last count is for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs. In all these common counts the amount of the said bill alleged in the first count to have been contracted by Joseph S. Hellen and Isadore M. Acosta is claimed. The affidavit filed with the clerk, upon which the final judgment was entered, does not connect the defendants William H. Hellen and George F. Acosta with the indebtedness sued for in the declaration. Under the familiar rule that the allegata et probata must agree, this proof should at least have established some one of the counts ex contractu in the declaration as against the defendants, but it does not establish any one of the counts in the declaration. It does not prove that the bill of goods sued for were ever sold or delivered to the defendants. Neither does it pretend to prove any promise by the defendants to pay for said goods. We are therefore forced to the conclusion that this final judgment has been illegally entered without any proper proof to sustain it. Wilson v. Fridenberg, 22 Fla. 114. There was error, therefore, in entering it, and the court erred in refusing to set it aside. It will be proper to say that the affidavit upon which this judgment was entered was not included in the original transcript of the record sent here, though the clerk certified that such transcript constituted a true copy of "all the proceedings, and a correct copy of the record of the judgment, as appears upon the files and records of" his office. This affidavit, duly certified, was subsequently supplied by consent of counsel upon its omission being called to their attention by us. This became necessary because the sufficiency of the affidavit was directly questioned in the errors assigned, and in the position taken by counsel for plaintiffs in error in his briefs in reference thereto.

The judgment of the court below is reversed.

SPRATT v. WILSON et al.

RESCISSION OF MORTGAGE — AGENCY — EVIDENCE.

1. Where a bill is filed to foreclose a purchase-money mortgage, and defendant files her cross-bill to rescind such mortgage on the ground that W., one of the complainants, was acting as her agent when she purchased the land, and without her knowledge purchased it from his own firm for her, the burden is on her to show such agency.

2. Defendant testified that she was induced by W. to purchase the land, that he was her agent, and that she acted wholly on his advice. W. testified that he was not her agent, but that he treated her as other persons, showed her the property he had for sale, and that she made her own selection. It appeared that they charged her no commission on the purchase, and that she paid them part of the purchase price. Held, that no agency was shown to have existed.

3. The fact that plaintiffs advanced part of the purchase price of a lot formerly purchased by them for her does not tend to show that they regarded themselves as her agents in other matters, but may be explained by the consideration that they were interested in getting commissions on that sale.

4. The failure to notify defendant of an unpaid mortgage on the land, or to have the wives of the other plaintiffs join in the conveyance, would not justify a rescission, where such mortgage has been paid, the claims to dower relinquished, and the solvency of plaintiffs is unquestioned.

Appeal from chancery court, Jefferson county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor. Affirmed.

Bill by Wilson, Martin & Leedy against Louise Spratt to foreclose a mortgage on real estate. Defendant filed a cross-bill for a rescission of the mortgage. Decree for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals.

E. K. Campbell, for appellant. A. W. Cochran and R. H. Pearson, for appellee.

WALKER, J. On March 22, 1887, Miss Louise Spratt purchased a lot in the city of Birmingham from Wilson, Martin & Leedy at the price of $1,700. She paid $1,100 of the purchase money in cash, and executed her promissory note to the vendors for the balance. This note was made payable on the 23d day of February, 1888, and was secured by the purchaser's mortgage on the lot. The original bill in this case was filed January 15, 1889, for the foreclosure of that mortgage, no payment having been made on the note thereby secured. The defendant interposed a cross-bill, asking for a rescission of the contract of purchase, that the mortgage and note be delivered up and canceled, and for the repayment of the principal and interest of the amount paid on the purchase. The right to rescind is claimed on the ground that Mr. Wilson, one of the complainants, while acting as the defendant's agent, and intrusted by her with full power and discretion to invest her money in real estate, abused the trust and confidence reposed in him as such agent by making a sale to the defendant of property belonging to his own firm, without informing her that they were the vendors of the property, and without fully and fairly advising her as to the facts of the transaction. The defendant claims that not until after the filing of the bill in this case did she learn that the complainants had sold her their own property. It is very plain that an agent should not put himself in such a position that his own personal interests conflict with the duty he owes to his principal, and that, if he is an agent to buy, and uses his position to purchase his own property for his principal, the principal can avoid the purchase, unless it was made with his full knowledge and free consent. Adams v. Sayre, 70 Ala. 318, 76 Ala. 509; Potter's Appeal, (Conn.) 12 Atl. Rep. 513; 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 93; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 372, 375. And when a vendor occupies a relation of trust and confidence towards his vendee, transactions between them will be narrowly watched, and the vendor must show that the vendee was fully informed of the facts, and that the sale was in every respect just, fair, and equitable. Waddell v. Lanier, 62 Ala. 347; Boney v. Hollingsworth, 23 Ala. 698; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 376, 377. The difficulty in this case is in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to what relation existed between the parties at the date of the sale in question. The evidence on this subject is in irreconcilable conflict. The burden is upon Miss Spratt to sustain her allegation that Wilson was her agent to make the purchase for her. That fact must be established as the foundation of her claim. It appears from the testimony of Miss Spratt and of her mother that the former was a young woman without business experience, and with few friends in Birmingham, where she was earning a livelihood by teaching music and doing occasional work for newspapers; that she gave music lessons to two of Mr. Wilson's children, was kindly treated by himself and his wife, and frequently visited their residence on terms of intimate friendship; that during the "boom" in Birmingham she heard much of Mr. Wilson's success as a real-estate agent, and he frequently talked in her presence of the large amounts of money made by his customers, and urged her to invest in Birmingham real estate, and "let him make her rich;" that she had no money to invest, but, finally yielding to Wilson's persuasion, she induced her mother to borrow money, and let her have it for investment in Birmingham. In this way Miss Spratt acquired $980. She and Mr. Wilson are the only witnesses as to what occurred between them in making the investment. It is undisputed that Miss Spratt deposited with Wilson, Martin & Leedy $200 on February 25, 1887, and $778 on March 5, 1887; that on March 14, 1887, Wilson, Martin & Leedy made a sale to her for one of their customers of a lot at the price of $2,250, $1,250 of which was paid in cash, the firm advancing the difference between Miss Spratt's deposit and the cash payment; that within a few days thereafter they sold this lot for Miss Spratt at a profit of $250, and she then made the purchase which is the matter of controversy in this suit. Wilson, Martin & Leedy charged and collected commissions on the sale made for Miss Spratt. No commissions were charged on either of the purchases made by her. They admit that they acted as her agent in the sale made by her; but deny that they were her agents in either of her purchases. Miss Spratt testifies, in effect, that Mr. Wilson was her agent throughout; that she acted entirely on his advice, and followed implicitly his suggestions and instructions. Mr. Wilson, on the other hand, states that in making the sales to Miss Spratt he met her as he met all other persons wanting to invest, told her what he had for sale, and offered her various properties, from which she made her own selections. Miss Spratt says that she does not remember that Wilson submitted more than one lot for her to choose from, but that, if he did so, she took the one he advised her to take.

In considering this conflict of testimony the circumstance is not to be lost sight of that Wilson was engaged in business as a real-estate agent, and that this fact was fully known to Miss Spratt. An intending purchaser may apply to a real-estate agent either to learn what he has for sale with a view of buying from what may be offered, or to enlist his services to negotiate for the purchase of property that may be desired. If the real-estate agent is resorted to for first-mentioned purpose, plainly he is to be treated as the representative of the seller and not of the purchaser. When the question arises as to whether the agent who brought about a sale acted for the purchaser or for the seller it is material to inquire whether the circumstances indicate that the understanding of the purchaser was that he was getting property which was in the agent's hands for sale, or that the agent acted in the matter solely in his behalf, and was not interested in serving the seller. In the present case there is nothing to indicate that Miss Spratt understood that Wilson was not to sell her property which he had for sale. When questioned on the subject, she does not pretend to say that Wilson, Martin & Leedy were not to sell her property on their books or under their control, or that it was her understanding that they were to go into the market and get property for her from some other agent or seller. She says that she had no understanding on the subject with them, but that Mr. Wilson was to do the best he could for her in every respect, uninstructed by her. There is nothing to indicate that it would have been contrary to her expectation to purchase real estate which Wilson's firm had in charge for sale. Nor is there anything to show that Wilson was led to understand that he was not to offer her such property. Unless something is done to deceive the purchaser into the belief that the person he deals with in making the purchase is acting alone in his interest, we think that one who offers property for sale may fairly assume that the purchaser understands that he is interested either as the paid representative of the seller, or as the owner of the property. It fairly appears in this case that Miss Spratt went to Wilson as a person having real estate for sale. It does not seem to have been her understanding that any one besides his firm represented the seller. There was no concealment of the fact that that firm had for sale the lot which she bought. Whether she understood that it belonged to the firm or to some one for whom they were acting, the fact that they were openly acting for the seller, whoever that might be, was sufficient to deprive her of the right to rely upon them as her agents in the matter. A purchaser is not entitled to treat as his agent one who openly holds himself out as the representative of the seller. Insurance Co. v. Allen, 80 Ala. 571, 1 South. Rep. 202. We are satisfied from the evidence that Miss Spratt had confidence in Wilson's integrity, in his experienced judgment as to real estate, and in his professions of friendly interest; that she thought he would not urge her to make a disadvantageous purchase; and that it would be wise for her to buy property recommended by him. We are further satisfied that it would have been much better for her if she had never given heed to his glowing account of the "boom" and of fortunes easily made on small investments. But we cannot overlook the fact that the evidence strongly indicates that she understood that Wilson had the lot in question for sale. Whether she supposed that he was acting for himself or for an undisclosed owner, in neither event had she the right to rely upon him as her agent. The fact that confidence was reposed in the seller's fairness and honesty, especially in dealing with an intimate friend, cannot convert the seller into the purchaser's agent, or confer upon the purchaser the right to avoid the sale because the supposed friendly and well-wishing seller has not made as full a disclosure or acted as entirely in the interest of the purchaser as an agent is required to act for his principal. It does not plainly appear that Wilson acted in the matter as her agent, rather than as a friendly seller, or that he or his firm understood that she looked to them as her agents, or expected them not to act for the seller of the property. The impression made by all the evidence taken together is that the real transaction was that a shrewd seller got the best of it in a trade with an unwary purchaser, rather than that an agent to purchase bought from himself without the knowledge of his principal. In the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, and in view of the conflicting statements as to the relations between the parties, we are unable to reach the conclusion that the fact of agency has been satisfactorily proved.

The fact that Wilson, Martin & Leedy advanced part of the purchase money on Miss Spratt's first purchase may be explained by the consideration that they were interested in earning commissions on that sale, and in getting a chance to earn commissions from her by negotiating another sale at an advanced price. This fact does not necessarily tend to show that they regarded themselves as her agents throughout. Their payment of taxes on the lot involved in this suit may have been for their protection as mortgagees, or because they were interested as agents to sell the property if an opportunity offered. The property was bought to be sold again. Miss Spratt purchased for speculation, as Wilson's firm well knew. The right to have a rescission is claimed principally upon the ground that Wilson, being the agent to purchase, bought from his own firm without informing his principal that he was thus interested in the sale. Relief cannot be granted upon that ground, as the fact of agency has not been satisfactorily shown. It is also suggested, though not much urged, that a rescission would be justified because of the failure to inform the purchaser of the unpaid mortgage on the property, and because of the neglect to perfect the legal title by having the wives of the two married grantors join in their conveyance. The mortgage debt has been paid, and the outstanding legal claims to dower have been duly relinquished. In these circumstances, and in view of the unimpeached solvency of the grantors in the warranty deed to Miss Spratt, the defects mentioned do not warrant an application to a court of equity for a rescission of the contract of sale. Parker v. Parker, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 426. No error is discovered in the record. Affirmed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. R. CO. v. BAKER.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURIES TO STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a railroad company for killing a mule, plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the mule came upon the track from the west side about 75 yards from the place where it was killed, and, without leaving the track at all, ran that distance ahead of the engine. There were no obstructions on that side to cut off the engineer's view. Defendant's evidence tended to show that the mule came from the east side, where there were obstructions, and that it first ran across the track, and then came back upon it just ahead of the engine, and ran but a very short distance before it was killed. Held that, as there was evidence from which the jury could have drawn an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant, the general charge in its favor should not have been given.

2. In an action against a railroad company for killing a mule, an instruction that, if the engineer was "on the lookout for obstructions at the time he discovered the mule," defendant was not liable, was properly refused; because, under it, the jury might have found for defendant, though they were satisfied that the engineer was negligent in not maintaining such a lookout prior to the time of actual discovery as would have enabled him to discover the mule sooner than he did.

Appeal from circuit court, Shelby county; LEROY F. BOX, Judge. Affirmed.

This action was brought by Mary M. Baker against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of a mule, the property of the plaintiff. Defendant requested the following charges, which were refused: (1) "If the jury believe all the evidence, then they must find their verdict for the defendant." (2) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the engineer in charge of the defendant's train was on the lookout for obstructions at the time he discovered the mule, and used all the means in his power to prevent the injury, they must find for the defendant." (3) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the engineer was on the lookout for obstructions at the time he discovered the mule, and at once blew the whistle for brakes and the cattle alarm, and reversed his engine, and there was no negligence on the part of the other trainmen contributing to the injury, then they must find in favor of the defendant." There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals Pettus & Pettus, for appellant.

WALKER, J. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the mule came upon the track from the west side; that the field on that side was open and clear of obstructions, so that the engineer could see animals approaching from that direction; that the mule came upon the track 70 or 75 yards from the point where it was killed, and, without leaving the track at all, ran that distance ahead of the engine. The evidence for the defendant, on the other hand, tended to show that the mule came from the east side; that on that side there were obstructions to cut off the engineer's view of the animals coming towards the track; that the mule first ran across the track, and then came back upon it a second time, just ahead of the engine, and ran along the track, but a very short distance before it was struck and killed; that from the point where the mule first crossed the track to the place where it was killed was about 50 yards. It was the province of the jury to accept or reject the one or the other of these versions, in whole or in part, and to determine from the whole evidence what was the truth of the matter. The court cannot say that it appears without conflict in the evidence that the defendant discharged the burden upon it to show that there was no negligence on its part which caused or contributed to the alleged injury. There was evidence from which the jury might draw the inference that, if the engineer had been keeping a proper lookout, he might have discovered the mule sooner, and in time to frighten it out of the way of danger or to avoid killing it. When there are discrepancies in the testimony upon matters material to the issue, and there is evidence from which the jury could draw an inference adverse to the defendant, the general charge in favor of the defendant should not be given. Railway Co. v. Lazarus, 88 Ala. 453, 6 South. Rep. 877; Hall v. Posey, 79 Ala. 84. There was no error in the refusal to give such charge in this case.

It was the duty of the engineer to be on the lookout for obstructions on the track, so far as such lookout could be maintained consistently with his discharge of his other duties. Failure to maintain a steady look out is itself culpable negligence. Railway Co. v. Lazarus, 88 Ala. 453, 6 South. Rep. 877; Railroad Co. v. Caldwell, 83 Ala. 196, 3 South. Rep. 445. This duty is one that must be constantly observed, not, however, so as to keep the engineer from attending to his other duties. The requirement is that the engineer, while giving all due care to the handling of his engine, must also maintain a steady watchfulness for dangers or obstructions ahead. Railroad Co. v. Bayliss, 75 Ala. 466. To prove that the engineer was on the lookout when he actually discovered an obstruction on the track is not enough to show that he has fully performed his duty in this regard. If he failed to discover the obstruction sooner, when he might have done so if he had been duly watchful, then the defendant is chargeable with negligence. Railroad Co. v. Watson, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 793. The engineer might have been "on the lookout for obstructions at the time he discovered the mule," as hypothesized in both the second and third charges requested by the defendant, and yet have negligently failed to maintain such lookout prior to the time of the actual discovery, and the failure to see the mule soon enough to avoid killing it may have been owing to the absence of proper watchfulness. Those charges were rightly refused, because, in obedience to either of them, the jury could have found for the defendant, though they were satisfied from the evidence that the engineer was negligent in not maintaining such a lookout as would have enabled him to discover the mule in time to avoid the casualty. The duty to be watchful is not to be confined to the time of the actual discovery of an obstruction. The steady performance of the duty is enjoined in order that obstructions may be discovered in time to avoid casualties therefrom, if practicable. No error is discovered in the record. Affirmed.

TRAMMELL v. LEE COUNTY.

CONTRACT FOR HIRE OF CONVICTS — STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS—OMISSION—ESCAPES.

1. Where one hires convicts from a county, and receives the benefit of their labor, he cannot be heard to contend that the kind and place of labor was not stated in the contract as required by law, or that he did not give bond as he should have done, since the provisions mentioned are intended only for the security of the county and the welfare of the convicts, and their omission could not in any wise affect the hirer.

2. Where a contract for work done is executed on the part of the laborer, it presents a clear case for suit and recovery on a common count.

3. Where one hires convicts from a county, binding himself to pay for the full terms of their sentences, less the services lost to him by death, and there is no provision for abatement in case of escape, testimony that some of the convicts did escape was properly excluded in an action for the hire of such convicts.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge. Affirmed.

This was an action brought by Lee county against R. J. Trammell to recover for the hire of convicts. The contract of hiring showed an agreement on the part of Trammell to hire the convicts sentenced to hard labor for the county, and stipulated that he should give bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the judge of probate. It did not, however, as required by law, set out the kind of labor, or the place at which it was to be performed. The bond stipulated for was never given. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

J. M. Chilton, for appellant. W. J. Samford, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. There was great want of precision, and of conformity to statutory requirements, in the contract of letting which gave rise to this suit. Still it appears that Trammell had the benefit of the labor of the county convicts, and it is the opinion of the court that he should pay for that labor according to the terms of his contract. True, Trammell was not required to give personal security, as he should have been; but the court holds that all the duties which were omitted were provisions intended for the benefit and security of the county and the welfare of the convicts, and that Trammell cannot be heard to complain of their omission. It did not injure him. There were no sureties in this case, and we need not decide what would be their status, if any had been taken. Trammell alone is sued, and the claim is simply one for work and labor done. The contract was an executed one on the part of Lee county, and presented a clear case for suit and recovery on a common count. The second or special count, however, sets out all necessary averments, and authorized a recovery to the same extent as a common count for work and labor done would have justified. The circuit court did not err in permitting the record of county convicts, made and kept by the judge of probate, to be received in evidence to the extent it was allowed to go to the jury. Code 1886, § 4590: 1 Whart. Ev. § 639. By the terms of the contract of hiring, Trammell bound himself to pay for the full terms of the sentences, less the service lost to him by the death of the convict. There was no provision made for discount or abatement in case of escapes. He took the risk of these. The court did not err in excluding testimony offered that some of the convicts had escaped. Affirmed.

TRAGER et al. v. FEEBLEMAN.

CLAIM OF EXEMPTIONS—SPECIAL ISSUES—EVIDENCE—OTHER PROPERTY DISPOSED OF.

1. Where an attachment issues against personal property, and defendant files with the officer a verified claim to an exemption, as required by Code, § 2521, plaintiff, by making a written demand, under section 2525, on defendant to file an inventory of his personal property, except such as is exempt, waives the objection to the sufficiency of the claim of exemption.

2. Where, under the general issue whether defendant had other personal property, money, etc., not embraced in the inventory afterwards filed, plaintiffs have the benefits they would have had under special issues, the refusal to grant special issues, if error, is not prejudicial.

3. Plaintiffs having shown that shortly before the attachment defendant had a large sum of money in his possession, it is competent for defendant to show that he appropriated it to the payment of his just debts.

4. Where defendant owes his mother and brother, and on the day of attachment hands his clerk $500 to pay the indebtedness, and the clerk does so some weeks later, but before plaintiffs make a written demand that defendant file an inventory, the money so paid, if the debts were just, cannot be estimated in ascertaining the amount of the exemption to which defendant is entitled, nor deducted from his claim of exemption.

5. A gift by defendant to his niece, about the time of the attachment, of several hundred dollars' worth of accounts, would be fraudulent.

Appeal from circuit court, Perry county; JOHN MOORE, Judge. Reversed.

Action on attachment by Trager, Canman & Co. against Mardus J. Feebleman. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal.

G. B. Johnston and J. H. Stewart, for appellants. Pitts & Harwood, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. An attachment sued out by the appellants against the appellee January 1, 1890, was levied the next day on certain personal property. On the same day appellee filed with the officer levying the process a verified claim to the property as exempt under section 2521 of the Code. Notice thereof having been given to the plaintiffs, they instituted a contest of the claim in the mode prescribed by the statute. It may be conceded that the claim of exemption filed with the officer, not having been accompanied by a statement of personal property, choses in action, and money, as required by section 2521, was insufficient. Instead of objecting thereto on this ground, plaintiffs made a written demand upon defendant, August 16, 1890, to file in the circuit court a full and complete inventory of all his personal property, except such as is specially exempt from levy and sale, all moneys, debts, and choses in action belonging to him, or in which he is beneficially interested. By the written demand under section 2525 the plaintiffs waived the objection to the sufficiency of the claim of exemption. Tonsmere v. Buckland, 88 Ala. 312, 6 South. Rep. 904. Defendant having filed an inventory in answer to the demand, an issue was formed under the direction of the court.

The real issue in such contest is whether the claimant had other personal property or choses in action or money not embraced in the inventory. But it is unnecessary to consider the propriety of the ruling of the court refusing to require defendant to join in the special issues tendered by plaintiffs. Under the general issue as formed they were allowed and had the full benefit which they could have derived from the special issues. The refusal, if erroneous, is error without injury.

Plaintiffs having introduced evidence showing that defendant, shortly before the issue of the attachment, received money for goods sold, and had a considerable sum in his possession, it was competent for him to show that he had appropriated the money to the payment of debts justly due by him. The evidence was relevant to the issue, whether the money belonged to him or was in his possession when the written demand for an inventory was made.

It is shown that on January 1, 1890, the same day on which the attachment was issued, defendant handed to his clerk, who is his brother, a sum of money,—$500,—which he directed him to pay to his mother and brother on account of debts which he owed them respectively, and get their receipts for the same. The clerk was not the agent of the mother or brother to collect the money, and did not pay it to either of them until the latter part of January, when he went to Meridian and Vicksburg, where they respectively resided. The justness of the debts is not controverted. The court substantially charged the jury if defendant was justly indebted to his mother and brother in the sums stated, and paid the money to his clerk in good faith before the levy of the attachment for the purpose of paying the debts, and the clerk paid the same to the mother and brother after the levy of the attachment, and the same was received by them in payment of their respective debts, this was a ratification of the payment of the money to the clerk, and the jury must find for the defendant. Charges were asked by plaintiffs asserting the contrary proposition, which were refused. Plaintiffs contend that merely placing the money in the hands of the clerk with a request that he pay it to specified creditors did not, ipso facto, change the ownership; that the request was revocable, at the option of the defendant, until the money was paid to the creditors, or they ratified the payment to the clerk; and that they could not ratify the payment after the issue and levy of the attachment, so as to cut off the right of plaintiffs to subject it to their demand; hence that, the money not having been paid to the creditors, and there being no ratification until after the levy and issue of the attachment, the money must be estimated in ascertaining the amount of the exemption to which defendant is entitled, and be deducted from his claim of exemptions, as provided by section 2531. The well-settled rule is that when one person delivers money to another, accompanied by a mere request, without any present valuable consideration, to pay it to a third person, such request does not, of itself, change the ownership of the money. Coleman v. Hatcher, 77 Ala. 217. But if the money is subsequently paid to such third person, and he receives it in payment of his debt, this is a ratification of the unauthorized act, which operates, by relation, to change the ownership of the money as of the time of its delivery to the receiver. Brooks v. Hildreth, 22 Ala. 469. Until such payment or ratification, or until the depositary has entered into some arrangement with the creditor, by which he is brought under obligation to hold the money for him, and by which he would be prejudiced by a revocation of the original direction, the money is subject to garnishment in his hands. The mere selection and claim of certain property as exempt, though levied on by attachment or execution, does not deprive the defendant of the right to prefer creditors, and apply any property he may own, not levied on, to the payment of their just debts. Weis v. Levy, 69 Ala. 209. If he has other property or money which may be subjected to his debts, it is incumbent on the attaching or executing creditor to reach and subject it by legal process. Plaintiffs had the right to garnishee the clerk, and thereby intercept the payment of the money to the mother and brother; but, failing to do so, they acquired no lien on the money, and its application to the uses originally intended—the payment of their debts—offended no rights of plaintiffs. No rights of theirs intervened so as to prevent a ratification from having the same force and effect as previous authority to collect the money. Of course, this rule has no application if the defendant thereby attempted a fraudulent disposition of the money as against his existing creditors. It may be that, had the defendant filed an inventory when he filed his claim of exemption with the officer, such inventory should have embraced the money in the hands of the clerk, which had not then been paid to the creditors, stating the facts. It had, however, been paid over when the written demand was made for an inventory. In such case the issue is not whether the money belonged to defendant at the time he filed his claim of exemption, but whether it belonged to him when the written demand to file an inventory in the circuit court was made under section 2525. The money having been paid to the mother and brother, and received by them in payment of their debts, before the written demand, cannot be estimated, if their debts be just, in ascertaining the amount of the exemption to which defendant is entitled, nor deducted from his claim of exemption. But there is evidence tending to show that defendant stated, the day before the attachment was issued, to a witness, that he had between three and four hundred dollars' worth of accounts, which he intended to give his niece. These accounts, if he in fact had them at that time, and had made no proper disposition of them, should have been included in his inventory. A gift of them to his niece would have been fraudulent as against the plaintiffs. The charge under consideration instructs the jury that on the hypothesized facts therein stated they must find for the defendant. This conclusion excluded from the consideration of the jury whether the defendant had accounts which he should, but had failed to, embrace in his inventory, though he may in fact have given them to his niece after filing his claim of exemption. For this reason the charge is erroneous. Reversed and remanded.

GLASS v. MEMPHIS & C. R. CO.

MEMPHIS & C. R. CO. v. GLASS.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—TRESPASSERS—WANTON NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Whether defendant's railroad rightfully occupies a street in a city must be determined in a direct proceeding, and cannot be raised for the first time in an action for damages against the company for killing plaintiff's intestate.

2. The fact that persons living in the neighborhood of a railroad are accustomed to walk upon the track without objection by the company does not make them any the less trespassers.

3. Evidence of such a custom is irrelevant and inadmissible.

4. In such an action for damages, evidence of the habits of decedent in regard to trains, and whether they were those of a prudent and careful person, is inadmissible.

5. The fact that the accident took place at a railroad trestle which spans an abandoned end of a street does not make the fact that other portions of the street are used by vehicles and pedestrians relevant.

6. Where decedent goes upon defendant's track without its sanction, and attempts to walk over a high trestle, but when midway across is struck by a train and killed, decedent is a trespasser, and defendant is only liable for gross negligence or carelessness on the part of its employes amounting to wantonness or an intention to inflict injury.

7. Such wantonness and intention cannot be inferred, unless the employes actually know of the peril of decedent, and fail to make reasonable effort to avert it.

8. A charge that, if decedent went upon the trestle without looking and listening for an approaching train, she was guilty of contributory negligence, is irrelevant, since she was a trespasser on the track, and no amount of prudence in attempting to cross the trestle would change her attitude as such.

9. A charge that there was no evidence before the jury of any pecuniary damage to plaintiff by reason of the death of his intestate, if error, will not avail on appeal, where the jury return a verdict of damages for plaintiff.

10. Where the evidence is conflicting whether or not defendant's employes did all in their power to avert disaster after becoming aware of decedent's presence on the track, a general charge in favor of defendant was properly refused.

Cross-appeals from city court of Decatur; W. H. SIMPSON, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Samuel Glass, administrator, against the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company for damages for killing plaintiff's intestate. Judgment for plaintiff for $460. Plaintiff and defendant both appeal.

This suit was brought by Samuel Glass, as administrator of his mother, Martha Glass, deceased, to recover $30,000 as damages for the alleged wrongful and negligent killing of the intestate by the defendant. Defendant pleaded the contributory negligence of the intestate, and plaintiff replied that defendant was guilty of gross, willful, wanton, and reckless negligence. The proof showed that on the 18th day of March, 1889, plaintiff's intestate was returning to her son's house-boat on the river, from the business portion of the town; that she came to the corner of Ferry and Market streets, and from there went diagonally across an open lot, with only one or two small houses on it, by a footpath, till she reached the railroad track; that she then walked down said track a distance of from 20 feet to 60 yards, and got on defendant's trestle across a large gully; and that she had walked about two-thirds of the way across this trestle when defendant's train, coming from behind, knocked her off into the ditch below. The testimony also showed that the intestate could have gone home by Market street, and thereby have avoided walking on the track except at the street crossing; that the distance by this route was a little longer than the one adopted by the intestate, but had a bridge across the ditch, erected by the city for the use of vehicles and pedestrians. The evidence also showed that at that time a person crossing the open block going towards the trestle could see a train approaching the trestle for a hundred yards or more, and could hear it a greater distance; that a person getting on the track at the point where it intersected the footpath could see a train approaching as far back as Canal street, which was the top of a "pretty steep" grade, and was distant from the trestle between 1,500 and 1,600 feet. None of the witnesses saw Mrs. Glass as she stepped from the footpath upon the track, though she was seen by some while approaching the track, by others on the track approaching the trestle, and by still others when on the trestle. All testified that she did not seem to be watching or listening for the train, and that she walked very slowly while on the trestle. The track was laid along what had been, before the war, Water street; but this street had not been used since the war for vehicles, and, "so far as the city was concerned, was abandoned." Since the side track was built there in 1886 there was no place for pedestrians to walk except on the roadbed, and in crossing the trestle on foot one had to step from timber to timber. The train was being operated by an engineer, a fireman, and three brakemen; one of the latter—and foreman of the crew—being stationed at the rear end of the front coal-car; another on the third car from the front,—a box-car; and the third on the car next to the engine; this being the ordinary and general number and arrangement of the crew on a switch train. The whistle blew for Arrantz's mill,—1,170 feet from the trestle,—and the train stopped (or slowed up considerably) there, in order that the "draw," going down to the river, might be raised. Some of the witnesses state the train came to a stop, but all agree that it slowed up considerably.

The length of the train was between 220 and 250 feet, and that of the trestle 75 or 80 feet. The train hands testified that, as soon as they observed Mrs. Glass on the track, (which was just as they passed Jervis' mill,) they gave the signal to the engineer to stop, and began to put on brakes; that the whistle was blown, the engine reversed, the brakes set, and the track sanded, and that they used every means in their power to stop the train. The witnesses, without contradiction, (except by a negro man, who was on a steam-boat, 400 or 500 yards up the river,) state that the whistle was blown repeatedly for the intestate to get off the track; and that the train hands motioned to her, and hallooed at her. Most of the witnesses testified that the whistle began to sound the cattle-alarm, and the train hands began to try to stop the train when the front car was about Jervis' mill, which was about 600 feet from the trestle; and that they continued so to do until plaintiff's intestate was knocked off. The train ran about the length of the train after the intestate was struck, the engine stopping directly over her.

On the examination of the witnesses for the plaintiff, the plaintiff sought to introduce evidence tending to show that it was the custom of people in the neighborhood of the accident to walk over the trestle, and that it was used as a passage-way. On examination of the plaintiff himself, he was asked: "Did you know your mother's habits with respect to railroad trains, —of carefulness or carelessness?" The defendant objected to this question as irrelevant. The court sustained the objection. The plaintiff also sought to introduce testimony to the effect that the south end of Well street, over which the trestle where the accident occurred was built, was still used as a street. The court in its general charge instructed the jury, among other things, that "the railroad company must be presumed to be in the rightful possession of the street along which it was laid, and therefore was not a trespasser;" and also that "the deceased was at the time of the accident a trespasser on the defendant's track." The plaintiff duly excepted to these portions of the general charge. At the request of the defendant the court gave the following written charges to the jury: "(1) Even if the train could have been stopped before reaching the trestle, defendant would not be liable, on the evidence in the case, if the train employes, after discovering Mrs. Glass on the trestle, made an effort in good faith with the means at their command to stop the train, and to prevent injury to her. (2) Defendant did not owe to plaintiff's intestate, Martha Glass, the duty to discover her on the trestle in time to stop the train and prevent injury to her. If she could have seen the train coming by looking back when she went on the trestle or while she was thereon, and if the train employes in good faith tried to stop the train and prevent injury to Mrs. Glass after they discovered her danger, defendant would not be liable." "(4) The failure of defendant's employes in charge of the train to look out for obstructions on the track, and to discover Mrs. Glass on the trestle in time to stop the train before reaching her, if the jury find from the evidence that there was such failure, would not alone authorize the jury to find that defendant was guilty of wanton, reckless, or intentional negligence. (5) If the jury believe the evidence in this cause they would not be entitled to find for the plaintiff, unless they find from the evidence that the train employes, after they discovered Mrs. Glass on the trestle, and the danger she was in, failed to make an effort in good faith to stop the train and prevent the injury. (6) If the jury believe the evidence in this case, it establishes the fact that the plaintiff's intestate, Martha Glass, went upon the trestle over which defendant's track runs, and that when she went on the trestle, if she had looked back, she could have seen the train coming in time to get out of the way, and avoid injury, and the failure of the employes on defendant's train to discover Mrs. Glass in time to stop the train is not such evidence of wanton, intentional, or reckless injury as will authorize a recovery by plaintiff. (7) On the undisputed evidence in this case plaintiff's intestate was not lawfully on defendant's track at the place where she came to her death, and defendant owes her no duty except not to injure her wantonly, recklessly, or intentionally. (8) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate, Martha Glass, went upon the railroad track, and undertook to walk across the trestle, when defendant's train was approaching said trestle, and that when she went upon the trestle she could have seen the train coming if she had looked in the direction from which the train was coming, or could have heard it if she had stopped and listened, then she was guilty of contributory negligence if she went upon said trestle without so looking and listening, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant, unless they find from the evidence that the train employes, after they discovered that the plaintiff's intestate was on the trestle and in danger of being struck by the train, did not in good faith try to stop the train by the use of the appliances at their command. (9) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate went upon the trestle over which defendant's track ran, and that the train was then approaching said trestle, then it was the duty of said Martha Glass to use her senses of hearing and of sight to discover an approaching train in time to avoid danger, and, if she did not look and listen to discover said train, if it was then approaching said trestle, she was guilty of contributory negligence, and the plaintiff cannot recover unless the failure of defendant's agents or servants in charge of said train to stop the same after they discovered said Martha Glass on the trestle amounted to intentional indifference to stop the train and prevent injury to her." The plaintiff excepted to the court's refusal to give, among others, the following written charge, requested by him: "(4) If there was no train in sight or hearing when the deceased stepped on the track or trestle, then it was wholly unnecessary for deceased to have stopped and looked and listened, and it is immaterial whether she did so or not."

Wert, Speake & Callahan and E. W. Godbey, for plaintiff. Humes & Sheffey, for defendant.

McCLELLAN, J. 1. Whether the spur track of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company was rightfully in what was known as "Water Street" is not a material inquiry in this case. Railway companies may, and frequently do, acquire the right to lay their tracks in the streets of towns and cities, and, unless the question is raised in a direct proceeding to oust them of the use for this purpose of the streets, the presumption is, as declared by the city court, that they are in rightful occupancy thereof.

2. "The mere fact that persons living in the neighborhood of a railroad track have become accustomed to use it to walk upon without any objection on the part of the railroad company does not in any manner alter or change the duty of the railroad company to such persons. They are simply trespassers." And evidence of such custom is irrelevant and inadmissible. Railroad v. Brinson, 70 Ga. 207, 19 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 42, and notes; Hoppe v. Railway Co., 61 Wis. 357, 21 N. W. Rep. 227, 19 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 74, and notes; Railroad Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149, 4 South. Rep. 618; Railway Co. v. Meadows, 10 South. Rep. 141; Mason v. Railway Co., 6 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 1.

3. Evidence of the habits of the person injured in respect of trains, whether those of a prudent and careful person or the reverse, is never admissible in actions sounding in damages for personal injuries. Railroad Co. v. Robbins, (Kan.) 23 Pac. Rep. 113; Chase v. Railroad Co., 19 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 356; Railroad Co. v. Colvin, (Pa. Sup.) 12 Atl. Rep. 337; Railroad Co. v. Clark, 15 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 261.

4. The fact that the south end of Well street, the north end of which, as originally laid out and used, lay along where the ravine now is, was still open and in use as a street, was not relevant to any issue in this case. It is uncontroverted that at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed by being knocked from the railway trestle which spanned this ravine there was no street either in or crossing the ravine, and no mode of crossing it except upon the timber of the trestle, and no way open by which vehicles or pedestrians could pass down what had once been, but had long since ceased to be, the northern part of Well street. What influence the intestate's right to be on the south end of that street could have upon her or the company's rights and duties with respect to this trestle is not conceivable.

5. It is not negligence in itself for one to cross over a railroad track wherever he may have occasion to do so. Before making the attempt, however, he must know that no train, engine, or car is approaching in such proximity as to render the undertaking dangerous. If he fail to use his senses to this end, if ordinarily he omit to stop and look and listen for trains before going upon the track for the purpose of passing over it, his act in so doing is a negligent one per se; and, if injury result to one thus on the track, in consequence of not having taken this precaution, enjoined upon him by the commonest dictates of prudence and care, it is well settled in our jurisprudence that he cannot recover for the mere negligence of the railway company. Railroad Co. v. Webb, 90 Ala. 185, 8 South. Rep. 518; Leak v. Railway Co., 90 Ala. 161, 8 South. Rep. 245. And it follows, of course, that one, having this right, with this care and caution, to cross the track of a railway whenever and wherever he has occasion to be on the other side of it, who takes this precaution, goes on the track for the purpose of crossing it, with all the assurance his senses properly exercised can give him that it is safe to do so, and yet from some cause, against which he could not guard, is injured, he may recover; for the law does not contemplate that railroads, roadbeds, and tracks shall impede travelers, whether along highways or across country, any more than their physical conformation may of necessity involve; and, while the traveler may be negligent in attempting to cross without proper circumspection, he is never a trespasser, because he is never without this qualified right to pass over.

6. But precisely the reverse of all this is true with respect to one, whether in town or country, and whether the track be upon an embankment, on a level, or in a cut, or through a tunnel, or over a trestle, who gets on a railroad for the purpose of passing, not across it, but along its course, and does proceed along its course, using it as a road. Such one is essentially and at all times a trespasser if he be not there by the sanction of the company; and he is as much a trespasser whether he stop and look and listen before going upon the track or not. Nor is his attitude in this respect in any degree relieved by the utmost diligence and care to avoid injury while proceeding on his way. This may secure his safety, but it renders him none the less a trespasser. He, unlike one who merely crosses the track, and to whom it is only an impediment to progress, which he has a right to overcome prudently and carefully, uses that of which the company is entitled to the exclusive use; and his act is in the nature of a conversion, a wrongful misappropriation, of another's property to his own purposes. In all reason, and by every analogy which the law affords, he must act upon his own peril. The company owes him no duty except that which every man owes to every other man, whether a trespasser or not,—to do no act nor omit anything, after his presence and peril become known, the doing or omission of which would tend to inflict injury upon him. There are cases, and among them that of Railroad Co. v. Donovan, 84 Ala. 141, 4 South. Rep. 142, which appear to hold that those operating a railroad in a town or city or through a thickly populated district, where there is occasion for people to pass along the track, and a usage to that effect, owe the duty of keeping a vigilant lookout for such persons at such places. This doctrine does not, in our opinion, consist with that declared in the succeeding cases of Railroad Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149, 4 South. Rep. 618, and Railway Co. v. Chewning, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 458, nor with the general doctrine, now thoroughly established in this court, that one who is injured in consequence of being negligently on a railroad track cannot recover unless the railroad employes are guilty of such gross negligence or recklessness as amount to wantonness or an intention to inflict the injury, and that this wantonness and intention to do wrong can never be imputed to them unless they actually know (not merely ought to know) the perilous position of the person on the track, and with such knowledge fail to resort to every reasonable effort to avert disastrous consequences. And this doctrine applies as well to densely populated neighborhoods in the country, and to the streets of a town or city, as to the solitude of the plains or forest. Railway Co. v. Lee, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 230; Railroad Co. v. Vance, Id. 574; Railroad Co. v. Trammell, Id. 870; Railroad, etc., Co. v. Vaughan, Id. 468. That these adjudications establish that there can be no recovery in such cases for the mere negligent failure to see the trespasser in time to avoid injuring him cannot be doubted. A duty, for a violation of which no redress is afforded, is an anomaly. It cannot in any legal sense be said to be a duty at all. Hence it must be that trainmen are under no duty to keep a lookout for such persons, since confessedly their failure to do so involves no liability upon their employers, and warrants no redress to the injured persons in consequence of such failure. And the principle declared in Donovan's Case must be confined to persons exercising the undoubted but qualified right to cross a railroad track. For such persons a lookout must be maintained, since they are in no sense trespassers, having always the right to pass over the track, and doing so, when due care is observed by them, not at their own peril, but upon the implication that the company will, in recognition of their right, keep a lookout for them, and conserve their safety. Persons traveling on the track, having under no circumstances a right to do so, can never assume that railroad employes will be on the alert to discover them in their wrong-doing. The latter are authorized to presume that the roadbed will not be thus wrongfully intruded upon and used, and are justified in acting upon this presumption. It is only when the presumption of the absence of trespassers is displaced by the knowledge of their presence that the duty to observe all reasonable care and prudence to avoid injuring them arises and is upon trainmen.

7. In the case at bar the person killed did not intend and was not attempting to simply cross the track, but she was upon and proceeding along the track over a high trestle of considerable length. To this effect the evidence is free from conflict. Hence, whether she stopped and looked and listened before entering upon the track for approaching trains, whether, had she done so, she would have been apprised of the approach of the train which killed her, and whether she was attentive and diligent to discover the approach of a train while proceeding along the track, are each and all wholly immaterial inquiries. No possible solution of any one or all of them could have affected her status with respect to the train, or the duties of the trainmen with respect to her. Had she seen or heard the train approaching, and gone upon the trestle, from which there was no escape short of outracing the train to the further end of it, in front of the moving cars, this would, according to the intimation in Railway Co. v. Lee, supra, have been such recklessness on her part as would have defeated recovery by her administrator, even had the trainmen themselves been guilty of gross negligence amounting to wantonness; but it is not pretended that she either saw or heard the train before going on the trestle, and it is to be doubted whether she ever became aware of its proximity till stricken by it. But she was wrongfully at the place where she was killed. She was a naked trespasser, wholly regardless of the precautions she may or may not have taken before going on the track, or while proceeding along it. Her negligence and wrong in being there would, as a matter of law, and to be so declared by the court, be a complete defense in this case, so far as defendant's liability is attempted to be rested on the mere negligence of its employes; and, on the other hand, such negligence would not preclude a recovery if the defendant's employes were guilty of that wantonness or recklessness which is imputable from wrongful acts or omissions on their part after they discovered her peril, and this though she had been wholly lacking in care and circumspection at the moment of going on the track and while proceeding along it. So that it is manifest that the ruling and charges of the trial court in respect of her supposed lack of diligence and prudence in going on the track without stopping and looking and listening for a train, and in proceeding along the track without keeping a vigilant outlook for its approach, are mere abstractions in the case, which, whether correct in themselves or not, can exert no influence upon the facts of either appeal. Of this character are charges 2, 6, 8, and 9, given at the instance of the defendant, and charge 4, refused to plaintiff. In some of the charges referred to given for defendant, and in those numbered 1, 4, 5, 7, of defendant's series, as also in the court's general charge, the propositions that the railroad company was not a trespasser in the street; that the intestate was a trespasser on the company's track; that the defendant owed her no duty but that of resorting to all reasonable effort to conserve her safety after her peril was discovered; that her presence on the trestle was negligence per se; and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless the jury found that the trainmen, after becoming aware of the intestate's position and danger, failed to exert themselves to avert the disaster, etc.,—are clearly stated in accordance with the foregoing opinion; and the assignments of error by the original appellant, which proceed on a different theory as to the principles of law obtaining in the premises, are untenable.

8. If it be supposed that charge No. 8 given for defendant is faulty, in that it declared "there is no evidence before the jury of any pecuniary damages to the plaintiff by reason of the death of his intestate," the infirmity will not avail on this appeal, because, the jury having expressly found that pecuniary damages were inflicted upon the plaintiff, and returned a verdict therefor, this declaration, if erroneous, could not have involved injury to the appellant in chief. Donovan v. Railroad Co., 79 Ala. 429; Carrington v. Railroad Co., 88 Ala. 472, 6 South. Rep. 910. The cross-appellant (the railroad company) has withdrawn all the assignments of error originally made by it except that one which is addressed to the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for defendant if they believed the evidence. This charge should never be given when the evidence on a material point is conflicting, or when, whether conflicting, strictly speaking, or not, it affords a legitimate inference adverse to the party requesting the instruction. The pivotal inquiry in this case was whether defendant's employes did all in their power to avert the disaster after becoming aware of the intestate's presence and peril. The affirmative charge was asked by the defendant on the theory that they fully acquitted themselves in this regard; but we are not prepared to say that the jury were not authorized from all the circumstances in evidence to infer the contrary, and hence our conclusion that the charge was properly refused. The foregoing considerations determine all the questions reserved on both appeals against the respective appellants, and the judgment on each appeal is affirmed.

PRACTICE ON APPEAL — RECORD — PLEADINGS — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE — PREFERENCES — PROOF OF RESIDENCE.

1. Although it is not the function of a bill of exceptions to show the pleadings in a cause, and as a rule, when they are not set out in the record, the presumption is that the cause was tried on the general issue, and that no special pleas were interposed, yet, where the record is wholly silent on the subject, and the bill of exceptions states that a certain special plea was filed, and its recitals show that the matters urged by both parties, and considered by the court without objection, were such as could only have been presented by the plea mentioned, the presumption that it was not filed will not be indulged.

2. Where one sells a stock of goods at its fair value, and receives payment in the discharge of an antecedent debt, and the notes of the purchaser for the balance, and the notes, together with his remaining personalty, do not exceed in value the amount of exemption to which he is entitled, the effect of the transaction is to make an authorized preference among the seller's creditors, and secure to him a sum of money which is not liable to his other debts; and the fact that notes were taken in part payment of the purchase does not render the transaction fraudulent, since, as the notes were included in the exemption, the change was merely in the form of the property exempted, and did not therefore involve any prejudice to the rights of the creditors.

3. In an action by the purchaser to recover for the wrongful attachment of said property it appeared that, although the debtor was described in the bill of sale as being of a certain county in the state, there was no direct evidence upon the question of his residence, nor was it shown that the fact of his residence was conceded. Held, that since, under Code 1886, § 2507, exempting the homestead of every "resident" in the state, and section 2511, exempting the personalty of such "resident" to a certain amount, the debtor was not entitled to claim the said notes as exempt unless he was a resident; and since, if he was not so entitled, the transaction was void as an attempt to hinder and delay creditors, the fact of his residence should not have been assumed by the court in its instructions, but should have been submitted to the jury.

Appeal from circuit court, Lowndes county; JOHN MOORE, Judge. Reversed.

This was an action by M. L. Edwards against Robert E. Brinson, sheriff of Lowndes county, and others, to recover damages for an alleged trespass in the seizure under an attachment issued against one Avenger in favor of Goetter, Weil & Co., of certain goods which were alleged to have been the property of the plaintiff. The following facts were undisputed: That the goods had belonged to Avenger; that while they belonged to him he was indebted to Goetter, Weil & Co., a firm doing business in the city of Montgomery, Ala.; that he transferred the same to the appellee; that the alleged consideration for the said transfer was certain debts due to the appellee and to the wife of Avenger, which amounted to $830.54; that the value put upon the goods by Avenger and Edwards at the time of the purchase was $1,231.54; that for the difference between the alleged consideration and the alleged indebtedness Edwards executed to Avenger his promissory note, payable at a future date; that at the time of the sale to Edwards, Avenger owed Goetter, Weil & Co. for the debt upon which the attachment was issued, and other persons, and was insolvent, and these facts were known to the plaintiff, Edwards; that, in addition to the goods sold by Avenger to Edwards, Avenger at the time of the sale owned other personal property, worth between four and five hundred dollars; but there was no evidence as to whether Avenger was at that time a resident of the state of Alabama. There was some conflict in the evidence as to the actual value of the goods sold, some of the witnesses valuing them as low as $800. The court, in its general charge to the jury, instructed them that, "if they believed from the evidence that Avenger owed Edwards and his wife bona fide debts amounting to $830.54, and that the amount of the notes taken by Avenger from Edwards, payable to him, Avenger, would not, together with the value of the other personal property owned by Avenger, exceed the sum of one thousand dollars in value, then the jury must find a verdict for the plaintiff." To this part of the general charge the defendants duly excepted, and also reserved an exception to the court's giving the following charge in writing, at the request of the plaintiff:

"The fact that Avenger was insolvent at the time of the sale would make no difference if the debt, as stated in the bill of sale, was honestly due to Edwards, if the goods were taken in absolute payment of the debt, and if the goods taken for the debt were not greatly in excess in value of the amount of the debt." The defendants then requested the court to give several written charges, and reserved separate exceptions to the court's refusal to give each of them; but it is not deemed necessary to set them out in detail. There was judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of $1,120.14. The defendants appeal.

Tompkins & Troy and A. A. Wiley, for appellants. Watts & Son, for appellee.

WALKER, J. In the record proper no mention is made of any pleas filed by the defendants, nor is there anything in the judgment entry to indicate upon what issues the case was tried. The bill of exceptions recites that "the defendants, in short, by consent plead the general issue and justification under a writ of attachment issued against D. B. Avenger." It is true that it is not a function of the bill of exceptions to show the pleadings in a cause, and that, as a rule, when the pleas are not set out in the record proper, the presumption to be indulged on appeal is that the case was tried on the general issue, and that special pleas were not interposed. Pollak v. Searcy, 84 Ala. 259, 4 South. Rep. 137; Hatchett v. Molton, 76 Ala. 410. In no event can a recital in the bill of exceptions be allowed to contradict the record as to a matter which ought to appear in the record proper, rather than in the bill of exceptions. Courie v. Goodwin, 89 Ala. 569, 8 South. Rep. 9. If, however, the record proper is wholly silent as to what issues were presented by the defendant, but the bill of exceptions states that a certain special plea was filed, and the whole tenor of its recitals shows that the matters urged by both parties and considered by the court without objection were such as could have been properly presented only by the special plea mentioned, then it cannot be said that the statement of the bill of exceptions that such plea was interposed is a contradiction of the record proper in this regard; and, in such case, it seems more reasonable to look to the showing made by bill of exceptions than to disregard it altogether, and indulge an indisputable presumption that the only plea that was filed was one which did not present the question which, without objection of either party, was treated as the main matter of contention in the trial. In Petty v. Dill, 53 Ala. 641, this court declined to ignore a plea which appeared only in the bill of exceptions, though it was fully recognized that that was not the proper place for it. From the recital in the bill of exceptions in this case of the evidence introduced by both the parties, from the part of the general charge of the court to which an exception was reserved, from the charge given at the request of the plaintiff, and from the charges requested by the defendant and refused, it clearly appears that the contest in the trial court was on the question of the validity, as against the defendants, who were attaching creditors of Avenger, of his sale of the stock of goods to the plaintiff. Conceding that that question could have been raised only by a plea of justification under legal process, though the attaching creditors themselves were parties defendant, which was not the fact in the case of Daniel v. Hardwick, 88 Ala. 557, 7 South. Rep. 188, still we do not feel at liberty to indulge the presumption that such plea was not interposed merely because the record proper is silent on the subject, when the bill of exceptions affirmatively states that there was such a plea, and makes such a showing of the proceedings on the trial that a presumption of the non-existence of the plea would involve the imputation upon both the parties litigant and upon the trial court that they addressed themselves almost exclusively to questions not presented by the pleadings. In such circumstances, to avoid imputing error to the trial court, it will be presumed that the issues upon which it is manifest that the case was tried were duly presented by the pleadings. In the present case we cannot presume that the special plea of justification under legal process was not interposed, and the rulings of the trial court upon the question of the validity of said sale will be reviewed. Those rulings appear in their proper place in the bill of exceptions. So far as the pleadings are concerned, the bill of exceptions is looked to only for the purpose of ascertaining that the issue involved by the special plea in question was raised. Chandler v. Chandler, 87 Ala. 300, 6 South. Rep. 153.

There was evidence tending to show that the stock of goods, valued by the parties at $1,231.54, was sold by Avenger at that price, and that he was paid therefor by the discharge of debts against him, amounting to $830.54, and in the two notes of the purchaser for the balance. As only part of the consideration was the payment of antecedent debts, the validity of the sale as against other creditors is to be determined by the rules governing sales by debtors for a new consideration. Owens v. Hobbie, 82 Ala. 466, 8 South. Rep. 145. In such a case, though the purchaser pays a full price, yet, if he is chargeable with notice that the seller is insolvent or in failing circumstances, and that it is his purpose by the sale to put his property beyond reach, or otherwise to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, then such sale is invalid as against other creditors. Lehman v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 192. An insolvent debtor has the right to pay one or more of his debts in preference to all others, though by so doing his remaining creditors are left empty-handed; but in securing his own claim the preferred creditor must not fraudulently aid the debtor in putting beyond the reach of other creditors property which they have the right to reach and subject. The other creditors cannot complain of such transaction if it cannot have effect to hinder, delay, or defraud them as to some resource to which they are entitled as a matter of right for the payment of their claims. The sale of his property by an insolvent debtor may be made the means of preferring not only the purchaser, but other favored creditors. As such preferences are allowable, and the act itself is legal, the fact that the result is to leave other creditors unprovided for does not render the transaction assailable by them, for the appropriation of the property is such as the law permits. Carter v. Coleman, 84 Ala. 256, 4 South. Rep. 151. In the case just cited only a part of the consideration was an antecedent debt due to the purchaser. The seller received the balance in cash, to be used in paying other creditors, and it was so used. The sale was sustained against the attack of creditors who were not provided for. It would have been equally legitimate if such cash balance had been paid to the debtor, to be retained by him as exempt, if such sum, together with his remaining property, did not amount to more than he could claim in that mode. To the extent that exemptions are allowed, the debtor has as much right to prevent his creditors reaching property that may be so claimed as he has to dispose of any of his property for the payment of preferred debts. A provision for the authorized exemptions is as lawful as a provision for the preferential payment of debts. A creditor has no right to complain of the appropriation of the debtor's property to either of these purposes, for in neither case is he unlawfully deprived of an opportunity of reaching property which he has the right to subject. If Avenger, as a resident of this state, was entitled to exemptions of personal property, if the debts which formed part of the consideration for the sale of the stock of goods were justly due, if the two notes made payable to Avenger, together with his remaining personal property, amounted to no more than $1,000 in value, and the sale of the stock of goods was for a fair and adequate consideration, then the whole effect of the transaction was to make an authorized preference among the seller's creditors, and secure to him a sum of money which was not liable to his other debts. It is plain that Avenger had the right to pay the preferred debts with their equivalent in value from the stock of goods, and, if what was left, together with his other personal property, did not amount to more than $1,000 in value, and he was a resident of the state, he could have disposed of such remainder of the stock just as he pleased; for, if the debtor's property does not exceed in value the amount exempted, the exemption privilege is attached to it by operation of the statute, without any act of selection by him, and creditors cannot be prejudiced by any disposition of property which is not liable to their demands. Nance v. Nance, 84 Ala. 375, 4 South. Rep. 699; Alley v. Daniel, 75 Ala. 403; Myers v. Conway, 90 Ala. 109, 7 South. Rep. 639. By selling the whole stock in bulk, and taking notes or cash for the difference between its estimated value and the debts paid, no greater benefit was reserved to the debtor, nor was the position of his creditors changed for the worse. Whether the property that could be claimed as exempt was disposed of in the one way or the other, the result would not be to secure to the debtor anything more than he was entitled to retain, or to put out of the way of other creditors any property which they had the right to have applied to the satisfaction of their claims. No more in the one case than in the other does the debtor acquire any benefit beyond what the law would have secured to him. McDowell v. Steele, 87 Ala. 493, 6 South. Rep. 288. If Avenger was entitled to exemptions, it could make no possible difference to his creditors whether the property retained by him as exempt consisted of a part of a stock of goods or of the equivalent in value thereof in notes or in cash. There is nothing for creditors to complain of in a transaction which cannot have effect to work any detriment to their rights in reference to the property of the debtor. The charges requested by the defendants are framed upon the theory that, though the excess in value of the stock of goods above the sum of the debts paid therewith, together with Avenger's other property, did not amount to more than he could claim as exempt, yet, if notes payable in the future were taken by the debtor for such excess, the law would pronounce the transaction fraudulent as against other creditors. Our conclusion is that such a mere change in form of a part of the debtor's exempt property could not vitiate the transaction, as the change involves no prejudice to the right of creditors, and that the charges were properly refused.

Avenger was not entitled to exemptions unless he was a resident of this state. Code 1886, §§ 2507, 2511. The position assumed by the plaintiff was that the transaction by which he acquired the stock of goods could not be vitiated by the fact that notes were given for the balance of the purchase price, and that they were made payable in the future, because such notes became part of the exemptions allowed by the law to the debtor. To the maintenance of this position proof of the debtor's residence in this state was essential. In the bill of sale Avenger is described as "of the county of Lowndes and state of Alabama," but the record discloses no direct evidence upon the question of his residence; and it is not shown that the fact of his residence in Alabama was conceded. In the absence of an admission as to a material fact, unless it appears that such fact was clearly shown, and that it was not contested, the evidence in regard thereto, though clear and without conflict, must be submitted to the jury; and the trial court, in charging the jury, has no right to assume the existence of such fact as established. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 336, § 8; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 114, § 118 et seq. While it does not appear from the bill of exceptions that there was any dispute in regard to this material fact, yet it is not shown that the existence thereof was conceded, or that the defendant in any way waived the right to take advantage of what was perhaps an inadvertence on the part of the plaintiff in failing to introduce proof on the subject. In the absence of any such showing, the court could not assume that such fact was admitted. Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 223. The part of the general charge to which exception was reserved was faulty in failing to submit to the jury the question of the debtor's residence. The transaction there hypothesized could not as a matter of law be pronounced valid unless the fact existed which would entitle the debtor to claim exemptions. If that fact did not exist, and the balance of the purchase price for the property sold was paid to the debtor in cash, such circumstances could have been looked to by the jury in determining the bona fides of the transaction, (Levy v. Williams, 79 Ala. 171;) and if, as in the present case, such balance was secured to be paid to the debtor in the future, there was involved such a hindering and obstruction of the other creditors as to render the transaction voidable by them, (McDowell v. Steele, supra.) In the instruction under consideration the fact of Avenger's residence in this state should have been hypothesized. The failure to do so renders the charge erroneous. For this error the judgment must be reversed. Reversed and remanded.

ODUM v. RUTLEDGE & J. R. CO., (two cases.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—SUBMISSION TO ARBITRATION—AWARD—DAMAGES FOR RIGHT OF WAY—REFUSAL TO ABIDE BY—TENDER—RECORD ON APPEAL—PLEADINGS—ESTOPPEL.

1. Const. Ala. art. 1, § 24, declares that private property shall not be taken for private use, or for the use of corporations other than municipal, without the consent of the owner, provided, however, that the general assembly may by law secure to persons or corporations the right of way over the lands of other persons or corporations, and regulate the exercise of the rights therein reserved. The Code, art. 2, tit. 2, pt. 3, commencing at section 3207, provides for condemnation proceedings in the probate court. Section 3216 provides that the order of condemnation shall vest in the applicant the easement proposed to be acquired, for the uses and purposes stated in the application, but for no other. Held, that under an agreement to submit to arbitration a dispute "concerning a right of way" for a railroad in connection with the said provisions, and providing that "the determination of the location and the damage for the right of way" should be left to the arbitrators, no greater interest in the land was secured to the railroad than would have been secured to it by compulsory proceedings under the statute, and, although it had the right to remove all buildings and improvements on the right of way, the property in such buildings and improvements remained in the owner of the land.

2. Where arbitration is agreed upon for the assessment of damages for a railroad right of way which has been already surveyed, an award which refers to the agreement, and assesses the damages at so much for the right of way taken "according to the survey," is not void for uncertainty.

3. Where a case is tried upon issue joined, and the pleadings are not shown in the record on appeal, but only in the bill of exceptions, they will be disregarded, and the presumption will be indulged that the only issue pleaded was the general issue.

4. Where a land-owner enters into an agreement for arbitration for the assessment of damages for a railroad right of way, and, after the award has been made, the company tenders a deed for his signature, he is entitled to a reasonable time to advise himself as to whether the deed is in accordance with the decision of the arbitrators, and his refusal to sign it, accompanied, however, by the statement that he will sign it if he finds it in accordance with the said decision, cannot be construed into a refusal to abide by his agreement so as to incur a forfeiture therein provided.

5. An agreement between a land-owner and a railroad company, to submit to arbitration the assessment of damages for a right of way, provided that, if either party should fail to observe the decision of the arbitrators, he or it should pay to the other a certain sum as liquidated damages. Held, in an action by the railroad company to recover such damages, that testimony by defendant that the president of the company directed the arbitrators not to value the improvements, as the company did not want them, was properly excluded, as, although such proof in a proper case in equity might operate as an estoppel, it would not have that effect in a court of law.

6. Defendant, in such a case, was not entitled to set off under the general issue the award of the arbitrators.

7. An actual tender of money is dispensed with if the party is ready and willing to pay it, but is prevented by the other's declaring that he will not receive it.

8. A tender, accompanied with conditions which the party has no right to impose, is of no avail.

Appeal from circuit court, Crenshaw county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Appeal from probate court, Crenshaw county; JOHN R. TYSON, Special Judge.

This comprises two suits brought by the Rutledge & Julian Railroad Company against B. P. Odum for the condemnation of land for a right of way, and the recovery of a penalty. There was judgment for plaintiff in both cases, and defendant appeals.

Gamble, Bricken & Gamble, for appellant. J. H. Parks and M. W. Rushton, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. These two cases were submitted as one case, and will be considered together. The Rutledge & Julian Railroad Company and B. P. Odum agreed to submit to arbitration a matter of controversy in regard to a right of way over the lands of the latter. The articles of agreement, submitting the matter to arbitration, provided that, if "either party shall fail to keep, observe, and perform the decision and award, he or it shall pay to the other party two hundred and fifty dollars as liquidated damages." The railroad company (appellee) claimed that Odum forfeited the penalty, and instituted condemnation proceedings in the probate court, under the statute, to condemn the land to the right of way. From the trial and order of condemnation the appeal is taken to this court. The railroad corporation then sued upon the articles of submission, and recovered the amount stipulated in the agreement. From the judgment rendered on this trial the appeal is taken from the circuit court.

Article 1, § 24, of the constitution, in regard to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, among other provisions declares as follows: "Nor shall private property be taken for private use, or for the use of corporations other than municipal, without the consent of the owner: provided, however, that the general assembly may by law secure to persons or corporations the right of way over the lands of other persons or corporations, and by general laws provide for and regulate the exercise by persons and corporations of the rights herein reserved," etc. Article 2, tit. 2, pt. 3, of the Code, commencing at section 3207, prescribes a system of condemnation proceedings in the probate court, when any corporation, person, or association of persons proposes to take lands, or to acquire an interest or easement therein, for any uses for which private property may be taken, to have the same condemned to such uses. Section 3216 of the Code provides that the order of condemnation upon the payment of the sum ascertained shall vest in the applicant the easement proposed to be acquired for the uses and purposes stated in the application, but for no other uses and purposes. Construing the written agreement between B. A. Walker, president of the corporation railroad, and B. P. Odum, the owner of the land, (in which the matter in dispute is stated to be "concerning a right of way" over the lands of the said Odum, in connection with the constitutional and statutory provisions,) it is clear that no greater interest in the land was to be appropriated to the railroad than a mere easement. In fact the agreement provides "the determination of the location and the damage for the right of way over said lands" should be left to the named arbitrators for decision. The fee of the land, and ownership of improvements thereon, and everything not incompatible with the use intended as a right of way, remained in the owner. Simply to acquire the right to use the land to the same extent, and no more, as if the right of way had been secured by compulsory proceedings under the statute, was the purpose of the arbitration. Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Burkett, 42 Ala. 84; Lance's Appeal, 55 Pa. St. 16, 93 Amer. Dec. 722, and note, 729.

The railroad had the right to remove all buildings or constructions located upon its right of way, or which interfered with its use; but the property interest in such building or improvement remained in the owner, subject to the right of the company to have them removed. The award rendered by the arbitrators seems to be in accord with the matters submitted to them. It refers to the agreement of submission, assesses "the damages at five hundred dollars for the right of way so taken or to be taken according to the survey." It appears from the evidence that the line for a right of way at that time had been surveyed, and the damages assessed were for the right of way "according to the survey." It is not void for uncertainty. Id certum est quod reddi certum. We do not doubt that Odum had the right to the buildings and the fences, and his claim to resume them ought not to have been refused or interfered with by the railroad company.

We are not considering the effect of the deed signed by Odum and wife and tendered to the company, but the rights of the parties under the award. The demurrer to the plea of the respondent in the ad quod damnum proceedings in the probate court ought not to have been sustained, and we would reverse and remand this case, if this court had jurisdiction of the case. We have held that in ad quod damnum proceedings no appeal lies from the probate court to the supreme court, but the appeal must be taken to the circuit court. Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Alabama G. S. R. Co., 92 Ala. —, 9 South. Rep. 555; Iron Co. v. Cabaniss, 87 Ala. 328, 6 South. Rep. 300; Railway Co. v. Newton, (Ala.) 10 South. Rep. 89. The pleas of the defendant in the appeal from the circuit court do not appear except in the bill of exceptions. It is not the office of a bill of exceptions to present the pleadings and the rulings of the court thereon Petty v. Dill, 53 Ala. 641; Ex parte Knight, 61 Ala. 482. The record does show that "issue was joined," and thereupon came a jury, etc. The rule is that when the record shows that the case was tried upon issue joined, but does not show what pleas were filed, it is presumed that the general issue was pleaded, and this is the only issue, as presented in this record, we are at liberty to regard as having been pleaded. May v. Sharp, 49 Ala. 140; Hatchett v. Molton, 76 Ala. 410. The plea of the general issue cast upon the plaintiff the burden of proving every material allegation of the complaint. The defense had the right to meet such evidence with counter-proof. Petty v. Dill, 53 Ala. 645; 49 Ala., supra.

The deed tendered to Odum for his signature is not set out. The bill of exceptions states it was "in proper form and substance for appropriate conveyance." What these words embrace we do not know. There was evidence tending to show that upon the reading of the deed Odum replied that he would not sign it, unless the railroad would agree for him to move his fences and improvements, and he was notified not to remove any of the improvements. Now, if the deed tendered to him was a conveyance of more than a right of way across the land,—a mere easement,—Odum was not required to sign it by the terms of the award of the arbitrators; and if more was demanded of him as a condition precedent to the payment of the damages awarded by the arbitrators, the railroad was more in default than Odum. Furthermore, Odum was entitled to a reasonable time to advise himself as to whether the deed tendered to him for his signature accorded with the decision of the arbitrators, and his refusal to sign the deed, accompanied with the statement that he would sign it if it was in accordance with the decision of the arbitrators, cannot be construed into a refusal to abide by his agreement so as to incur the forfeiture provided therein, at least until he had a reasonable time, under the circumstances, to inform himself as to the extent of their decision. The award allowed the railroad 10 days within which to pay the damages assessed. Three days after the rendition of the award Odum signified his willingness to abide the decision of the arbitrators, tendered a deed to the right of way, and offered to receive the money, and in no way, at any time, so far as we can discover from the evidence, has he signified a refusal to comply in every respect with the award. If the jury were satisfied from the evidence of the truth of these statements, the defense was made out under the general issue. There was no error in excluding the testimony offered by the defendant to show that the president of the railroad company directed the arbitrators not to value the improvements, as the railroad corporation did not want them. Such proof, in a proper case, might operate as an estoppel, but this is an equitable rule, not cognizable in a court of law. Set-off is not available under the general issue, and there was no error in refusing to charge the jury as requested in this respect. In regard to a tender of money, the general rule is that the money must be actually produced and proffered. It is well settled, however, that the proffer of the money is dispensed with if the party is ready and willing to pay the same, but is prevented by the creditor's declaring that he will not receive it. Rudulph v. Wagner, 36 Ala. 702. A tender, accompanied with conditions which the party has no right to impose, is not a legal tender. A mere tender of the money due does not discharge the obligation. The debt remains, and, to be available, the tender must be kept up. In the case of the appeal from the probate court, the appeal is dismissed. In the case of the appeal from the circuit court, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

AGNEW v. WALDEN et al.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PROBATE PRACTICE—FILING CLAIMS—WAIVER OF EXEMPTIONS—ABANDONMENT.

1. Where a claim against a decedent's estate, evidenced by note, was presented at the probate office within the time prescribed by statute, and an entry was made on the record as to the nature of the claim, in whose favor and against whose estate it was, and of the amount, date, and time when due, though neither the note nor a copy was filed there, this is a sufficient compliance with Code Ala. 1886, §§ 2081, 2083, barring all claims not presented to the administrator, or docketed in the probate office within a certain time, by filing therein the claim, or a statement thereof. Agnew v. Walden, 4 South. Rep. 672, 84 Ala. 502, approved.

2. A waiver, in a note, of all exemptions, is a good waiver as regards personal property, but not as regards real estate.

3. Where a note sued on contains a waiver of all exemptions, but the judgment entry is silent as to the waiver, this amounts to an abandonment thereof, and a consent to accept a common judgment.

Appeal from circuit court, Cherokee county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge. Affirmed.

This suit was brought by Walden & Son, as law partners, against L. D. Agnew, administrator of one J. R. Dorsey, and was commenced June 18, 1886, which was more than 18 months from the grant of letters of administration. The basis of the said suit was a bond or promissory note under seal, which was in words and figures as follows: "$500.00. One day after date I promise to pay Walden & Son, or bearer, five hundred dollars, and to secure the same I hereby waive all exemption or relief laws under the statutes and constitution of Alabama; the said sum being retainer to said Walden & Son as my attorneys in the case of the state of Alabama against me, charged with homicide. Witness my hand and seal, this October 9th, 1884." After the reversal of this cause on former appeal the defendant filed 10 pleas, setting up in different forms that the defendant's intestate did not owe the amount claimed, failure of consideration, and that said claim was barred by the statute of non-claim. Demurrers were sustained to all the pleas except the third, ninth, and tenth, which, respectively, contained the above defenses. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Matthews, Daniel & Carlon, for appellant.

STONE, C. J. This case was tried on pleas numbered 3, 9, and 10, and under them the entire defense was made which could have been presented. We will not consider the rulings on the demurrers to the other pleas, for, whether right or wrong, they worked no injury. Mitcham v. Moore, 73 Ala. 542; Rice v. Drennen, 75 Ala. 335. It is not our intention, however, to intimate there was any error in the ruling. On the former appeal (84 Ala. 502, 4 South. Rep. 672) we held the evidence was sufficient in this case to show that a proper statement of the claim had been filed in time in the office of the judge of probate to meet the requirements of the statute. Code 1886, § 2083. We adhere to what we then said. We confine it, however, to the simple fact of the debt,—$500,—evidenced by the note under seal. Of this claim, as a debt against the estate, the presentation or filing was sufficient. The claim sued on, as described in the complaint, and as the testimony tends to show, contains a waiver of all exemptions or relief laws under the statutes and constitution of Alabama. This is a good waiver of exemptions of personal property, but not of real estate. Neely v. Henry, 63 Ala. 261. The substance of the claim, as filed and recorded in the probate court, states the date of the note, amount when due, names of the payees, and date of filing. It contains no mention of the waiver of exemptions. In Smith v. Fellows, 58 Ala. 467, we stated some of the reasons which go to make up the policy of our legislation requiring claims against decedents' estates to be presented or filed within 18 months. There may be other reasons. Personal representatives, among their first duties, are required to set apart exemptions of personal property, if there be a surviving widow, or minor child or children; and it may be that to constitute a statement of the claim that will cut off exemptions the waiver should be set forth, if there be one. But we need not decide this question. The judgment entry is a simple judgment for money, and is silent as to the stipulation waiving exemptions. This amounts to an abandonment of the waiver, and a consent to accept a common judgment for money. Courie v. Goodwin, 89 Ala. 569, 8 South. Rep. 9; Brown v. Leitch, 60 Ala. 313; Hosea v. Talbert, 65 Ala. 173. Some of the questions sought to be raised are scarcely presented in such form as that we can consider them. Eliminating them, we find no error in the record. Affirmed.

McDONALD et al. v. WALKER et al.

PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

Where a bill for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land alleges that the bond for title was executed by A. M. and M. A. M., and the evidence shows that it was executed by A. M. alone, the variance is fatal.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by W. J. McDonald and others against W. A. Walker, administrator, and others, for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal.

Watts & Son, for appellants. Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellees.

MCCLELLAN, J. The general principle that the allegations of a bill in equity and the evidence adduced at the hearing must correspond is applied with the greatest strictness to bills for the specific performance of contracts, to the extent, indeed, of requiring absolute correspondence, not only between every essential averment and the proof, but also between every redundant and superfluous averment with respect to a material fact, or descriptive of a matter or thing necessary to be alleged. Daniell's, Ch. Pr. p. 860; Goodwin v. Lyon, 4 Port. (Ala.) 297; Ellis v. Burden, 1 Ala. 458; Ellerbe v. Ellerbe, 42 Ala. 643; Winston v. Mitchell, 87 Ala. 395, 5 South. Rep. 741; Webb v. Crawford, 77 Ala. 440. Thus where the bill alleged that the payments under a contract sought to be enforced were to be made in five equal annual installments, and the proof was that they were to be made in four or five such installments, it was held that the variance was fatal, and that a decree for specific performance of the contract was properly refused. Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 353. And where the bill averred that the contract was made on September 30, 1885, while the proof showed that it was made September 30, 1886, the variance was held to be fatal to relief; and this, notwithstanding the abstract rights of the parties were the same whether the contract bore the one or the other of these dates. The court said: "There is no class of cases in which correspondence between the allegations of the bill and the proof is more rigidly exacted than in suits for the specific performance of contracts. The allegation of the time when the contract is made is descriptive of that which is material, and the variance between the allegation and proof is fatal." Johnston v. Jones, 85 Ala. 286, 4 South. Rep. 748. See, also, Hamaker v. Hamaker, 85 Ala. 231, 3 South. Rep. 611. The same doctrine is somewhat more fully stated by BRICKELL, C. J., as follows: "The rule prevailing in courts of equity is that pleading and proof must correspond. It is not only necessary that the substance of the case made by each party should be proved, but it must be substantially the same case as that which he has stated upon the record; for the court will not allow a party to be taken by surprise by the other side proving a case different from that set up in the pleadings." Floyd v. Ritter, 56 Ala. 356; Alexander v. Taylor, Id. 60.

The averment of the bill is, in general terms, that the debt secured by the deed of trust has been fully paid. This is followed by an averment more precise, stating the time, mode, and source of payment, and describing the particular transaction from which it was derived. The latter averment may have been unnecessary and redundant. A general statement or averment of the payment of the debt would have been sufficient, without descending to a statement of the particular facts or circumstances proving, or conducing to prove, it. If redundant allegations are introduced into pleading, and they are descriptive of that which is material, a variance between the allegations and proof is fatal,—of the same consequence as the variance between the allegation of an essential fact, of that which is material, and the evidence or proof of the fact. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 67. The same measure of relief may be obtainable upon the facts proved as could have been obtained if the particular facts averred had been proved, but the court cannot permit the opposite party to be misled and taken by surprise by the proof of a case differing from that set up in the pleadings, and which, it is presumed, he came prepared to meet, as it is the case he had notice to resist. Floyd v. Ritter, supra; Meadors v. Askew, 56 Ala. 584; Bellows v. Stone, 14 N. H. 175; Gilmer v. Wallace, 75 Ala. 220. The application of the doctrine of the foregoing authorities to the case at bar leads us to the same result attained by the city court. The contract sought to be enforced is evidenced by a bond for title upon payment of purchase money. The bill alleges that this bond was executed jointly and severally by Alberto Martin and Marion A. May. If the evidence establishes the execution of any bond, it is not that of Martin and May, but that of Martin alone. Even if it be conceded that, had the averment been that the bond was executed by Martin alone, the complainants—other considerations being pretermitted—would be entitled to the relief prayed on the evidence we find in this record, even conceding that, although the sale was made by Martin and May, and the land at the time belonged to them as tenants in common, the complainants, in view of Martin's subsequent acquisition of May's interest, would be entitled to the relief prayed on averment and proof of a bond executed by Martin alone. Conceding, for the argument, in short, that the averment that May also executed the bond was not material to complainants' case, but redundant and superfluous, yet it is descriptive of the bond, and the bond is absolutely and essentially material. And this material thing thus laid and described became material as laid and described, and had to be proved with all the particularity, so far as May's relations to it are concerned, that confessedly would have been necessary had complainants' rights in point of fact depended upon the execution of the bond by May. This variance between the averments of the bill and the proof adduced at the hearing is fatal to the relief prayed, and the decree denying that relief and dismissing the bill is affirmed.

GARRETT v. SEWELL.

INSTRUCTIONS — ASSUMPTION AGAINST EVIDENCE.

Where the complaint in an action for damages for the removal of a partition fence contains three counts,—the first in trover, and the others in trespass,—and the evidence shows that plaintiff was in possession of the land on which the fence was, it is error for the court to give an affirmative charge in favor of defendant, since such charge assumes that plaintiff had at the time of the injury neither possession nor the right of immediate possession.

Appeal from circuit court, Cherokee county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge. Reversed.

Action by Sarah C. Garrett against M. N. Sewell to recover for the removal of a partition fence. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

J. L. Burnett and H. W. Cardon, for appellant.

CLOPTON, J. Appellant brings the suit to recover damages for the removal of the fence dividing her land from that of defendant. The complaint contains three counts: The first in trover, for the conversion of the rails; the second substantially alleges that defendant wrongfully and maliciously removed a fence inclosing in part the plantation of plaintiff, which was a partition fence between plaintiff and defendant, and had been agreed upon and recognized as such by plaintiff and defendant, and those under whom he claims, for more than 10 years, and that its removal left the plantation of plaintiff exposed to depredation by stock; and the third, in terms, claims damages "for trespass committed by the defendant," and makes substantially the same averments as the second, except that the words "wrongfully" and "maliciously," and the averment as to exposure to stock, are omitted. The following facts are uncontroverted: In 1858 or 1859 it was agreed between J. R. Lowe, who owned the land on the west side, and McRandle, who owned the land on the east side, of the fence, that it should be recognized as the line between them, and as a partition fence. After occupying the land on the east side for about 10 years, McRandle sold it to Savage, and Savage to Lowe, so that Lowe became the owner of the land on both sides of the fence. On a division of his real estate between his heirs in 1873 or 1874, after the death of Lowe, the land on the west side was allotted to plaintiff, and that on the east side to Mrs. Aubrey, each of whom entered into possession, treating and recognizing the fence as the dividing line, and as a partition fence. In 1879, Mrs. Aubrey sold the land allotted to her to defendant, who moved the fence, in 1885, about six feet onto his land. The evidence clearly shows that the fence was treated and recognized as on the line, and a partition fence, for 10 years before Lowe purchased from Savage, the respective owners claiming to the fence, and that no complaint was made that the fence was not on the line until claimed by defendant in the latter part of 1884 or early in 1885. Partition fences, as defined by statute, are fences erected on the line between lands owned by different owners. Code, § 1375. Whether it is on the true line, according to survey, or on a line agreed on by the parties, is immaterial. In Henry v. Jones, 28 Ala. 385, it was held: "If a part of the fence was entirely on the land of one of the proprietors, still, if it was recognized as a partition fence by both parties, it would confer the same rights as if it were in fact so. The recognition would operate as an estoppel in pais, and neither could complain of any act done by the other which would have been lawful had the fence been on the division line." Though a survey may demonstrate that the fence is not on the true dividing line, neither party loses any rights to the same. Section 942 of the Code provides: "When a resurvey of land is made by a county surveyor for the purpose of straightening section lines, or any subdivision lines of sections, the owners of fences built on the original lines shall not lose their rights to the same when the resurvey changes the original lines, and places the fence on the land of others." Under the provision of section 1370 of the Code, to the effect that partition fences between improved lands are to be erected and repaired at the joint expense of the occupants, which has been the law since the act of 1807, such fences become the joint property of the adjoining proprietors. Walker v. Watrous, 8 Ala. 493. Whenever one tenant in common does an unlawful act, whereby his co-tenant is injured, the law affords an appropriate remedy. He may bring trover or trespass against his co-tenant, when the thing in common is destroyed, or the conversion is equivalent to an exclusion of the right of the tenant suing. Allen v. Harper, 26 Ala. 686. The removal of the fence from the original dividing line onto the land of the defendant, and its appropriation to his exclusive use, was tantamount to the destruction of the thing in common. Symonds v. Harris, 51 Me. 14; 2 Wat. Tresp. § 947. Either owner may lawfully enter upon the land of the other for the purpose of repairing a partition fence, but, if the entry is made for the purpose of destroying the fence, such entry constitutes a trespass. Henry v. Jones, supra. But defendant contends that, notwithstanding the evidence may clearly show the facts as above stated, under the complaint—the first count being in trover, and the others in trespass—the affirmative charge in favor of defendant was rightfully given. The contention is based on the ground that, in order to maintain trover or trespass, plaintiff must have possession, or the right of immediate possession, at the time of the injury complained of. The gist of the action of trespass being the injury to the possession, plaintiff cannot recover on his general property if, at the time of the injury, the right of present possession and enjoyment has been conferred on another. So, also, to maintain trover, the plaintiff must have either possession or the right of immediate possession. The affirmative charge in favor of defendant assumes that plaintiff had neither. While there is evidence that a tenant of plaintiff was in possession at the time of the removal of the fence, there is also evidence tending to show that only the cleared land had been rented with permission to the tenant to get firewood off the woodland, which was inclosed by the fence. On this state of the evidence the court could not assume, as matter of law, that plaintiff neither had possession, nor the right of immediate possession to the woodland. On the contrary, if the uncontradicted evidence be believed, plaintiff is entitled to a verdict, under the first count, and under the others, if it be shown that in order to remove the fence defendant entered on the land of plaintiff. No question arises as to the measure of recovery. Reversed and remanded.

SIMS v. HERTZFELD.

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where the complaint in an action on two judgments sufficiently describes the judgments, no description of the contracts on which the judgments were rendered is necessary.

2. In such case it is proper for the court to sustain a demurrer to a plea setting up defenses which could have been urged against the demands before the rendition of judgments on them.

3. Defendant's second plea in an action on judgments alleged to have been rendered against a partnership of which defendant was a member was a denial of the judgments, and his fifth plea was a denial of the recovery on the judgments against the partnership. The demurrer to the second plea was sustained, and issue joined on the fifth plea. Held that, if there was error in sustaining such demurrer, it was harmless, as defendant had under the fifth plea full benefit of his denial of the existence of the judgments.

4. Defendant's fourth plea in such case was failure of consideration, which, if available at all, was defective in failing to state the facts showing the substance of the matter relied on as a defense.

5. Where the evidence is pertinent to and supports the allegations of the complaint, and is wholly uncontroverted, it is proper for the court to give a general affirmative charge in favor of plaintiff.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallapoosa county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Reuben Hertzfeld against R. Y. Sims on two judgments. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

This suit was brought by the appellee, R. Hertzfeld, against R. Y. Sims, and was founded upon two judgments alleged to have been recovered by the plaintiff against the partnership of Marable & Sims, of which firm the present defendant was a member. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the grounds (1) that it failed to describe with sufficient certainty the contract upon which said judgments were obtained; (2) misjoinder of counts. The court overruled each of these grounds of demurrer, and the defendant then interposed his pleas, which were: (1) That the notes upon which the said judgments were recovered were given by the plaintiff in payment of property which, after the purchase, was returned to the plaintiff; (2) the denial of the recovery of the judgments as stated in said complaint; (3) the denial that said judgments were obtained upon notes upon which the defendant waived his right of exemption, and also a denial of the statement of waiver of exemption in said judgment as to the defendant; (4) failure of consideration; (5) a denial of the recovery of said judgments against the partnership of Marable & Sims. Plaintiff demurred to these pleas, and the court sustained his demurrer to the 1st, 2d, and 4th pleas, but overruled it as to the 3d and 5th, upon which latter pleas issue was joined. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the record of the circuit court, in which the judgments which are the basis of the present suit were recovered, and also introduced the notes upon which said judgments were recovered. The defendant objected to the introduction of both the record and the notes, and duly excepted to the court's overruling each of his said objections. There was no evidence introduced by the defendant. At the request of the plaintiff, in writing, the court gave the general affirmative charge in his behalf. There was judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings this appeal.

John A. Terrell, for appellant. H. A. Garrett and Sorrell & Sorrell, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The suit was upon two judgments alleged to have been recovered by the plaintiff against a partnership of which the defendant was a member. The defendant did not, either by his demurrers or by his pleas, raise the question as to his individual liability upon a judgment against his firm alone. In the count added by the amendment there are allegations in reference to the contracts upon which the judgments were recovered, which are not material to the cause of action upon the judgments themselves. No objection, however, was interposed in any way to the presence in the complaint of these superfluous allegations. One ground of demurrer to the complaint was that it failed to describe with sufficient accuracy the contract upon which the judgments were rendered. The judgments themselves were sufficiently described, and there was no necessity of setting out any description at all of the contracts upon which they were rendered. The complaint, as amended, was not a departure from the original. The additional count sets out more in detail the cause of action described in the original complaint, but no misjoinder of counts was effected by the amendment. There is no merit in the demurrer to the complaint.

If the state of facts set up by the defendant's first plea was ever available as a defense against the claims which had been reduced to judgment, such defense should have been made in the suits in which the judgments were recovered. The judgments are conclusive of all defenses which could have been urged against the demands before the rendition of judgments upon them. The demurrer to this plea was properly sustained. Cook v. Parham, 63 Ala. 456; Mervine v. Parker, 18 Ala. 241; 2 Brick. Dig. p. 145.

If there was error in sustaining the demurrer to the second plea, it was error without injury to the defendant; because, under the fifth plea, the demurrer to which was overruled, he had the advantage of the same issue which he sought to present by the second plea. He had the full benefit of his denial of the existence of the judgments alleged in the complaint. Insurance Co. v. Copeland, 90 Ala. 386, 8 South. Rep. 48; Capital City Water Co. v. National Meter Co., 89 Ala. 401, 7 South. Rep. 419. Even if the plea of failure of consideration was available in an action on a judgment, the plea to that effect in this case was defective in failing to state the facts showing the substance of the matter relied on as a defense. Carmelich v. Mims, 88 Ala. 335, 6 South. Rep. 913. There was no consent to accept the plea in short.

The evidence in reference to the judgments, and to the contracts upon which they were recovered, corresponded with the allegations of the complaint as amended. Some of the allegations were superfluous, as has been already indicated. Some of the evidence which was objected to might have been inadmissible if immaterial issues had been excluded from the case, or if the defendant had availed himself of objections which might have been made under a different state of the pleadings. The third and fifth pleas, upon which alone issue was joined, were mere denials that the judgments sued on were obtained on notes in which the defendant waived his exemptions, that there was such waiver in said judgments, and that such judgments as were alleged in the complaint were obtained against the partnership of Marable & Sims at the August term, 1890, of said court. If no proper steps are taken by the defendant to eliminate false issues presented by the complaint, evidence may be received to support them, and they may be submitted to the jury. McKinnon v. Lessley, 89 Ala. 625, 8 South. Rep. 9; Allison v. Little, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 388. The evidence was directly pertinent to the allegations of the complaint, and, as it supported them, and was wholly uncontroverted, the defendant could not have been injured by the action of the court in giving the general charge requested in writing by the plaintiff. Affirmed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. R. CO. v. WATSON.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—DEFECTIVE PLATFORMS.

A passenger sued to recover of a railroad company for personal injuries occasioned by his stepping into a hole in a bridge, which was constructed on the company's right of way, and connected its depot platform with a hotel. The bridge had been constructed by the hotel proprietor, and turned over to the company for the use of passengers in going to and from the hotel for meals. It was several inches lower than the depot platform, and was not connected with the ticket office, except through another room. The company had never repaired or exercised any control over it, and it had not been used by the company for any purpose within three years prior to the accident. Held, that passengers could not be presumed to know in regard to the ownership or control of such a structure, and that the company was liable.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge. Affirmed.

This was an action by I. E. Watson against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Company to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a defective platform. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Knox & Bowie, for appellant. Kelly & Smith, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. This is the second appeal in this case. Watson v. Railroad Co., 8 South. Rep. 770. The opinion on the former appeal gives a full description of the platform on which the injury was suffered, together with its surroundings, by whom it was erected, its use, and everything connected with it, as disclosed in the record then presented. It also states how the injury was sustained, and the extent of it. We will not repeat what is there shown. In the record before us the following additional facts are presented: The railroad's right of way at that place extends each way 50 feet from the center of the track, and the hole into which plaintiff fell is on the right of way. The platform or bridge at the south end of the hotel—the one on which the injury was suffered—was built by the land company, was four inches lower than the other platform. It was not connected with the ticket-office, save by passing through another room; and said lower platform or bridge had not been used for any purpose by the railroad company within three years before the accident happened. Witness stated this as positive fact, and added he did not know it had been so used at any time before the three years. The railroad company had never repaired or taken any control of the bridge. On these newly-disclosed grounds it is contended plaintiff should not recover. The following facts may be stated as fully sustained by all the testimony: The hotel was situated near the railroad track; was an eating-house for passengers traveling on the road; a veranda extended entirely around the building; and each of the bridges or platforms—the one south of the hotel as well as the one connecting with its halls—spanned Crow's creek, and connected the hotel veranda with the railroad's platform at that stopping place. A train moving north and stopping with its forward car opposite the central bridge would place its next car opposite the lower bridge. We cannot suppose that travelers are informed as to the ownership or control of pass-ways thus circumstanced. They act on the appearance of things, and are authorized to so act. Seeing the two bridges or platforms extending from the railroad's platform proper to the ticket-office and eating-house, they may well suppose they are invited to take either. It is sometimes said a man may do as he will with his own. This is not universally true. Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas. No man is permitted to place traps or pitfalls, or to maintain them, even on his own lands, where others are likely to enter, without proper warning of the danger. Eminently is this true when there is likelihood that he will enter, and a quasi invitation that he shall do so. In Railway Co. v. Thompson, 77 Ala. 448, we said: "There is a common duty resting on all persons, artificial as well as natural, who own real estate on which the public is expressly or impliedly invited to enter, that it shall be kept free from traps and pitfalls; and, if this duty be neglected, and injury results therefrom to any person, the person suffering by such trap or pitfall may recover damages for the injury. This is a general rule of society, crystalized into law. It partakes of the nature of a public nuisance done or suffered, which inflicts special injury on an individual. To a suit for such injury it is no defense that the injury was not intended. Human conduct must be tested by its known general or ordinary consequences." 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 957, and note 2; Railroad Co. v. McLendon, 63 Ala. 266. We do not think the new testimony changes the legal aspects of the question presented, or relieves the railroad company of blame for the injury plaintiff suffered. Graves v. Thomas, 95 Ind. 361; Beck v. Carter, 68 N. Y. 283; Jones v. Nichols, 46 Ark. 207; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 117, 118.

SMITH et al. v. KAUFMAN.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—PROOF—KNOWLEDGE OF VENDEE—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Although a question which the trial court allows to be addressed to a witness, over the objection of a party, may have been improper, no injury, assuming the relevancy of the proposed testimony, can result where the answer is favorable.

2. Where goods are wrongfully levied on as the property of another, the owner is not obliged to make a claim bond, and have a trial as to the right of property in the goods, but may allow them to be carried away, and sue in trespass; and the fact that he told the sheriff "to go ahead and levy," stating at the same time that he would hold him responsible as for a trespass, does not confer upon the officer any right which he did not before possess, or estop the owner from the assertion of any right which would otherwise have been his.

3. In an action of trespass against a sheriff for attaching a stock of goods as that of the plaintiff's vendor, the question being whether the sale was fraudulent, a charge that the "courts will not strive to force conclusions of fraud, and, if the facts and circumstances relied on to sustain the charge of fraud are fairly susceptible of an honest intent, that construction will be placed upon them," is erroneous, as exacting a higher degree of proof than is required in other civil cases. Skipper v. Reeves, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 804, followed.

4. The fact that one, while negotiating for the purchase of a stock of goods, has access to invoices from the wholesalers, which show that the stock was purchased on credit, is not of itself sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the seller's solvency, where it does not appear that the invoices were dated, or the time of credit given, and there was nothing to indicate that the amounts they represented might not have been paid, or that they might not have antedated the longest term of credit known in that particular business.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge. Reversed.

This was an action of trespass brought by S. Kaufman against J. S. Smith, sheriff, and his sureties, to recover damages for trespass committed by said Smith by the alleged wrongful levy of an attachment upon the goods of the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded the general issue; that the goods did not belong to the plaintiff, but belonged to the defendant in attachment; that the defendant was sheriff; and that the other defendants, who were sureties, did not commit the trespass complained of. The evidence showed that the attachment was issued against one Jacob Bandman at the suit of creditors of said Bandman, and upon being placed in the hands of one J. H. Sharp, deputy-sheriff, was levied upon the goods which were in the store formerly occupied by said Bandman. It was further shown that Bandman had been in the mercantile business in Birmingham, and had sold his entire stock of goods, furniture, good-will, and license for cash to the plaintiff, Kaufman; that Kaufman went into immediate possession of the goods, and employed said Bandman as clerk for one or two months; and that at the time of the levy of the attachment Kaufman was in possession of and owner of the said goods, and Bandman was in the store as a clerk. The testimony of Bandman, among other things, tended to show that before the purchase he and Kaufman made an inventory of the goods in the store, and used, in making said inventory, bills and statements sent to Bandman by his creditors, and that these bills showed that the goods were bought and shipped on time or on credit. At the request of the plaintiff, in writing, the court gave the following charges: (1) "The court charges the jury that courts will not strive to force conclusions of fraud, and, if the facts and circumstances in evidence relied on to sustain the charge of fraud are fairly susceptible of an honest intent, that construction will be placed upon them." (2) "The court charges the jury that, if the plaintiff's goods were wrongfully levied upon, the law would not require the plaintiff to give a claim-bond, and have a trial of the right of the property in the goods levied on, but the law gave him the choice to allow the goods to be carried away, and, if the levy should be wrongful, to bring such an action as the present case, and secure damages for such wrongful act." The defendants duly excepted to the giving of each of these charges, and also separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following charges requested by them in writing: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff said to Sharp before he made any levy on the goods, and before Sharp had taken the goods into his possession, to 'go ahead and make the levy on the goods,' and that Sharp then proceeded to make the levy in this case, in pursuance to what the plaintiff told him to do, then I charge you, as this is a case of trespass, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and your verdict must be for defendants." (5) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, while negotiating for the purchase of said goods from the said Bandman, had access to and did see said bills, showed that said goods had been purchased on credit, that such knowledge was sufficient to put the plaintiff on inquiry as to the solvency of the said Bandman, and, if proper inquiry would have disclosed the insolvency of the said Bandman, then your verdict must be for defendant." (6) "That if the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff knew that Bandman had purchased the goods which he was offering to sell him, on credit, and that Bandman was selling him all of his stock of goods in bulk, and that Bandman had been doing a retail business in the city of Birmingham up to the time of said sale, and if you further believe from the evidence that Bandman at the time of said sale was insolvent, then I charge you that such circumstances were sufficient to put the plaintiff on inquiry as to the solvency of Bandman; and, if the jury believe that a proper inquiry on the part of the plaintiff would have disclosed the insolvency of Bandman, then I charge that you must find for defendants." There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Garrett & Underwood, for appellants. Lea & Bell, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. The question which the trial court allowed to be addressed to the witness Sharp, against defendants' objection, may have been improper,—it is not necessary to determine whether it was or not,—but, if so, no injury resulted to the appellants, in that Sharp's answer thereto—assuming the relevancy of the proposed testimony—was favorable to them. Holland v. Bergan, 89 Ala. 622, 7 South. Rep. 770; Insurance Co. v. Moog, 78 Ala. 284.

2. It seems that when the sheriff was about to levy on the goods found in Kaufman's possession as the property of Bandman he suggested to him that he make a claim-bond, and that, after consulting with his counsel, Kaufman declined to interpose a claim, preferring, as was stated at the time, to hold the sheriff responsible as for a trespass, and told the officer "to go ahead and levy," or "to go ahead and close the doors." Very clearly he had the unfettered right to make this election; and we are unable to conceive how the expression of the election, in the language we have quoted, could have conferred any right on the officer which he did not before possess, or in any way have prejudiced or estopped Kaufman from the assertion of any right which would otherwise have been his. Charge 2, given at the instance of the plaintiff, states the law correctly in this regard; and charges 1 and 2, requested by defendants, which were addressed to these matters, were well refused, when reference is had to the evidence, on the grounds both that they would have misled the jury, and that they were affirmatively erroneous.

3. Charge 1, requested by plaintiff, is substantially the same as an instruction held to be bad at the last term in the case of Skipper v. Reeves, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 804; and, for the reasons there set forth, we hold the giving of this charge to have been erroneous.

4. The insolvency of Bandman, from whom plaintiff purchased the goods, was not controverted. One of the main inquiries in the case was as to Kaufman's knowledge either of his vendor's insolvency or of facts which amounted to constructive notice of it. As pertinent to this inquiry, it was shown that Kaufman, in making an inventory of the stock with a view to its purchase, used invoices of certain of the goods which had been made out by the persons from whom Bandman had bought them, and that these bills showed that the goods had been bought on credit. It was not made to appear what dates the bills have, nor the time of credit in any instance, nor, indeed, that either of these facts were shown by them. For aught that does appear, these bills may have antedated the longest term of credit known in the particular line of business. Moreover, there is no evidence that the bills indicated that the amounts they represented had not been paid. All, in fact, which it can be affirmed that they tended to show was that Bandman at some time in the past had bought some of the goods found in the stock on time. We are far from believing that this fact was sufficient to raise up in the mind of Kaufman suspicion of Bandman's solvency, sufficient to put upon him the onus of inquiry on that subject, and to charge him with a knowledge of all the facts which such inquiry, diligently prosecuted, would have disclosed. On the contrary, we apprehend that the naked fact of Bandman's having been able to purchase goods on a credit—and that is all we have here—would rather tend to prevent and allay suspicion of his solvency than otherwise. Charges 5 and 6 of defendants' series, which assert that the facts that Kaufman saw the bills of the goods in question as furnished to Bandman by the merchants from whom he purchased, and that said bills showed the purchases to have been made on credit, were sufficient to put the plaintiff on inquiry, etc., were, in our opinion, properly refused. Stix v. Keith, 85 Ala. 465, 5 South. Rep. 184. The questions arising out of the trial court's refusing charges 3 and 4, requested by defendants, need not arise on another trial, and we deem it unnecessary to decide them. For the error pointed out above, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ADERHOLD et al. v. BLUTHENTHAL et al.

LANDLORD'S LIEN — PRIORITIES — ATTACHMENT — VALIDITY.

1. Where plaintiffs, by their agent, purchased goods subject to a landlord's lien for rent, and the goods remaining in the vendor's possession are sold by regular process to satisfy the lien, the ignorance of their agent that the person from whom the goods were purchased lived in a rented house, which fact was known to the principals, cannot avail them in an action for damages against the landlord for the conversion of the goods.

2. Where an attachment is sued out for rent and levied on goods subject to the landlord's lien, and the attachment is prosecuted to judgment, the validity of the judgment and the sale of the property under the attachment cannot be invalidated by proof that notes given for the rent had been hypothecated before the suing out of the attachment.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge. Reversed.

Action by Bluthenthal and Beckett against T. M. Aderhold and others for the conversion of goods. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

On December 5, 1888, T. M. Aderhold rented a store-house to Harry Toole for the term of one year from January 1, 1889, at a monthly rental of $75, payable in advance. On February 14, 1889, Toole having disposed of substantially all his goods without the consent of his landlord, and without having paid the rent in full for the term, J. E. Aderhold, as the agent of T. M. Aderhold, applied to a justice of the peace and obtained an attachment for rent, returnable to the circuit court of Calhoun county. This attachment was placed in the hands of H. W. Finney, acting as a deputy-sheriff, who in that capacity levied the attachment on the goods, the subject-matter of this suit. T. M. Aderhold was not present when the attachment was levied, and never had possession of the goods. While in the possession of the sheriff under the levy, the house in which the goods were caught fire, and the goods were materially injured by the fire. Aderhold prosecuted his suit to judgment in the circuit court, and all the papers in that cause, with the judgment of the circuit court, appear in this record. Appellees brought this action on April 29, 1889, for damages against the appellants for the conversion of the goods levied on under the attachment. Defendants pleaded "Not guilty," and the regularity of the process, and on November 30, 1889, by leave of the court, filed an amended plea, setting up the contract between Aderhold and Toole, the issuance of said attachment, and the averment that said goods were liable to said attachment for the satisfaction of said landlord's liens. Defendant Finney justified under the process. On the trial of the cause the plaintiffs introduced in evidence as their basis of title a bill of sale by which the property of said Toole was purported to be conveyed unto them, the alleged consideration of such conveyance being the payment of an antecedent debt. It was further shown that this transaction was conducted by A. D. Meadors as the agent of the plaintiffs. He testified that at the time of the transaction he did not know that said Toole was a tenant of said Aderhold, and that he made no inquiry concerning his possession of the said house. But it was shown by Toole's testimony that he was a tenant of said Aderhold, and that the plaintiffs were notified that the house he was occupying was a rented one, and that he had no real estate anywhere in the said county. The defendant offered in evidence the lease, contract, and the certified transcript of the attachment papers. They also introduced J. E. Aderhold, who testified that, in the absence of T. M. Aderhold, he was his agent, and sued out the said attachment, and at the same time had it levied upon the goods in question. He also testified that the notes given by Toole for the rent of the store-house had been given to one Lewis as collateral security for the said T. M. Aderhold's debt to him, and that said notes were held by Lewis at the time of the attachment, but, as the notes fell due, they were taken up by said T. M. Aderhold, some time after the attachment. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Caldwell & Johnston, for appellants. Gordon Macdonald and Blackwell & Keith, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The goods, when purchased by plaintiffs, were in a rented store-house, and subject to the landlord's lien. Code, § 3069. The goods were purchased in bulk, and the consideration was the payment of an antecedent debt. Moreover, the goods had not been removed from the store-house when they were levied upon at the suit of the landlord by attachment for the enforcement of his rent debt. The sale of the goods by the tenant did not displace the prior lien of the landlord. Weil v. McWhorter, 10 South. Rep. 131, (at present term.) It was proven by the witness Toole, and not controverted, that appellees knew that Toole occupied a rented store-house, and owned no real property in Alabama. This was notice that the landlord's lien attached to the goods in the rented store-house. Lomax v. Le Grand, 60 Ala. 537; Boggs v. Price, 64 Ala. 514; Scalfe v. Stovall, 67 Ala. 237. Having notice themselves, the ignorance of their attorney and agent, Meador, through whom the goods were purchased, cannot avail them.

It is contended that as Aderhold, the landlord, had transferred the rent-notes of Toole to Lewis as collateral security to a debt he was owing to Lewis, and as the rent-notes were so held by Lewis when the attachment for the rent was sued out by the landlord against the tenant, the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the case, and that the judgment rendered is a mere nullity. This position is untenable under the facts disclosed in the record. The proceedings of the attachment suit in the circuit court on their face were in all respects regular. The court had jurisdiction of the persons and subject-matter. Its judgment is conclusive, as between the landlord and tenant, of the amount due for rent, and that it was due the landlord. The defendant in that suit, if the facts justified it, might have shown that the plaintiff did not own the debt, and was not the proper person to sue; but a stranger to that suit cannot show in a collateral proceeding that the plaintiff was not the owner of the claim, and not entitled to maintain the action. If neither the holder of the collateral nor the debtor objects to the party suing, a stranger to the action cannot interfere to defeat the suit, or, after judgment, impeach its validity as between the parties to the suit. The case of Ware v. Russell, 57 Ala. 43, is not in conflict with this principle.

Appellees having shown title to the property by their purchase from the tenant, it was competent for them to impeach the judgment obtained by Aderhold, the landlord, against Toole, his tenant, for fraud, or to have shown it was not founded on a rental debt, or that the debt had in fact been paid. As to these questions the judgment in the circuit court was, as to the plaintiffs in this suit, res inter alios acta. Dryer v. Abercrombie, 57 Ala. 497; Boswell v. Carlisle, 55 Ala. 554. It having been shown, however, that Toole was indebted for the rent of the store-house; that the landlord's lien attached to the goods for the rental debt; that he sued out an attachment for rent, which was levied upon the goods in the store-house, subject to the landlord's lien, and this attachment was prosecuted to judgment in the circuit court,—the validity of this judgment and sale of the property under the attachment cannot be impeached or invalidated by proof that the rent-notes upon which the attachment issued had been transferred as collateral security before the suing out of the attachment; and this would be true even though it had not been proven, as it was, that after the attachment issued, and before judgment, the debt for which the rent-notes were hypothecated as collateral security was fully paid by the landlord, and the rent-notes returned to him. It is thought that these principles will be sufficient to guide the court on another trial without noticing in detail the several questions raised by the pleadings. The ruling of the trial court did not accord with the principles of law as here declared, and the conclusion reached was not authorized by the evidence. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

GRIEL v. LOMAX et al.

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT — FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Defendant and one M. and O. purchased land, agreeing to pay one-third in cash, and execute their notes for the balance, payable in one and two years. Plaintiffs agreed to buy defendant's interest, on his representation that to get his title they would have to pay one-third of the cash payment, and execute their separate notes for one-third of the deferred payments. Plaintiffs paid defendant $100 for his interest, but afterwards learned that it would be necessary for them to execute their joint notes with M. and O. for the deferred payments, and this M. and O. declined to do, and thereby defeated the purchase. Held, in an action to recover the $100, that it was error to charge that, though defendant may have stated facts which showed that the purchase was joint, and that he, M., and O. were required to execute their joint notes, yet, if he expressed the opinion that under this contract plaintiffs could get his interest by paying one-third cash and executing their separate notes for one-third the deferred payment, and this opinion was fraudulently expressed with intent to deceive, that would avoid the contract, since an expression of opinion, falsely made, with intent to deceive, even though acted on, avoids a contract only when the parties deceived were justified in relying on the opinion.

2. A request to charge which assumes disputed facts, and ignores material testimony, is properly refused.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge. Reversed.

Action by Tennant Lomax and others against Jacob Griel to recover $100. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. For former hearings, see 5 South. Rep. 325, 6 South. Rep. 741.

This was an action for money had and received, brought by the appellees against the appellant to recover $100 paid by them to him on a contract for the purchase of an interest in two lots in the city of Sheffield; and it is based on the alleged fraud on the part of the defendant in the misrepresentation of a material fact by him in regard to the contract of purchase, under which the defendant claimed an interest in the lots in question. The facts relied upon by the plaintiff are substantially as follows: That at the time of the making of the contract referred to the defendant and one Matthews and O'Connell had entered into a verbal contract to purchase said lots from one A. J. Moses, agreeing to pay him one-third of the purchase money in cash, and execute their notes, payable in one and two years, for the deferred payments; that in a conversation with the plaintiffs, which led up to their contract, Griel stated to them that all they would have to do in order to get his title would be for them to pay one-third of the cash payment, and execute their separate notes for one-third of the deferred payments; and on this representation the contract was consummated by plaintiffs paying defendant $100 for his interest in the purchased lots. The plaintiffs, in seeking to get the interest contracted for, ascertained that in order to do so it would be necessary for them to execute their joint notes with Matthews and O'Connell for the deferred payment, instead of executing their separate notes for one-third of that sum, as represented by Griel; and that said Matthews and O'Connell declined to execute said notes with them, and thereby defeated the purchase. It was contended by plaintiffs that, relying upon the statement made by Griel, they were deceived and damaged thereby, and that they had no knowledge of the terms of the contract of purchase between Moses and Griel, Matthews, and O'Connell, further than that told them by Griel, which had preceded the contract between the plaintiffs and defendant. The testimony of Lomax, Massie, and Sayre, respectively, is sufficiently stated in the opinion. The defendant reserved exceptions to several portions of the general charge given by the court, among which was the following: "(5) If merely asserting his opinion as to what was his belief, why then, in order to become a fraud, Mr. Griel must have known it to be a fraud, and used it for the purpose of leading these men into making that contract, and they were thereby misled, and made that contract. When it is a mere misrepresentation, and not the expression of an opinion, it is immaterial whether Mr. Griel knew that it was false or not." At the request of the plaintiffs the court gave the following written charges: "(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that Griel stated to plaintiffs that all they would have to do to get a good title to his (Griel's) interest in the lots in Sheffield would be to pay in money one-third of the cash payment, and to execute their notes for one-third of the deferred payments, and that this was a statement of a fact, and not merely an opinion, and was accepted and relied on as true by plaintiffs, but was in fact false, then this would be a misrepresentation of a material fact, and would vitiate the contract; and, if plaintiffs were justified in relying on said statement, and did rely on it, and were deceived thereby, they would be entitled to recover if they got nothing by their contract by reason thereof. (2) If the jury believe from the evidence that Griel stated to plaintiffs that all they had to do to get a good title to his (Griel's) interest in the Sheffield lots would be to pay in money one-third of the cash payment, and to execute their notes for one-third of the two-thirds balance, and further believe that this statement was a statement that separate notes were to be given by Griel and his associates, and not joint notes, and that the truth was that joint notes were to be given by him and his co-purchasers, this would be a misrepresentation of a material fact, which would vitiate the contract, if the plaintiffs relied on the statement, and the jury believe said plaintiffs were justified in relying on it as an inducement to the contract, and were thereby deceived and injured, and this would be true, although Griel did not know his statement to be untrue, and if thereby plaintiffs were induced to pay their money to Griel, they would be entitled to recover." The defendant separately excepted to the giving of each of these charges, and also separately and severally excepted to the court's refusal to each of the following charges requested by him in writing: "(1) Before the jury can find for the plaintiffs in this action they must believe from the evidence that Griel knew that the contract with Moses required that joint notes were to be made by himself and Matthews and O'Connell, and not only failed to disclose that fact to plaintiffs, but they must also believe that he failed to disclose such fact with the intent to deceive the plaintiffs, and did deceive them. (2) That it is not necessary for the plaintiffs to have actually known that the purchase of the lots from Moses by O'Connell, Matthews, and Griel was a joint purchase, if there were facts and circumstances which reasonably put them on inquiry as to whether it was or was not a joint purchase. (3) That the written contract offered in evidence by which the defendant sold his interest to plaintiffs in the lots purchased by defendant and Matthews and O'Connell from Moses shows that the purchase by defendant, Matthews, and O'Connell from Moses was a joint purchase, and it was notice to the plaintiffs of that fact. (4) When Griel stated to plaintiffs that he, Matthews, and O'Connell had together purchased the lots from Moses, this put plaintiffs on inquiry as to whether joint notes were to be made by said purchasers to Moses. (5) Before the jury can find for the plaintiffs in this action they believe from the evidence that Griel failed to disclose to the plaintiffs that the notes to be made to Moses were to be joint notes of Griel, O'Connell, and Matthews, and that he failed to disclose that fact with intent to deceive the plaintiffs, or for the purpose of influencing or inducing plaintiffs to make the purchase from him. (6) Before the jury can find for the plaintiffs in this action they must believe from the evidence that the agreement between Moses and O'Connell, Griel, and Matthews was that O'Connell, Griel, and Matthews were to execute joint notes for the purchase of the lots sold by him, and that Griel failed to disclose that fact to the plaintiffs with intent to deceive the plaintiffs, or for the purpose of influencing them to purchase this third interest in said purchase. (7) That the law raises the presumption that when Matthews and O'Connell and defendant jointly purchased the lots from Moses, that they were to execute joint notes for the deferred payments, and the plaintiffs were bound to know this presumption of the law."

Arrington & Graham, for appellant. G. M. Mauks, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. This is the third appeal in this case. Many of the principles of law involved in the present appeal as presented by the present record were settled when the case was here on former appeals. 89 Ala. 420, 6 South. Rep. 741. We then held that if Griel represented that separate notes were to be given, and the truth was that joint notes were to be given by him and his copartners, this would be the misrepresentation of a material fact, which would vitiate the contract, if the plaintiffs relied upon such statement, and were justified, by the circumstances, in relying on it as an inducement to such contract, and were thereby deceived and injured. And this would follow although Griel did not know his statement in this respect was untrue. The testimony of the witnesses Lomax and Massie, if credited by the jury as being a full and correct statement of the transaction, brings the case fairly within the application of this principle of law. The former testifies, among other things, that Griel said all that plaintiffs would have to do to get a title to the land which plaintiffs were contracting to purchase from him was to make a one-third cash payment, and execute their notes for one-third of the two deferred payments. The witness Massie, on cross-examination, testified substantially to the same facts, being more specific in stating that they were to pay one-third cash, and to give separate notes for the one-third deferred payments. The testimony of these two witnesses, fairly construed, excludes the idea that in naming these statements the defendant Griel was merely expressing his opinion as to the effect and meaning of his contract with Moses, from whom he purchased the land. There is nothing in their testimony from which it could be remotely inferred, or even conjectured, that, in order to get a title to the land, it would be necessary for them to execute joint notes with O'Connell and Matthews, and thus obligate themselves to be responsible for the payment of a two-thirds interest of the land sold to other parties; or that their rights and interests in any respect depended upon the future action of other parties. There is nothing in all their testimony in regard to Griel's statements which authorizes the inference that they were to become joint purchasers with O'Connell and Matthews, or to put them on inquiry of this fact. The testimony of the witness Sayre is not so full as that of these two witnesses Lomax and Massie, and, as we interpret his evidence, it calls into application a different principle of law. His version of the matter is that Griel stated that he, (Griel,) O'Connell, and Matthews bought two lots from Moses for about $5,000; that they were to pay one-third cash, one-third in one year, and one-third in two years, and when plaintiffs paid one-third cash and executed their notes for the deferred payments, "you will step into my shoes, and I step out." This statement, if made to plaintiffs, tends to show a joint purchase by Griel, O'Connell, and Matthews, and implies that joint notes were to be executed by Griel, O'Connell, and Matthews. 89 Ala., 6 South. Rep., supra. If plaintiffs were informed by Griel that such was the condition of his interest and character of his purchase from Moses, and then stated to plaintiffs all that was necessary for them to do to get title to the land would be to pay one-third cash and execute their separate notes for one-third of the deferred payments, such statement would not be the affirmation of a fact, but the mere expression of his opinion as to the meaning or legal effect of his contract of purchase with Moses. The facts are sufficient to show that plaintiffs had the right to rely upon every statement of fact made by Griel in regard to the terms of his purchase from Moses. And if Griel did not undertake or pretend to state the terms of his purchase from Moses, or the condition of his title, but did state that all plaintiffs had to do to get a deed to his third interest was to pay one-third in cash, and execute their separate notes for the payment of the deferred third interest, transferred to them, plaintiffs had the right to rely upon this statement as representing that Griel's title and purchase from Moses was such that he was authorized to sell it separately, and that his title could be acquired by the execution of their separate notes. Such a statement impliedly affirms the existence of every fact necessary to sustain the statement. It repels every suggestion that the original vendees of Moses were to execute joint notes for the purchase money. Such a misrepresentation was constructively fraudulent, whether willfully and intentionally made or not. On the other hand, if plaintiffs were informed by Griel that he, O'Connell, and Matthews purchased the two lots at a gross sum, and that they were to pay one-third cash and execute their notes for the deferred payment, plaintiffs are held to know the legal effect of such a contract, and that it implies the execution of joint notes for the deferred payment. If Griel thus stated the terms of his purchase, and then said to plaintiffs all they had to do to get a deed to his third interest in the land was to pay one-third cash, and execute their separate notes for the deferred payment, this would be no more than the expression of his opinion as to the legal effect of his contract of purchase from Moses. In one case plaintiffs are not informed as to the terms of Griel's purchase from Moses, and have the right to presume that Griel knows and understands his contract, and states truly his title, and how it may be conveyed. In the other case, plaintiffs are informed of the facts and terms of Griel's purchase from Moses, and, being thus placed in possession of the facts and of his title, in the absence of confidential relations or other special circumstances which do not arise in this case, plaintiffs had no right to rely upon the opinion of Griel as to the legal effect of the contract. A mere opinion of the legal effect of a contract, after stating fairly the facts and condition of the contract, under such circumstances as are developed by the testimony in this case, whether made in ignorance or with the intention to deceive, will not avail plaintiffs. They had no right to rely or act upon Griel's opinion, and, if thereby misled, they must take the consequences. The evidence of the witness Griel throws very little light on the question. In one place he says "he told them the terms of the purchase," but nowhere does he state what he did tell them. Whether the terms were the same as testified to by Lomax and Massie or by Sayre, or whether he gave a different version, or made any statement as to the terms, does not appear. The principle of law which declares that a contract may be avoided as fraudulent upon the ground that the parties were misled and deceived by the expression of an opinion fraudulently made with the intent to deceive, does not arise upon the evidence in the present record. There is no promise of future performance. Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Co. v. Elyton Land Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 235.

The material questions are: Did Griel make such a statement of facts in regard to his purchase from Moses as to indicate that he had the right to sell his interest separately, and that his vendees could step into his shoes by paying one-third cash and executing their separate notes for the deferred payment of one-third; or did he, without undertaking to state the terms and conditions of his purchase from Moses, represent to his vendees that upon payment of one-third cash and the execution of their separate notes for the deferred payment of this third interest they could step into his shoes? If he did, and the evidence shows that this was untrue, and that joint notes with O'Connell and Matthews for a much larger sum were required, this would be misrepresentation of facts; and, if the parties relied upon this statement, and were misled by it, and had no information except such as derived from Griel, it was a fraud, and would avoid the contract, whether Griel knew the statements were false, or whether made with the intent to deceive. On the other hand, did Griel tell the plaintiffs, as testified to by Sayre, or otherwise inform them, that his purchase from Moses was jointly with others, and that joint notes with others were to be executed for the whole of the two lots, or make statements which legally implied it, and, as a matter of opinion of the legal effect of the contract of purchase from Moses, state that plaintiffs could get title to his one-third interest by paying one-third cash and executing their separate notes for the deferred payment of his third interest? If so, under the evidence in this case, the expression of his opinion, whether made ignorantly or with intent to deceive, was not a fraud upon plaintiffs available to them. These are the only material questions in the case not heretofore decided, and whether the evidence sustained the one or the other was a matter for the jury. The fifth exception to the general charge of the court was well taken. The principle asserted by the charge to which this exception applies is to the effect that, although Griel may have stated facts which showed that his purchase from Moses was joint, and that he, O'Connell, and Matthews were required to execute joint notes, yet, if he expressed the opinion that under this contract plaintiffs could get his interest by paying one-third cash and executing their separate notes for the deferred payment for this third interest, and this opinion was fraudulently expressed with intent to deceive, that would avoid the contract. It is not every expression of opinion, falsely made with intent to deceive, even though acted upon, that avoids a contract. As we have shown, it is only in cases where the parties deceived were justified in trusting to and relying upon the opinion that the principle applies. We find no merit in the other exceptions to the general charge, or error in the charges given at the request of the plaintiff. Charges 1, 5, and 6, requested by the defendant, conflict with the law as we have declared it, and were properly refused. There is no evidence calculated to put plaintiffs on inquiry, except it be that of Sayre. His testimony, unexplained, discloses the fact of a joint purchase, and the defendant received the benefit of this phase of the evidence in the charge given by the court; otherwise the charge is abstract. Charge 3 places an improper construction on the written agreement referred to. Charge 4 assumes a disputed fact, and asserts an unauthorized conclusion, and ignores material testimony in the case. Charge 7 assumes that plaintiffs knew of the joint purchase from Moses, and is misleading. For the fifth exception to the general charge of the court the case is reversed. Reversed and remanded.

WADE v. STATE.

VIOLATION OF CONTRACT WITH SURETY—VARIANCE.

In a prosecution under Code, § 3832, for failure of defendant to perform the service stipulated for in a contract made by him in consideration of another becoming his surety on a confession of judgment for a fine and costs assessed against him on conviction of a misdemeanor, the complaint alleged that defendant signed a written contract whereby "he did agree to work on the farm of G. until said fine and costs were paid." The contract introduced in support of the allegation read, "I agree to work on the farm of E.," etc. Held, that the variance between the allegation and the proofs were fatal.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; W. C. ROBINSON, Judge.

Alexander Wade was convicted of violating his contract with his surety in a confessed judgment for fine and costs, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. & R. B. Barnes, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. This is a prosecution, under section 3832 of the Code of Alabama, for the alleged failure by the defendant, without a good and sufficient excuse, to perform the service stipulated for by a contract made by him in consideration of another becoming his surety on a confession of judgment for the fine and costs assessed against the defendant on his conviction for a misdemeanor. The complaint or statement by the solicitor, on which the defendant was tried, alleges that the defendant did, in open court, sign a written contract whereby "he did agree to work on the farm of R. B. Goins, in said county, at eight dollars per month and board until said fine and costs were paid." The language of the contract, which was received in evidence against the defendant's objection, is: "I agree to work on the farm of said Ellic Wade in said county at the sum of eight dollars per month," etc. It is plain that the contract which was admitted in evidence does not answer to the description of the contract alleged in the complaint or statement filed by the solicitor. An allegaton that the defendant contracted to work on the farm of one person cannot be sustained by proof of a contract by the defendant to work on the farm of some other person. There is nothing in the contract, as proved, to show that the defendant's agreement was to work on the farm of Goins. If there had been other terms in the written instrument which clearly showed that the services stipulated for were to be rendered on the farm of the person contracted with, then, perhaps, it would have been permissible, in giving effect to the intention of the parties as disclosed by the whole instrument, to treat the insertion, in the clause above quoted, of the name of Ellic Wade instead of that of Goins as a clerical mistake, the correction of which was furnished by the other provisions of the contract. If there had been such other provisions, it would, perhaps, have been proper to construe the contract as binding the defendant to work upon the farm of R. B. Goins. But this meaning cannot be given to the contract as proved, for there is no term in that contract to show that such was the intention of the parties. There is nothing on the face of the instrument to show that a mistake was made in naming the wrong person as the owner of the farm on which the work stipulated for was to be performed. The court cannot disregard the plain terms used by the parties on the assumption that it is impossible or absurd to conclude that the defendant intended to bind himself to render services for another person on his own farm. Indeed, such assumption would be wholly unwarranted. One may as well contract to do an act or to perform services upon his own land as upon the land of another. The person contracted with may have possession of the land as a tenant, and be entitled to the benefit of work that may be done thereon. It is not impossible that the farm of Ellic Wade, which is mentioned in the contract as proved, was the property of some other person bearing the same name as the defendant. However that may be, and whatever may have been the intention of the parties which was not disclosed in the writing, the court is not at liberty to give to their contract a meaning which cannot be deduced from its terms. There was a fatal variance between the allegation and the proof of the contract, and the defendant's objection on this ground to the admission of the instrument which was received in evidence should have been sustained. The charge made against the defendant cannot be supported by evidence of his violation of the terms of the contract, which was proved. Reversed and remanded.

ALABAMA G. S. R. CO. v. TAPIA.

DEMURRER—CARRIERS—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—EVIDENCE—PLEADING.

1. Unless a demurrer to a complaint goes to the whole of the plaintiff's case, it should be overruled, whether the position taken by the demurrant is abstractly sound or not.

2. A complaint in an action against a railroad company alleged that defendant's conductor wrongfully compelled the plaintiff, who had taken passage and paid his fare on one of defendant's trains, to leave the train at an intermediate station, and that in doing so the conductor was abusive, using language which was derogatory to his character for honesty, and which imported a charge that he was attempting to proceed on his journey without paying his fare. The evidence was that the conductor, after an altercation with the plaintiff as to whether the latter had paid his fare, determined upon putting him off, and directed the flagman to look after him. The flagman, in the presence of the conductor, and as part of the said altercation, told the plaintiff that he would have to pay his fare or they would put him off. The flagman testified that he was in the habit of helping the conductor take up tickets, and that he was authorized by the conductor to put off passengers when they would not pay their fare. Held, that as this evidence tended to show that the flagman was acting for the conductor, and in execution of the latter's orders, it was admissible in support of the allegation that the conductor himself had wrongfully compelled the plaintiff to leave the train; and although nothing was claimed on account of the abusive language of the flagman, and damages therefore could not be imposed on account of it, it was nevertheless admissible as a part of the res gestæ attending the ejection of the plaintiff.

3. Instructions which asserted that there was no evidence that "the conductor used language derogatory to plaintiff's character as an honest man," or that he, "in effect, charged plaintiff with attempting to ride on said train without paying his fare," or "that the feelings or pride of the plaintiff were sorely wounded, or that he suffered any mental distress or humiliation, by reason of being required to get off the train," were properly refused, on the ground that the facts attending the ejection of the plaintiff were such that the jury might well have inferred the existence of the matters therein denied.

4. An instruction which asserted that there was no evidence that the flagman was authorized to put the plaintiff off the train was also properly refused, on the ground that the facts were such that the jury might well have inferred the existence of such authority.

5. The testimony of a witness that the conductor seemed to be anxious to get the matter settled as to whether the plaintiff had paid his fare, and that, in the witness' opinion, the conductor acted as well as a man could do in such a case, was properly refused, as expressing merely the opinion of the witness.

6. An averment of special damages in an action against a railroad company for wrongfully ejecting the plaintiff from one of its trains, in that it was necessary for him to telegraph his family and business associates of his whereabouts, does not apprise the defendant that plaintiff will attempt to prove that he had to send a telegram to his brother to request him to attend to a matter of urgent business, which plaintiff's enforced delay prevented him from attending to in person.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

This was an action by Joseph R. Tapia against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company to recover for being wrongfully ejected from one of the defendant's trains. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wood & Wood, for appellant. Bowman & Harsh, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. 1. The demurrers to the complaint were properly overruled; and this, whether the legal positions taken by the demurrant were abstractly sound or not. Not one of the grounds assigned, nor all of them together, professed to answer, or did in fact answer, the whole complaint, but each of them was addressed to its supposed insufficiency in respect of some one item or specification of damage, and none of them goes to the denial of the whole cause of action relied on by plaintiff. As was said in Kennon v. Telegraph Co., (Ala.,) 9 South. Rep. 200: "Causes cannot be determined by piecemeal on demurrer. The pleader must answer the whole complaint, and for all purposes, when he resorts to this mode of defense. When the cause of action is sufficiently stated to authorize a recovery * * * of any damages, a partial defense, going to a denial of the right to recover a part of the damages claimed, must be availed of and effectuated by motion to strike out the objectionable averments, or by objections to the evidence, and through instructions to the jury." Hays v. Anderson, 57 Ala. 375; Flournoy v. Lyon, 70 Ala. 308; Daughtery v Telegraph Co., 75 Ala. 168.

2. The gravamen of the complaint is that defendant's conductor wrongfully required and compelled plaintiff, who had taken passage and paid his fare from Eutaw to Birmingham on one of defendant's trains, to leave the cars at Cottondale, an intermediate station, a considerable distance short of his destination, and that in and about requiring plaintiff to thus leave the train the conductor was abusive and insulting to him, using language which was derogatory to his character as an honest man, and which imported a charge that he was attempting to proceed on his journey without paying his fare, etc. The evidence was without conflict to the point that soon after passing

Tuscaloosa the conductor determined upon putting plaintiff off the train, informed him that he must get off, and directed the flagman to look after him. Plaintiff's testimony tended to show that the conductor told him he must get off at the next station, which was Cottondale. It was also in evidence that the flagman, in the presence of the conductor, and as a part of the altercation as to whether plaintiff had paid his fare, said, "We will put you off," and told the plaintiff, when the latter proffered a check which he claimed the conductor had given him, that it was not his check, and that he would have to pay his fare or get off. The flagman himself testified as follows: "I was in the habit of helping the conductor take up tickets and of putting checks in the hats of passengers. * * * I never put any passengers off before unless they were without their tickets. The conductor did authorize me to put them off when they would not pay their fare. When a man is trying to beat the road, we put him off." All this afforded the basis for an inference to be drawn by the jury that the flagman acted in the premises for the conductor, and in execution of the latter's directions; and when this evidence is considered, in connection with the common knowledge that conductors have the superintendence and control of their trains and of all other trainmen, and that it is one of the ordinary duties of flagmen and brakemen to assist and carry out the orders of conductors with respect to refractory passengers, we cannot be in doubt but that all that was said and done by the flagman in this instance, in and about ejecting plaintiff from the train, was properly allowed to go to the jury in support of the averments of the complaint that the conductor wrongfully required and compelled the plaintiff to leave the train; the flagman being the mere instrument for the effectuation of the conductor's orders, and the act done, and the circumstances under which it was done, being as much that of the conductor, and as fully characterized as his act by the attendant circumstances, as if no intermediary or agency had been employed to its consummation. Railroad Co. v. Frazier, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 303. Nothing is claimed in the complaint, however, on account of harsh or abusive language on the part of the flagman towards the plaintiff, and the language employed by him while executing the determination of the conductor to put plaintiff off the cars could not be made the basis for the imposition of damages, but it was none the less admissible as a part of the res gestæ of the main fact,—the ejection of the plaintiff,—and as going to show that the plaintiff was required and compelled to leave the train by the conductor, acting as to the final accomplishment of his purpose in this regard through the instrumentality of his assistant, the flagman. The several exceptions reserved in this connection are without merit.

3. A part of the court's general charge bearing upon defendant's liability for language used by the flagman is set out in the bill of exceptions, and properly so, at the instance of the presiding judge; and this very accurately and succinctly guards the jury against the imposition of any damages on account of the mere words of the flagman. No exception whatever was reserved to the part of the charge thus incorporated in the record, but argument is submitted here against its correctness. For this reason we refer to it here only to observe that in the first place the charge is unobjectionable, and, in the next, that, whether objectionable or not, it is not presented here for review.

4. There was no error in excluding from the jury the testimony of the witness Barnes, with respect to the efforts of the conductor to ascertain whether the plaintiff had paid his fare to Birmingham, as he claimed to have done, to the effect that "the conductor seemed to be anxious to get the matter settled;" that "the conductor's actions showed that he was doing his utmost to get the matter settled without further trouble;" and that, "in my opinion, Conductor Ford conducted himself as well as a man could do in such a case." These were not "short-hand" renderings of fact, but patently the opinion and conclusions of the witness upon certain facts which themselves should have been adduced in evidence, and upon which the jury alone were to pass judgment and make up their opinion and conclusion as to whether the conductor was at fault in the premises immediately involved. Tanner v. Railroad Co., 60 Ala. 621; Hames v. Brownlee, 63 Ala. 277; Loeb v. Flash, 65 Ala. 526; Baker v. Trotter, 73 Ala. 277; Poe v. State, 87 Ala. 65, 6 South. Rep. 378.

5. The complaint claims damages, for that the plaintiff "lost a long time, to-wit, five days, from his business, and was put to great inconvenience and expense; and, among other things, he was compelled to pay a large amount, to-wit, twenty-five dollars, for board and lodging and necessary personal expenses in Cottondale, and for telegrams necessary to inform his family and business associates of his whereabouts, and for transportation to his said destination;" and further damages for that plaintiff was humiliated and sorely wounded in his feelings and pride, and injured in his reputation, by reason of being compelled to leave the train under the circumstances alleged. Special damages are such as result naturally, but not necessarily, from the wrong complained of. This principle is aptly illustrated in the present case on the claim for damages, which is made to rest upon the necessity under which the ejection of plaintiff from the train placed him to send telegrams "to his family and business associates to inform them of his whereabouts." Manifestly this was not a necessary result to plaintiff from being put off the train, and forced to remain for a time at Cottondale,—not such a result as in all cases would ensue from the facts alleged,—and yet it was a natural consequence of those facts, filling the definition of "special damage." It is a familiar rule of pleading that before such damages can be recovered they must be specially alleged, to the end that the defendant, apprised by general averments of damage of a claim of such only as necessarily result from the wrong, may not be taken by surprise on the trial. And upon such special averment there must be strict correspondence of proof. The defendant has a right to assume that that which is thus particularly alleged, and that only, will be attempted to be proved, and to prepare for the trial accordingly. Now, under the averment we have quoted, the plaintiff, against defendant's objection, was allowed to prove, not that he had "to send telegrams to his family and business associates to inform them of his whereabouts," but that he sent a telegram to his brother in the city of Montgomery, requesting him to attend to a matter of urgent business, which plaintiff's enforced delay at Cottondale prevented his attending to in person. It does not appear that there was any necessity for plaintiff to inform his brother of his whereabouts, or that he did in fact so inform him; nor does it appear that plaintiff's brother was a business associate or a member of the latter's family, in the usual acceptance of that term, or in the sense implying a necessity that the plaintiff should advise him that he was at Cottondale. After much consideration, accompanied with reluctance to reverse the judgment of the trial court on a point involving so small a part of the damages claimed and found by the jury, we are forced to the conclusion that the averment of a necessity to acquaint his family and business associates by telegram of his whereabouts did not apprise the defendant that plaintiff would attempt at the trial to prove that he had, by telegram, requested his brother to attend to the matter of business in question, and hence that evidence of the last-named necessity was improperly received.

Charge 8, requested by the defendant in this connection, to the effect that there was no evidence in the case of a necessity upon plaintiff to inform his family and business associates of his whereabouts, was, however, it would seem, properly refused; as, while no testimony was directly adduced in that regard, there was yet room for an inference to be drawn by the jury of such necessity.

6. Charges 3, 5, 6, 26, and 34, requested by defendant, were properly refused, on the ground that there was evidence before the jury from which they had the right to infer the existence of every fact which they severally would have put the court in the attitude of declaring, which found no lodgment in any tendency of the testimony. Charges 3, 5, 6, and 34, respectively, assert that there is no evidence that "the conductor used language derogatory to plaintiff's character as an honest man," or that he, "in effect, charged plaintiff with attempting to ride on said train without paying his fare," or that "the feelings and pride of the plaintiff were sorely wounded," or that plaintiff "suffered any mental distress or humiliation by reason of being required to get off the train." Now, there was evidence going to show that the plaintiff had paid his fare; that he asserted that he had done so; and insisted that he should be allowed to continue on the train, and protested against being put off. The conductor denied the truth of his statements, and told him he would have to get off, and had him put off, notwithstanding his assertions, protestations, and insistence. That he was trying to ride to Birmingham without paying his fare again was manifest. The conductor, by denying that he had paid, in effect, the jury might have inferred, charged him with attempting to go on without paying; and it will not be contended that such a charge, by whatever language promulgated, was not derogatory of plaintiff's character as an honest man. And, from the mere fact of plaintiff's being required and compelled to leave the train under the circumstances which were shown by one aspect of the testimony, the jury were authorized to infer that his feelings and pride were wounded, and that he suffered mental distress and humiliation. Railroad Co. v. Flagg, 43 Ill. 364; Railway Co. v. Chisholm, 79 Ill. 584. Similarly, charge 26 asserts that there is no evidence that the flagman was authorized to put the plaintiff off the train, when, as we have seen, there were many facts and circumstances adduced from which the jury might well have inferred such authority. For the error pointed out above, in the admission of testimony, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ALABAMA STATE LAND CO. v. REED.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT — NONSUIT — ACTION ON BOND—SET OFF—BURDEN OF PROOF — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A land company having sued to recover the statutory penalty provided by Code Ala. § 3296, for willfully cutting down certain trees upon its lands, and having executed a bond for garnishment process, afterwards took a nonsuit. Defendant then sued upon the garnishment bond to recover for the wrongful suing out of the said garnishment. Defendant company complained of the court's refusal to permit a witness to testify that he found a person cutting the trees, who told him that he was cutting them for plaintiff. The testimony was afterwards admitted, but limited to the question of the wrongful suing out of the garnishment. There was no offer to connect plaintiff with the act of the person engaged in cutting the trees, further than by the declaration itself. Held, that the admission of the said testimony, limited as it was, furnished no ground of complaint.

2. Defendant having pleaded a set-off of the statutory penalty originally sued on by it, the burden, in order to sustain it, was upon defendant to show that the plaintiff had willfully and knowingly cut the trees or had them cut.

3. Plaintiff in his complaint alleged the injury to his credit by suspending the amount due him in the hands of the garnishee. Issue was joined upon the said count, and plaintiff, without objection, introduced evidence to support it. Held, that whatever error may have existed in the court's refusal to charge, as requested by defendant, that such damages were not recoverable in the said suit, it was not available to him, under the pleadings and the evidence.

4. An instruction that the nonsuit taken in the garnishment suit was not a breach of the bond, if not positively erroneous, was, at least, calculated to mislead.

5. An instruction that the jury could not consider for any purpose what happened on the trial of the garnishment suit, or the fact that in that suit defendant took a nonsuit, did not assert a correct proposition of law.

6. An instruction that, the affidavit for the garnishment having been made by the agent of defendant, defendant would not be responsible for malice on the part of the agent, was faulty, in that it ignored all consideration of the question of the participation in or ratification of the intent of the agent.

7. An instruction that if any persons had cut down any trees upon the lands of defendant, and had removed the timber and sold the same to plaintiff, plaintiff was liable for the value of the trees, although he and the person who did the cutting were ignorant of the fact that the lands upon which such cutting was done belonged to defendant; and that if such liability existed, and the agent of defendant, who made the affidavit for the garnishment, believed that garnishment was necessary to obtain satisfaction of such claim, plaintiff could not recover,—was argumentative and defective, in that it precluded any recovery for the mere wrongful suing out of the said garnishment; the true rule being that, although an honest belief that the writ was necessary might furnish a defense against a recovery, for a vexatious suing out of the writ, it was no answer to a claim for a wrongful suing out of the writ.

8. An instruction that if any trees had been cut upon the land of defendant willfully and knowingly, without the consent of defendant, and plaintiff assented to such cutting, or purchased the said trees with knowledge that they had been so cut, he thereby made himself liable to the penalty imposed by Code Ala. § 3296, upon any one who so cuts or takes away trees from the lands of another, did not assert a correct proposition of law, for the reason that the penalty of the statute attaches only to those who participate in the cutting or taking.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county, JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

This was an action brought by C. M. Reed against the Alabama State Land Company to recover damages for the breach of a bond given by defendant, as principal, to secure the issuance of a writ of garnishment. It was alleged in the complaint that suit was brought by the defendant in this action against C. M. Reed, the present plaintiff, to recover the statutory penalty for willfully and knowingly cutting down 176 trees, which were upon the land of the Alabama State Land Company, without the consent of said company; and that the bond now sued on was made and garnishment issued to debtors of said C. M. Reed for the purpose of collecting the said claim; but that before the termination of said suit against Reed the plaintiffs therein took a nonsuit. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and interposed several pleas, offering to set off their claim against the plaintiff for willfully and knowingly cutting down trees upon its land without its consent. In the present action the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that he was not, at the time of the execution of the bonds sued on, indebted in any amount to the Alabama State Land Company; that the garnishment sued out by the defendant caused the garnishee to withhold from the plaintiff several thousand dollars for several months after the same became due and payable to him; and that as the result of the issuance of such garnishment his credit was greatly impaired, and he was put to serious inconvenience. The testimony for the defendant tended to show that, at the time of the execution of the bond and the issuance of the garnishment in the suit against said Reed, he was indebted to the defendant in this action. The tendency of all the evidence for the defendant was to controvert the testimony introduced by the plaintiff. At the request of the plaintiff in writing, the court gave the following charge: "In the set-off claimed by defendant for the penalty of $10.00 per tree, the burden of proof is on defendant to satisfy you reasonably that Reed willfully and knowingly cut the trees or had them cut; and if, after considering all the evidence, you are not reasonably satisfied that Reed willfully and knowingly cut the trees, or had them cut, then you will not allow said set-off." The defendant duly excepted to the giving of this charge, and also separately and severally excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following written charges asked by it: (1) "Damages for injury to credit resulting solely from the failure of Reed to get the amount suspended by the garnishment are not recoverable in this suit." (2) "The defendant asks the court to charge the jury that the nonsuit taken in the garnishment suit was not a breach of the bond." (3) "The jury cannot consider, for any purpose, what happened on the trial of the garnishment suit." (4) "The jury cannot consider, for any purpose, the fact that the plaintiff in the garnishment suit took a nonsuit." (5) "The affidavit for the garnishment having been made by Howard, the agent of the Alabama State Land Company, the said company would not be responsible for malice on the part of Howard." (6) "If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the suing out of the garnishment, and during the year 1888, prior thereto, any persons had cut down upon the lands of the Alabama State Land Company any trees, and such persons had removed the timbers so cut from said lands, and had sold the same to the plaintiff, Reed, that the plaintiff, Reed, became liable for such purchase to the Alabama State Land Company for the value of such trees, although the persons who did such cutting and said Reed were ignorant of the fact that the lands upon which such cutting was done belonged to the Alabama State Land Company; and if such liability existed, and Howard, the agent of said company, who made the affidavit for the garnishment, believed that garnishment was necessary to obtain satisfaction of such claim, then the plaintiff in this action cannot recover." (7) "If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the suing out of the garnishment any oak or pine trees had been cut down upon the lands of the Alabama State Land Company, willfully and knowingly and without the consent of said company, and that the plaintiff, Reed, assented to such cutting at the time thereof or afterwards, then said Reed, by such assent, would make himself a party to such trespass, and liable for the penalty imposed for such cutting." (8) "If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of suing out the garnishment, and during the year 1888, previous thereto, any trees upon the lands of the Alabama State Land Company had been cut down by any person or persons, knowingly and willfully, and without the consent of said company, and that the plaintiff, Reed, purchased such trees with knowledge that they had been so cut down, he thereby assented to such trespass, and became liable for the penalties for such cutting." There was judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $500, and the defendant appeals.

Smith & Lowe, for appellant. Chisolm & Whaley, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The Alabama State Land Company sued C. M. Reed to recover from him the statutory penalty, provided in section 3296 of the Code, for having willfully and knowingly cut down 176 trees, which were on the lands of the plaintiff. The plaintiff in that suit, by its agent, Howard, made affidavit and executed bond for the issuance of garnishment process. That trial resulted in plaintiff taking a nonsuit. The present suit was brought by Reed upon the garnishment bond to recover damages for the wrongful or vexatious suing out of the garnishment process. The first assignment of error is that the court refused to permit the witness Howard to testify that he found a person cutting the trees, who told him that he was cutting for Reed. The record shows that this evidence was admitted after the objection, but limited by the court to the question of the vexatious or malicious suing out of the garnishment. There was no offer to connect Reed with the act of this person engaged in the cutting of the trees, further than by the declaration itself. The admission of this evidence, limited, as it was, to the question of vexatiously or maliciously suing out the garnishment, furnishes no ground of complaint to appellant. In the charge given, at the request of the plaintiff, the court properly placed the burden of proof on the defendant to reasonably satisfy the jury that Reed had willfully and knowingly cut the trees, or had them cut, in order to sustain defendant's plea of set-off. Credit is a conclusion of fact, partly based on opinion, founded more or less on reputation. Pollock v. Gantt, 69 Ala. 373. An injury to credit is a legitimate ground for the recovery of actual damage. Durr v. Jackson, 59 Ala. 203; Flournoy v. Lyon, 70 Ala. 308. The only damages recoverable in this state for failing to meet a purely moneyed obligation at maturity is the interest which subsequently accrues. Damages resulting from the mere delay to collect the money when due gives no cause of action. Such damages are too remote, and are purely speculative.

The record fails to show that the court ruled on the demurrer to the amended complaint. In such case, we must presume that the defendant waived his right to have judgment pronounced upon them. Whatever error, as a legal proposition, may have existed in the refusal of the court to give charge No. 1, requested by the defendant, it is not available to him, under our system of pleading. The plaintiff in his complaint counted, as a cause of damage, the injury done to his credit, by tying up the money due him in the hands of the garnishee. Issue was joined upon the count, and the plaintiff, without objection, introduced evidence in support of it. Referring the charge to the pleadings and proof, there was no error in its refusal. The taking of a nonsuit in an attachment suit is not conclusive of the fact of indebtedness vel non, and in a suit upon the attachment bond the record of the attachment suit is always admissible. Dothard v. Sheid, 69 Ala. 135; Pounds v. Hamner, 57 Ala. 346.

Charge No. 2, requested by defendant, was calculated to mislead, if not positively erroneous; and charges Nos. 3 and 4 assert incorrect propositions of law. The principal is not responsible for the malice, vexation, or wantonness of the agent, unless the principal authorized or participated in it, or subsequently ratified it, and such authority or participation cannot be inferred from the mere relation of principal and agent. Jackson v. Smith, 75 Ala. 97; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 271; Pollock v. Gantt, 69 Ala. 373; Bank v. Jeffries, 73 Ala. 186–196; Kirksey v. Jones, 7 Ala. 629.

Charge No. 5 is faulty, in that it ignores all consideration of the question of participation in or ratification of the intent of the agent by the principal. Charge 6 is argumentative, and is defective, in that it precludes any recovery for the mere wrongful suing out of the garnishment. An honest belief, founded upon reasonable grounds, that the writ was necessary, may furnish a defense against a recovery for a vexatious suing out of the writ, but is no answer to the claim for actual damages sustained by reason of a wrongful suing out of the writ of garnishment. The case of Pounds v. Hamner, 57 Ala. 342, was not intended to assert a contrary rule. Charges 7 and 8 assert incorrect propositions of law. Although Reed may have purchased the trees with the knowledge that they had been cut down and taken away from the lands of another in violation of the statute, (Code, § 3296,)[1] the simple fact that he purchased the trees with such knowledge, not having participated or aided or abetted in the cutting or taking away, does not subject him to the statutory penalty. We find no error in the record included in the assignment of errors. Affirmed.

STEINER et al. v. CLISBY et al.

MORTGAGES—PRIORITIES—RECORDING.

L. executed to A. a mortgage on land, which mortgage was transferred to plaintiffs. L. afterwards executed another mortgage on the same property to A. and one J. and D. Both mortgages were subsequently recorded by A. on the same date. Neither J. nor D. had notice of the prior mortgage. Held, that the rights of J. and D. under the mortgage executed to them were not affected by the prior mortgage; Code, § 1811, declaring all mortgages to be void as to purchasers for a valuable consideration, mortgagees, etc., without notice, unless recorded before the accrual of the rights of such purchasers, mortgagees, etc.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

[1] This section provides that any person who willfully and knowingly cuts down or takes away any trees on land not his own, without the consent of the owner, must pay to the owner $10 for every such tree.

Action by Steven Bros. against A. A. Clisby and others to foreclose a mortgage. Upon the final submission of the cause on the pleadings and proof, the chancellor decreed that the plaintiffs in both the original bill and in the cross-bill were entitled to relief; but that Robert Jemison and W. L. Deloach, defendants to the original bill and complainants to the cross-bill, had a prior lien upon the land, which was to be satisfied before the lien existing in favor of the plaintiffs. Steiner Bros.' lien was subordinate to that of Jemison and Deloach. The plaintiff in the original bill brings this appeal, and assigns the decree of the chancellor as error.

White & Howze and Watts & Son, for appellants. John S. Jemison and W. R. Houghton, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. On November 15, 1886, the Birmingham Land & Loan Company sold to Deloach and Cobbs the land in the bill mentioned for $11,000, one-third of which was paid in cash, and notes for the deferred payments executed by them; the company giving a bond conditioned to make title on payment of the purchase money. On January 20, 1887, Deloach and Cobbs sold the land to Cheatham and L. Clisby for $15,000, one-third to be paid in cash, the balance in one and two years, with interest. By arrangement between the parties, Cheatham and Clisby gave two notes to the land and loan company for the amount of the purchase money, with interest, owing by Deloach and Cobbs, and notes to Deloach and Cobbs, respectively, for the excess of the $15,000 agreed to be paid by them. Deloach and Cobbs surrendered to the company the bond for title held by them, and the company executed to Cheatham and Clisby a bond conditioned to make title to them. In order to make the cash payment, L. Clisby borrowed from A. A. Clisby $5,000, for which he gave his note, dated April 25, 1887, payable one year after date at the First National Bank of Birmingham. To secure this note, and in consideration of the extension of payment for 12 months, L. Clisby signed and delivered to A. A. Clisby a mortgage on the land. This mortgage, which bears date July 23, 1888, was not, at the time of delivery, attested or acknowledged, as required by statute. In consequence thereof it was returned to L. Clisby, and acknowledged by him before a justice of peace, who appended thereto his official certificate of acknowledgment, September 28, 1888, and then returned it to A. A. Clisby. Cheatham transferred his interest to L. Clisby in consideration of his assuming to pay the notes given by them for the purchase money. Jemison having purchased from the land and loan company the notes of Cheatham and Clisby, and A. A. Clisby having acquired the note given to Cobb by agreement of all the parties, L. Clisby executed to Jemison, Deloach, and A. A. Clisby, respectively, notes in substitution and renewal of the notes of Cheatham and Clisby held by them; and to secure the same, and in consideration of the extension of the indebtedness, executed a mortgage on the land, at which time the land and loan company executed to L. Clisby a deed to the property. Though the notes, mortgage, and deed bear date September 26, 1888, they were not, in fact, delivered until the 9th day of October. On October 11, 1888, A. A. Clisby filed the mortgage of L. Clisby to him, and the mortgage to Jemison, Deloach, and Clisby, in the office of the judge of probate of Jefferson county, for registration. On February 18, 1889, A. A. Clisby transferred and assigned without recourse, for value, the note for $5,000 and the mortgage to secure the same to M. L. and C. Ernst, who transferred and assigned them thereafter to Steiner Bros. For the foreclosure of this mortgage Steiner Bros. filed the present bill. L. Clisby, Deloach, and A. A. Clisby and Jemison are made defendants. Jemison and Deloach filed separate cross-bills.

Though the note for $5,000 recites that it was given for the purchase money of the land, this is untrue. It was given for money borrowed to make the cash payment for the land. The recital does not create a lien on the land. Whether, by the transaction of September 26, 1888, Jemison and Deloach waived or abandoned the vendor's lien, or whether complainants had notice of such lien,—questions elaborately discussed by counsel,—it is unnecessary, in the view we take of the case, to decide. The inquiry is, which mortgage has priority of lien? We shall consider the question of the superiority of lien as if the mortgage under which complainant's claim was legally executed on the day it bears date, and the mortgage under which Jemison and Deloach claim was not executed until October 9, 1888. Section 1811 of the Code declares that all conveyances of real property, mortgages, or deeds of trust, to secure any debt, other than a debt created at the date thereof, are inoperative and void as to purchasers for a valuable consideration, mortgagees, and judgment creditors without notice, unless the same have been recorded before the accrual of the right of such purchasers, mortgagees, and judgment creditors. The statute, the purpose of which is the prevention of fraud, is imperative in its terms. The right of Jemison and Deloach accrued October 9, 1888. The prior mortgage was not recorded until the 11th day of October, two days thereafter. At the time of the accrual of their right, the prior mortgage was inoperative and void as to them, unless they had notice thereof. Wood v. Lake, 62 Ala. 489. The fact that both mortgages were filed for record at the same time does not change the effect of the statute of registration. It does not require the second mortgage to be recorded before the first is recorded, in order to preserve its preference. It simply declares the unrecorded prior mortgage inoperative and void as against the subsequent mortgagees, when their mortgage is executed and received without notice of the first. Coster v. Bank, 24 Ala. 37. Neither does the fact that A. A. Clisby, one of the mortgagees in the second mortgage, knew of the prior mortgage affect the rights of Jemison and Deloach. Their debts are separate and distinct. There is no community of interest in respect to them. The mere circumstance that the mortgage was executed to all three does not create a mutual agency, so that notice to one will affect the others. Snyder v. Sponable, 1 Hill, 567; Wade, Notice, § 684. Conceding that M. L. and C. Ernst and complainants had no notice of the mortgage to Jemison, Deloach, and Clisby at the time they respectively purchased the first mortgage, the absence of such notice does not impart validity and superiority, as against the subsequent mortgagees, to the prior mortgage, which is declared by the statute to be inoperative and void at the time they purchased it. On the undisputed facts, Jemison and Deloach are mortgagees entitled to protection under the statute against the lien of the mortgage under which complainants claim, if without notice thereof. There is no pretense, no effort to show, that Deloach had notice. A. A. Clisby testifies that he believes he told Jemison of the mortgage before the second mortgage was delivered. But notice thereof is positively denied by Jemison, who swears that Clisby did not tell him about it until after he had transferred the mortgage to M. L. and C. Ernst. The burden of proving notice rests on complainants. We find from the evidence that neither Jemison nor Deloach had notice of the prior mortgage, nor information of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry at the time of the accrual of their right under the second mortgage. The decree of the city court in accord with these views is affirmed.

ALBA v. STRONG.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — SUFFICIENCY OF CONTRACT.

In a suit for the specific performance of a land contract, the bill described the land in dispute as "the Fernland mill-site and pine lands near thereto, comprising 8,000 acres, more or less, near Portersville, Mobile county, Alabama," and alleged as a contract a letter to plaintiff, in which defendant said: "Now, I would like very much to see you have the lands you want, and will give you the preference at 75 cents per acre, and trust you will see fit to close the thing at once," etc.; which offer plaintiff sought to accept the following morning, (the letter being received Sunday,) when defendant stated that he had sold the land to another. Held, that the bill was bad on demurrer, since the writing relied on neither expressed the quantity of land nor contained any description by which it could be determined without proof by parol what land was intended to be sold.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Suit in equity by Peter F. Alba against Joseph C. Strong for the specific performance of a land contract. Defendant had judgment on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellant, Peter F. Alba, against Joseph C. Strong, as assignee, and prayed the specific performance of a contract alleged to have been entered into between the complainant and defendant. The bill avers that the defendant, Strong, as assignee of the Danner Land & Lumber Company, held large tracts of land in Alabama and Mississippi, including what was known as "the Fernland mill-site and pine lands near thereto, comprising 8,000 acres, more or less, near Portersville, Mobile county, Alabama." That the complainant went to see said Strong for the purpose of purchasing the said 8,000 acres, and finally offered him 65 cents per acre for said land. That in response to this offer said Strong replied by letter as follows: "Dear Sir: After talking with the parties interested in regard to your offer for certain lands of the Danner Land & Lumber Co., I have concluded to say that I feel compelled to decline your offer. I had other parties from the north here late yesterday evening looking at the plats of all the lands with the view of buying the whole thing. I offered to sell them the whole thing at the rate of 80 cents per acre, and, while we did not trade, the proposition is still open, and, I think, favorably considered. Now, I would like very much to see you have the lands you want, and will give you the preference at 75 cents per acre, and trust you will see fit to close the thing at once. I feel reasonably sure that I will close out every acre of our land at the rate of 75 cents or better within the next few months." The bill then alleges that on the following Monday (the letter from Strong having been received Sunday morning) the complainant met Strong and verbally accepted the offer contained in said letter, but that Strong told him it was too late, as he had sold the land to others, —one Lyons. It is then averred that such sale was an executory contract to sell; and that on September 10, 1890, after the present bill was filed, the said purchaser paid the purchase money, and received a conveyance from said Strong to his wife, with the understanding that Strong would hold the purchase money to abide this suit. The defendant interposed demurrers to the bill, which are substantially as follows: (1) That the contract sought to be enforced was void under the statute of frauds, as the lands—the subject-matter of the contract—are not therein described, and cannot be ascertained without recourse to parol evidence; (2) that the bill, as amended, shows that the rights of John B. Lyons, the purchaser, had intervened before knowledge of complainant's alleged equity; (3) that the offer by Strong in his letter was gratuitous, without consideration, and revocable at any time before the acceptance by the complainant; and (4) that the bill does not sufficiently describe or identify the lands alleged by the complainant to have been sold to him. The chancellor sustained the demurrers, and, the complainant failing to amend his bill within the time fixed by the decree, the bill was dismissed.

Hannis Taylor, for appellant. Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The following propositions must be regarded as settled by the former decisions of this court beyond controversy: First. That to authorize the specific enforcement of an agreement to sell land all the terms of the agreement must have been agreed on, leaving nothing for negotiation. Second. That all the terms of the agreement, viz., the names of the parties, the subject-matter of the contract, the consideration and the promise, must be in writing, signed by the party sought to be charged, or by his agent thereunto authorized in writing. Code, 1886, § 1732. Third. That it is not essential that the paper evidence of the agreement be in any particular form, provided it contain the substance, as stated above. Fourth. That the written evidence of the terms of the agreement need not all be expressed in one paper. If expressed in two or more papers it will be sufficient, if collectively they contain enough, and refer to each other, and show the connection with sufficient clearness, without the aid of oral testimony. If, however, oral testimony is required to connect the papers, or to supply any essential term of the contract, then there is a failure to make a case for specific performance. Wat. Spec. Perf. § 231; Fry. Spec. Perf. § 72; Carter v. Shorter, 57 Ala. 253; Phillips v. Adams, 70 Ala. 373; Horton v. Wollner, 71 Ala. 452; Norman v. Molett, 8 Ala. 546. Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345, is not opposed to these views. On the contrary, it reaffirms them. In that case the original memorandum was conceded to be insufficient, but a formal deed was signed, which, though not delivered, was sufficient of itself to take the case without the influence of the statute of frauds. Speaking of that deed and another, simultaneously signed, this court said: "Of themselves the deeds import a bargain and sale of the fee-simple estate in lands, which are particularly described; and the bargainor and bargainee are clearly stated." If the original, imperfect memorandum had been entirely omitted, the non-delivered deed contained all the terms of the contract, was signed by the party sought to be charged, and was sufficient. In the case in hand the writing neither expresses the quantity of the land, nor any description by which it can be determined what land was intended to be bought or sold. This, according to the averments of the bill, rests entirely in parol. The chancellor did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the bill.

HART et al. v. STEELE.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — PLEADING.

One of the stipulations of a contract entered into by plaintiffs and defendant was that defendant pay plaintiffs six cents a foot for all logs at the landings on a creek when delivered at the mouth of said creek. The complaint in the action for the breach of said contract alleged as one breach thereof that "defendant failed and refused to pay to plaintiffs at the rate of six cents per foot for logs which were measured at their landings on said creek, when the same were delivered to him; and they aver that they delivered to him at the mouth of said creek ten thousand logs, which had been measured at their said landings, which were of the value, to-wit, five thousand dollars." Held, that it was error for the court to sustain a demurrer to the entire complaint on the ground of indefiniteness and uncertainty, as the above allegation set forth a good cause of action.

Appeal from circuit court, Covington county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action by Hart & Watson against W. B. Steele for the breach of a contract. From the judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. Wilkinson, for appellant. John D. Gardner, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. The present suit is brought by Hart & Watson against Steele, and counts for the breach of a written contract bearing date October 8, 1887. The summons was issued November 19, 1889. One stipulation of the contract is in the following language: "Party of the first part [Steele] * * * agrees to pay the parties of the second part [Hart & Watson] at the rate of 6 cents per foot for all logs measured at the landings on said creek [Hogfoot creek] when the same are delivered by the said parties of the second part at the mouth of said Hogfoot creek." The fifth breach assigned in the complaint is in the following language: "And these plaintiffs allege that the defendant failed and refused to pay to the plaintiffs at the rate of 6 cents per foot for logs which were measured at their landings on said creek, when the same were delivered to him; and they aver that they delivered to him at the mouth of Hogfoot creek ten thousand logs, which had been measured at their said landings, which were of the value, to-wit, five thousand dollars." There was a demurrer to the complaint, specifying grounds—six—the number of specifications. The first ground assigned is that the contract declared on "is void for indefiniteness and uncertainty." The other specified grounds are to special breaches, each based on the indefiniteness and uncertainty of some stipulation of the contract, the breach of which is, in the complaint, counted on as a ground of recovery. There was no special demurrer to the fifth breach, copied above. The judgment of the court on the demurrers was that they be "sustained; and, the plaintiffs declining to plead further, or to amend their complaint, it is considered by the court that this cause be dismissed." The breach we have copied above sets forth a good cause of action, and is not obnoxious to the charge of indefiniteness and uncertainty. The circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the entire complaint. All the other grounds of demurrer are well taken, because the breaches assigned as to each of them, save the one, are too indefinite to maintain a suit. Neither of them furnishes data by which to determine the extent of defendant's obligation, or of his liability for the alleged breach. No actionable breach can be assigned on either of the other stipulations of the contract, which could be compensated by any criterion of damages furnished by the contract itself, unless, possibly, the obligation by Steele to furnish "all the land he owned accessible to Hogfoot creek" be an exception. Upon this we express no opinion, for the complaint fails to show that Steele owned any land accessible to "Hogfoot creek." For this reason, if for no other, this assignment of breach is bad. Moore v. Smith, 19 Ala. 774; Erwin v. Erwin, 25 Ala. 236; Kirksey v. Kirksey, 8 Ala. 131.

ANGELOVICH v. HIS CREDITORS.

(No. 10,717.)

INSOLVENCY—CREDITORS' MEETING—CONSTRUCTION OF MANDATE—DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT.

1. A mandate to represent creditors at the meeting of creditors in an insolvent proceeding, which authorizes the agent or proxy to vote for an extension of time, and that he vote for a settlement of the indebtedness in such manner as two-thirds in number and amount of the creditors may determine, or to vote for the sale of the assets surrendered, for cash or on terms of credit, or "for such other matters as may come before the meeting of creditors as may benefit him, the insolvent, or the creditors, and as may be proper and necessary" will not authorize the vote for the discharge of the insolvent.

2. In order to discharge the insolvent there must be, in accordance with article 2177 of the Civil Code, a vote of a majority of all the creditors, who are also creditors for more than half of the whole sum due by the insolvent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Petition of P. R. Angelovich, an insolvent, for a discharge from all his debts. Judgment denying the petition. Petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Aug. Bernau, for appellant. James B. Guthrie and E. Howard McCaleb, for Matthew Dean & Co. A. M. & J. Solari, for appellees.

MCENERY, J. The plaintiff, on January 11, 1890, filed his petition in the civil district court for the parish of Orleans for a surrender of his property for the benefit of his creditors. The cession of his property was accepted, and a syndic appointed. At a meeting of the creditors the insolvent was discharged from all his debts. At this meeting the insolvent, under a power of attorney, voted for the discharge. The bilan shows 102 creditors, and the schedule shows debts aggregating $28,117. At the meeting of the creditors there were 54 votes, the insolvent voting by proxy for 46 creditors representing an indebtedness of $4,617.58. The 54 creditors voting represented $12,169.12,—less than one-half of the amount of the debts shown by the schedule. Dean & Co. and A. M. and J. Solari opposed the homologation of the meeting of creditors. The ground of this opposition is that the votes cast by the insolvent discharging himself from debt were illegal, as the power of attorney under which he acted gave no such authority. The power of attorney is as follows: "Civil District Court No. 29,004. Division C. P. R. Angelovich v. His Creditors. We, the undersigned creditors of Peter R. Angelovich, insolvent, do hereby authorize the said Peter R. Angelovich to himself or by substitution represent us at the meeting of his creditors to be held before Ferdinand Kirchner, notary public, on February 15, 1890, or at any subsequent meetings, to, in our name and behalf, vote that nine, eighteen, and twenty-four months be given him within which to pay his debts in full in equal installments, or, if all the creditors do not agree thereto, that he vote for a settlement of his indebtedness to his creditors in such manner as two-thirds in number and amount of his creditors may determine, or to vote for the election of a syndic for the sale of the assets surrendered, for cash or on terms of credit, for such other matters as may come up before said meeting of the creditors as may benefit him or the creditors, and as may be proper and necessary." It is very plain that the above instrument only authorized the insolvent to vote for a certain time in which his debts should be paid in full, and for a general settlement of his debts with his creditors for his and their benefit. There is nothing said about the discharge of the debtor, and from the context of the power of attorney it is evident that this was excluded, and was never contemplated by the creditors who executed it. Conceding that these votes were legally cast, there is still wanting a majority of creditors in number, and who are also creditors for more than the half of the whole sum due by the insolvent. Civil Code, art. 2177. The insolvent urged that article 2177, Civil Code, should have the same interpretation placed upon it as has been given to article 3086 in Anderson v. Creditors, 33 La. Ann. 1155, and Herwig v. Creditors, 36 La. Ann. 760. This last article was amended by Act No. 83, 1843, now section 1822, Rev. St. Article 2177 was not in any way affected by said act. The two articles of the Code—3086 and 2177—relate to subjects distinct from each other. The one—3086—has reference to the respite to be granted to debtors, and not to the absolute discharge of the debtor; and the other article—2177—to his absolute discharge from the debts appearing on his schedule. It is very plain that the creditors cannot have their debts canceled except on a strict compliance with the law, and with their consent made manifest by their participation in the proceedings, and expressed by a majority of the creditors in amount, who are also creditors for more than half of the whole sum due by the insolvent. There is no question raised as to the appointment of the syndic. The judge a qua maintained the opposition as far as to order another meeting of creditors, to which the discharge of the insolvent should be referred. Under the circumstances of this case we do not think he erred in thus giving an opportunity for further proceedings in relation to the discharge of the insolvent. Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing refused.

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS v. LAGMAN et al.

(No. 10,837.)

MASTER BUILDER'S LICENSE TAX—WHO LIABLE—MECHANICS.

1. A mechanic who contracts and shapes materials with his own hands is engaged in a mechanical pursuit.

2. He will be exempt, although he employs other mechanics, who work with him, and, like him, follow a mechanical pursuit.

Appeal from second city court of New Orleans; CHARLES H. LA VILLEBEUVRE, Judge.

Action by the city of New Orleans against A. Lagman & Son to enforce the payment of a license. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, for appellant. B. R. Forman, for appellees.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff sued defendants to enforce the payment of a license tax for the years 1888, 1889, and 1890, and claims that they are liable as master builders. The licenses are claimed under section 12 of ordinance 2661, Council Series. Defendants, in their answer, denied the allegations of the plaintiff, and alleged that they are carpenters, and were engaged during the years 1888, 1889, and 1890 in a mechanical pursuit,—building and repairing houses. They also allege that they are exempt from a license tax under article 206 of the constitution. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

The record discloses that the defendants are carpenters. They build houses and other structures. Their labor was manual and in its performance they used the spirit-level, the squares, the saw, hammer, and other carpenter's tools. They manipulated and gave shape to the material in building. The witness Lagman testifies: "I contracted for buildings in 1888 and 1889. It was pretty near all days' work. I followed the carpenter's trade all along. I performed manual labor on the buildings myself, from the first piece of timber, in framing, in finishing, to the very completion of the house." The testimony is not disputed. The plaintiff states in the brief: "These defendants, unless it may be A. Lagman & Co., are not engaged in a mechanical pursuit." They employed other carpenters, who worked with them and under their direction in constructing houses. The phrase "those engaged in mechanical pursuits," as incorporated in article 206 of the constitution, has been interpreted in several decisions. In City of New Orleans v. Bayley, 35 La. Ann. 545, the defendant worked at his trade with his own hands. In the performance of a contract he employed other plasterers to assist him. The court decided that the superior law prohibited the imposition of a license tax on a plasterer, and that the employment of assistance did not exclude him from the exemption. This interpretation was affirmed in Theobalds v. Conner, 42 La. Ann. 787, 7 South. Rep. 689, from which we copy: "Undoubtedly that opinion is correct, for Bayley was a plasterer, and worked at his trade with his own hands." The attempt to hold the defendants responsible for the payment of a license as master builders must fail. The undisputed evidence before us establishes that they were engaged as carpenters, and, as the house was constructed, "continued to use the tools and appliances of that mechanical pursuit." The fact that others assisted cannot exclude them from the exemption. As in the Bayley Case, they worked at their trade with their own hands, and were therefore engaged in mechanical pursuit. A mechanic is any skilled worker with tools,—a workman who shapes and applies material in the construction of houses; as interpreted by our court, one actually engaged with his own hands in constructive work. The defendant having testified, in answer to a question propounded, that he did perform manual labor in building from the first piece of timber to the last,—this evidence being undisputed,—we conclude that he is exempt. The judgment appealed from in the cases of the other defendants (consolidated) being different, in so far as relates to the occupation followed by them, will be hereafter decided. The judgment appealed from is affirmed, in so far as A. Lagman & Son are concerned, at plaintiff's costs.

(No. 10,837.)

BUILDER'S LICENSE TAX—POWERS OF CITIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The ordinance under which the city claims a license tax from every individual carrying on the business of master builder is not contrary to article 206 of the constitution.

2. The master builder or contractor who employs workmen in executing his contract is not exempt from the payment of a license tax.

3. To be exempt, the training of the mechanic and his skill must be applied by himself, with his own hands, in the execution of his contract.

Appeal from second city court of New Orleans; CHARLES H. LA VILLEBEUVRE, Judge.

Action by the city of New Orleans against T. O'Neil, Albert Thiéson, Charles Garvey, and Muir & Fromherz, to enforce payment of certain license taxes. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Carleton Hunt, City Atty., and Walter B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., for appellant. B. R. Forman, for appellees.

BREAUX, J. The city sued to recover a license tax from the following named defendants: Charles Garvey, Muir & Fromherz, T. O'Neil, Albert Thiéson, and J. R. Turk, claiming they were each liable as "master builders." The defendants answered that they were following a mechanical pursuit as carpenters during the years for which license is demanded. They also allege that they are exempt, under article 206 of the constitution, from the payment of license. There is an agreement of record, in accordance with which these cases were submitted in one transcript. The petition and answer in one case were to be copied and to be considered the same in all, with the change of the name and year. In carrying out the agreement, the petition in one case is considered the same against all the defendants, with the change of the name and year. The facts in these cases are not similar to those in the Case of Lagman & Son, (10 South. Rep. 244, just decided.) The record discloses that the defendants have been in business since a number of years. That they are carpenters. That they contract for the building of houses and other structures. They employ other carpenters. They laid off the works, used the squares, the spirit level, and the straight edge, and, as the building progressed in the construction, they used the plumb-line; they superintended. The following is part of the evidence in each case: "Question: You simply take contracts for building? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. And superintend? A. Yes, sir. Q. You have probably several of them at one time? A. Well, for five years I had many; for the last three years I have not had so much." The affirmative statements of the witnesses with reference to their occupation as "master builders" are followed by the answers as above. These witnesses are sincere in their defense and in their testimony. Being mechanics, they candidly claim exemption. The exemption clause of the constitution and the jurisprudence of the subject must prevail in determining whether they be exempt. The exception does not include all mechanics without regard to their pursuits. A dividing line, we must observe, is drawn. The constitution exempts those engaged in mechanical pursuits. In Theobalds v. Conner, 42 La. Ann. 788, 7 South. Rep. 689, the defendant was a contractor or master builder. A brick-layer himself, he employed others to do the mechanical part of the work, and he superintended. As contractor or master builder he was not exempt. The constitution declares that persons pursuing a trade are liable to a license tax, except those engaged in mechanical pursuits. In City of New Orleans v. Bayley, 35 La. Ann. 545, the defendant was a plasterer, worked at his trade with his own hands, and, when executing a contract, and having more work than he could conveniently do, employed other plasterers to assist him. The court decided that he was engaged in a mechanical pursuit, and that the employment of assistance in his occupation did not alter the nature of his occupation. The theory of the decisions is to exempt, protect, and encourage the mechanic who actually works at his trade. The testimony in the pending cases does not disclose that the defendants "worked at their trade with their own hands." If the article applies to them, it would equally exempt the masters, the contractors, and even the architects, for they have also occasion frequently to use the plumb-line, the square, and the spirit level. It was necessary, in complying with the constitution, to interpret the exemption clause and draw a dividing line, otherwise all trades would be exempt, although the article authorizes and directs the general assembly to impose a license on all trades except those especially enumerated. There are no trades but what at times, in following them, the pursuit is partly mechanical. The artist, the photographer, and others at times follow a mechanical pursuit. They are not exempt from the payment of a license. The defendants argue that the exemption of the laborer covers every man who labors with his own hands, and that the law-maker, after exempting the laborer, went further, and included the mechanic who follows a mechanical pursuit. Without the additional exemption phrase, especially including the mechanic, he would not be exempted at all. The word "laborer" does not include the mechanic. The possibility suggested by defendants' counsel, and illustrated by him for the purpose of showing that carpenters, plasterers, plumbers, slaters, may have to pay "two or three times over," is exceedingly remote. In the first place, those who work at their trades are exempt, and the illustration cannot apply to them. In the second, objection to the method of graduation is not made in the pleading, and, in any event, does not make it possible to decide as exempt trades and occupation not exempted under article 206 of the constitution. The general assembly shall graduate the amount of license tax. It is not in the power of the courts to lay down rules for graduating license tax. State v. Chapman, 35 La. Ann. 76; State v. O'Hara, 36 La. Ann. 94; State v. Schonhausen, 37 La. Ann. 42; Police Jury v. Marrero, 38 La. Ann. 897; State v. Insurance Co., 40 La. Ann. 463, 4 South. Rep. 504. The master builder and contractor not being exempt, the city is authorized to enforce the ordinances imposing a license tax.

The "annual gross receipts" of each defendant were more than $12,000, except those of J. R. Turk, for 1890, which were more than $10,000, and less than $12,000. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from, in so far as relates to the defendants herein named, be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now decreed that there is judgment for plaintiff against each of the following named defendants, viz.. Charles Garvey, Muir & Fromherz, T. O'Neil, and Albert Thiéson, for the sum of $285, with interest as claimed, and against the defendant J. R. Turk for the sum of $270, with interest as claimed; appellees to pay costs of both courts.

ON REHEARING.

(Dec. 14, 1891.)

FENNER, J. In disposing of this application, which is made in behalf of the cast defendants, O'Neil and others, we have to say:

1. The admissions of record conclusively established the amount of the gross receipts on which our judgment is based.

2. In relieving Lagman & Son, and in holding the others bound, we have simply applied the rule of stare decisis, as established in the cases heretofore decided, viz.: City of New Orleans v. Bayley, 35 La. Ann. 545; Theobalds v. Conner, 42 La. Ann. 787, 7 South. Rep. 689. They are cases which require a firm adherence to the rule, and we see no reason to disturb our former rulings.

3. If hardship results from grading licenses according to gross receipts, it is nevertheless the law, and relief must be sought from the legislature.

4. Absolute justice is unattainable in tax-laws. We are not responsible for any inequity which may result from exempting Lagman & Son while taxing the other defendants. The exemption is made by the constitution. Rehearing refused.

Prosecution of Jack Chambers. After his conviction, defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hunter & Hunter and W. C. Roberts, for appellant. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FENNER, J. The record presents two bills of exception, one taken to the refusal of a motion for new trial, and the other to certain action of the judge in the course of the argument. The first bill excepts to the overruling of two of the grounds set forth in the motion. One ground was that the defendant and his counsel were surprised by the course of the prosecution in entering a nolle pros. as to one Jennie Jones, who had been indicted as an accessory to the crime, and in using her as a witness for the state. The judge a qua in the statement of his reasons aptly says: "The accused cannot be permitted to take the chances of an acquittal, and then set up surprise after the trial. He might have secured a continuance or a delay of the trial if he had urged his reasons at the time the nolle pros. was entered, and the state's attorney had expressed his intention to use her as a witness. He was then fully informed of the action of the state, and he should have complained there if he felt aggrieved." This is sufficient and conclusive. The other was that of newly-discovered evidence. It appears, on the face of the motion, that the evidence had no purpose or effect other than to impeach the testimony of a witness for the state. The well-established general rule is that such evidence is not ground for new trial, and the facts of the case suggest no reason for making an exception in its favor. State v. Burt, 41 La. Ann. 787, 6 South. Rep. 631; also, State v. Gauthreaux, 38 La. Ann. 608; State v. Offutt, Id. 364; State v. Williams, Id. 361; State v. Diskin, 35 La. Ann. 46; State v. Fahey, Id. 9; State v. Young, 34 La. Ann. 346; State v. Tessier, 32 La. Ann. 1227. The second bill excepts to certain statements and rulings of the judge in the course of the trial. It is sufficient to say that, under the full statement by the judge to the bill, the exception is left without a shadow of force or merit. Judgment affirmed.

OTIS v. SWEENY. (No. 10,838.)

RES ADJUDICATA—APPEAL.

1. The general rule is that, when the transcript presents no evidence and no note of evidence, this court will presume that the judge a qua had before him sufficient evidence to support his judgment, and will affirm the same; but this rule cannot be applied when the record shows that the judge acted without evidence and upon consideration of the law only.

2. The plea of res adjudicata presents an issue of mixed law and fact, and a judgment sustaining it upon consideration of the law alone, and without evidence of the prior judgment propounded as its basis, is necessarily error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Action by Henry Otis against James Sweeny. The trial court maintained an exception of res adjudicata. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William S. Benedict, for appellant. T. M. Gill, for appellee.

FENNER, J. This is an appeal taken from a judgment maintaining an exception of res adjudicata. We have nothing else before us. The record presents a complete certificate of the clerk that it contains "all the proceedings had, documents filed, testimony and evidence adduced upon the trial of the cause. The record contains no evidence of any kind, and no note of evidence. The appellee invokes the rule laid down by this court in many decisions, that in such a case we will presume that the judge a qua had before him sufficient evidence to support his judgment, and will affirm the same. Succession of Pilcher, 39 La. Ann. 364, 1 South. Rep. 929; Miller v. Cappel, 39 La. Ann. 883, 884, 2 South. Rep. 807; Nugent v. Stark, 34 La. Ann. 631; Verges v. Gonzales, 33 La. Ann. 415; Hefner v. Hesse, 26 La. Ann. 148; State v. De Monasterio, Id. 734; Bank v. St. Amans, 23 La. Ann. 293; Graham v. Rice, Id. 393; Simmons v. Howard, Id. 504; Parham v. Ogle's Estates, 22 La. Ann. 73; Bank v. Bringier, Id. 118. That presumption is properly applied to cases where the judgment appears on its face to be based on a consideration of the law and the evidence, or where the record otherwise shows that the judge acted on evidence. But the record in this case fails to show that the judge received or acted on any evidence whatever, and, indeed, completely negatives the presumption that he did. Thus the minutes show that the exception was submitted "after hearing pleadings and counsel;" and the judgment recites as its reason only the statement: "The law being considered, and for the reasons orally assigned." These entries exclude the idea that the judge had before him or considered any evidence whatever, and this is confirmed by the clerk's certificate. The plea of res adjudicata necessarily presents an issue of mixed law and fact. A judgment maintaining such a plea upon consideration of the law alone, and without evidence of the prior judgment propounded as its basis, is obviously erroneous, and must be reversed.

We shall simply reverse, without, however, overruling the exception. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that the case be remanded to the lower court for a new trial of the exceptions and for further proceedings according to law, appellee to pay costs of appeal.

SMITH v. SMITH. (No. 10,828.)

DOMICILE OF WIFE — SEPARATION FROM HUSBAND —DIVORCE IN FOREIGN STATE—VALIDITY.

1. Although the law fixes the domicile of the wife as being that of the husband, universal jurisprudence recognizes an exception in the case where the husband's conduct has been such as to furnish lawful ground for a divorce, and which justifies her in leaving him, and necessarily authorizes her to live elsewhere, and acquire a separate domicile.

2. If a wife who had been married in Maine, on discovering proofs of her husband's adultery, leaves him, and returns to her former home in Maine, and establishes there a bona fide domicile, her marriage status becomes subject to the jurisdiction of that domicile, whose courts may lawfully entertain her action of divorce.

3. If the defendant in such action has had actual or constructive notice in accordance with the statutory provision of the state, the divorce will be held valid as to both parties by comity in such states as have adopted the policy of such divorce proceedings by similar legislation.

4. Article 142 of the Civil Code of Louisiana is strikingly similar to the statute of Maine in authorizing the wife who was married in the state to return thereto, and, on establishing her domicile, to obtain divorce from her non-resident husband, who has given her lawful cause therefor. This authorizes the courts of either state to give effect to such divorces granted in the courts of the other in such cases.

5. In such cases, however, bona fide residence or domicile is an essential prerequisite to jurisdiction, and the decree is not conclusive on jurisdictional facts, and the absence of jurisdiction for want of bona fide residence may be shown in any court.

6. This court will not recognize the validity of such foreign divorces where the husband has maintained his Louisiana domicile without full and conclusive proof of the bona fides of the wife's separate domicile.

7. Without determining its validity vel non, the Maine divorce in this case is held to be one presenting on its face no intrinsic nullity, and subject to attack only on proof of extrinsic facts destroying the jurisdiction; and therefore entitled to weight in determining the good faith of a second marriage, contracted between the husband and a third party.

8. The sole condition prescribed by the law to give civil effects to a putative marriage is good faith on the part of one or both of the parties. Such good faith means a belief, both honest and reasonable, that the marriage is valid, and in violation of no legal prohibition. The facts in this case satisfy us beyond doubt of the good faith of plaintiff.

9. The law in attributing to a putative marriage "civil effects" uses those words without restriction, and necessarily means all civil effects given to marriage by the law. Such a marriage, contracted in good faith, produces all the civil effects of a valid marriage up to the moment when its nullity is judicially pronounced.

10. The right to the marital portion conferred by article 2382, Rev. Civil Code, is a civil effect of marriage, and arises in favor of the plaintiff as well as of the legitimate spouse. The marriage has not been annulled during the life of the deceased. Spanish, French, and Roman law on the subject referred to.

11. The terms "necessitous circumstances," used in article 2382, Rev. Civil Code, are used relative to the fortune of the deceased, and to the condition in which the claimant lived during the marriage.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Action by Jessica Smith against E. P. Smith, guardian, to recover the marital fourth of her deceased husband's estate. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Rice & Armstrong, for appellant. E. Howard McCaleb, for appellee.

FENNER, J The action is brought by plaintiff, as the surviving wife of Alexander Smith, to recover the marital fourth of his estate, as provided by article 2382 of the Revised Civil Code, which declares: "When the wife has not brought any dowry, or when what she has brought as a dowry is inconsiderable with respect to the condition of the husband, if either husband or wife die rich, leaving the survivor in necessitous circumstances, the latter has the right to take out of the succession of the deceased what is called the 'marital portion;' that is, the fourth of the succession in full property if there be no children, and the same portion in usufruct only when there are but three or a smaller number of children; and, when there are more than three children, the survivor, whether husband or wife, shall receive only a child's share in usufruct, and he is bound to include in this portion what has been left to him as a legacy by the husband or wife who died first." Alexander Smith was twice married. He was first married to Elizabeth P. Sewall in 1870, at her home in Wiscasset, Me., but he was at the time a resident of Louisiana, and immediately after the marriage the pair came to Louisiana, and established the conjugal domicile in this city. Here they lived together until June, 1881, and four children, still surviving, were the fruits of their union. At that time, the wife having discovered, as she charges, proofs of the husband's adultery, abandoned the conjugal domicile, and returned to her antenuptial home in Wiscasset, Me. On the 21st of September, 1881, she filed a libel of divorce against her husband in the supreme judicial court of the county of Lincoln, state of Maine, in the caption of which she describes herself as "Elizabeth P. Smith, of Wiscasset, in the county of Lincoln," and in which she alleges the facts of her marriage, her former domicile, her children by the marriage, and the grounds for divorce. She further alleged that her husband had a large estate, and prayed for a decree granting a divorce, decreeing her entitled to the care and custody of the children and a reasonable allowance for her own and their maintenance. The court made its order thereon, directing notice to appear on a day fixed to be served on the libelee personally "by any sheriff or deputy-sheriff authorized to serve civil process in the place where respondent is found." The record further shows that personal service was accordingly made on Alexander Smith in this city by a deputy-sheriff of the parish of Orleans. Smith did not appear, and, being held in default, the cause was heard on evidence introduced by the wife, and the decree was entered according to the prayer of the libel, including a judgment against Smith for $20,000 as an allowance in lieu of alimony. Some two weeks after the entry of this decree Mrs. Smith left Wiscasset, and went to Nashville, Tenn., where her children were being educated; remained there until February, 1882; then returned to New Orleans, where she spent six years; and finally removed to New York, where she now resides. From the date of the above decree of divorce both parties have lived and acted as, and in all respects assumed the character of, divorced man and wife. On the demand of the wife's attorney, Alexander Smith paid the $20,000 decreed by the judgment. Shortly afterwards he filed a suit in the civil district court of this city, entitled, "Alex. Smith v. His Divorced Wife, E. P. Smith," in which he averred the fact of divorce, his payment of the $20,000, the dissolution of the community of acquest and gains thereby, the failure of the wife to accept the community within the prescribed delay, and asked for a decree declaring his estate to be his separate property, and free from any claim growing out of the former community. Mrs. Smith answered, admitting the validity of the divorce, and judgment was rendered as prayed for.

Both parties undoubtedly accepted the decree of divorce as valid, and undoubtedly believed it to be so. Even after the death of Alexander Smith, in her petition filed in his mortuary proceedings for recognition as guardian of her minor children, she describes herself as his "divorced wife," and in other petitions she describes herself similarly. The evidence shows that they both assumed the status of divorced man and wife; that their most intimate friends and acquaintances regarded them as such; and that there was never in the community the slightest question as to their status. Under these circumstances, in October, 1889, Alexander Smith married the plaintiff, Jessica McFarland, a young girl living in his immediate vicinity, and whose mother had long known both Smith and his former wife, and who accepted, without question, the universal belief of the community, based on the actions and declarations of both, that they were divorced. Smith died in December, 1889. The first wife, as guardian of her minor children, has had them recognized as heirs of their father, and sent into possession of his estate; and against her, as guardian aforesaid, the present action is brought. The guardian defends on the ground that the Maine decree of divorce was absolutely null and void for want of jurisdiction ratione personæ, and ratione materiæ; that, consequently, plaintiff's marriage was illegal and null; that she is not the surviving wife of Alexander Smith, and has no rights as such upon his estate; and, further, denies that she is in necessitous circumstances. The case presents the following questions, viz.: (1) Was the Maine decree of divorce valid? (2) If invalid, was the subsequent marriage of plaintiff contracted in good faith, and entitled to produce its civil effects? (3) If the marriage produced the civil effects, is the claim to the marital portion one of such civil effects embraced in the law? (4) Is the plaintiff in necessitous circumstances, and otherwise entitled to claim the marital portion?

1. The validity of the Maine divorce depends upon the question of fact whether or not the libelant, Mrs. E. P. Smith, had at the commencement of the proceedings acquired a bona fide residence or domicile in Maine. Although the law fixes the domicile of the wife as being that of her husband, universal jurisprudence recognizes an exception to the rule in the case where the husband's conduct has been such as to furnish lawful ground for a divorce, which justifies her in leaving him, and therefore necessarily authorizes her to live elsewhere, and to acquire a separate domicile. Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 108; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. 475; Schouler, Husb. & Wife, § 574; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 76. Where such a separate domicile, based on lawful cause, is bona fide established by the wife, her marriage status becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the court of that domicile. Says Mr. Cooley: "We conceive the true rule to be that the actual bona fide residence of either husband or wife within a state will give to that state authority to determine the status of such party, and to pass upon questions affecting his or her continuance in the marriage relation, irrespective of the locality or of any alleged offense, and that any such court in that state as the legislature may have authorized to take cognizance of the subject may lawfully pass upon such questions and annul the marriage. But if a party goes to a jurisdiction other than that of his domicile for the purpose of procuring the divorce, and has residence there for that purpose only, such residence is not bona fide, and does not confer upon the courts of that state or country jurisdiction over the marriage relation, and any decree they may assume to make would be void as to the other party." Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th Ed.) p. 502. See, also, authorities above cited, and Pennoyer v. Neff, 94 U. S. 714. The statute of Maine provides: "A divorce from the bonds of matrimony may be decreed by the supreme judicial court in the county where either party resides at the commencement of proceedings, when the judge deems it reasonable and proper, conducive to domestic harmony, and consistent with the peace and morality of society, if the parties were married in this state or cohabited here after marriage." Article 142 of the Civil Code of Louisiana provides: "Whenever a marriage shall have been contracted in this state, and the husband, after such marriage, shall remove or shall have removed to a foreign country with his said wife, if said husband shall behave or have behaved towards his wife in said foreign country in such a manner as would entitle her, under our laws, to demand a separation from bed and board, it shall be lawful for her, on returning to the domicile where her marriage was contracted, to institute suit there against her said husband for the purpose above mentioned, in the same manner as if they were still domiciliated in said place. In such case an attorney shall be appointed by the court to represent the absent defendant. The plaintiff shall be entitled to all the remedies and conservative measures granted by law to married women, and the judgment shall have force and effect in the same manner as if the parties had never left the state." It thus appears that both states have adopted a similar policy on this subject, and the comity of states authorizes us to give full effect to such decrees as to both parties, under the rule which we find well formulated as follows: "A divorce granted by the court of the defendant's domicile or of the complainant's domicile in a case in which the defendant has been summoned or has voluntarily appeared is probably valid as to both parties everywhere by comity. If the defendant, though not regularly appearing or summoned, has actual notice, or even if he has had only constructive notice by publication or otherwise, the divorce will be regarded valid as to both parties by comity in such states as have adopted the policy of such divorces by similar legislation or otherwise." 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 760; Doughty v. Doughty, 28 N. J. Eq. 581; Van Orsdal v. Van Orsdal, 67 Iowa, 35, 24 N. W. Rep. 579. In this case the defendant received actual notice, and while such notice, served extraterritorially, could not subject him to the personal jurisdiction of the court, it was at least equivalent to any other constructive service, and was made in accordance with the statute of Maine and with the direction of the court based thereon. Rev. St. Me. 1871, p. 619. We conclude, therefore, that the only question affecting the validity of the Maine decree of divorce is the question of fact as to whether the complainant had acquired such bona fide residence or domicile in Maine as gave the courts of that state jurisdiction over the marriage status. The better opinion is that the decree is not conclusive upon the jurisdictional facts essential to its maintenance, but that its invalidity due to want of jurisdiction may be shown in any court. Sewall v. Sewall, 122 Mass. 156; People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247. The United States supreme court has referred to this question, but declined to decide it. Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 108. We conceive it to be our duty in such a case to require very full and conclusive proof of the bona fides of the required domicile; and the evidence on the point here presented is not entirely satisfactory. We should hesitate, on such proof, to maintain the validity of a divorce so obtained. But we find it unnecessary now to decide this point, and have discussed it so fully mainly to show the exact status of the divorce decree as one presenting, upon its face, no intrinsic nullity, and subject to attack only on proof of extrinsic facts undermining the jurisdiction. This is important, as affecting the question of good faith in the subsequent marriage contracted between the plaintiff and Alexander Smith.

2. Article 117 of the Civil Code provides: "The marriage which has been declared null produces nevertheless its civil effects, as it relates to the parties and their children, if it has been contracted in good faith." And article 118: "If only one of the parties acted in good faith the marriage produces its civil effects only in his or her favor and in favor of the children born of the marriage." The sole condition prescribed by the law to give civil effects to a putative marriage is good faith on the part of one or both of the parties. Without assuming to legislate, we cannot add to the requirements of the law. 1 Marcadé, p. 522; 1 Baudry, Lacantinerie, p. 329. The good faith referred to means an honest and reasonable belief that the marriage was valid, and that there existed no legal impediment thereto. Succession of Taylor, 39 La. Ann. 823, 2 South. Rep. 581; Barfield's Case, 30 La. Ann. 1297; Navarro's Case, 24 La. Ann. 298; Abston's Case, 15 La. Ann. 137; Patton v. Philadelphia, 1 La. Ann. 98. The party alleging good faith cannot close her ears to information or her eyes to suspicious circumstances. She must not act blindly, or without reasonable precautions. In Taylor's Case we had before us a woman who acted simply on the statement of the man that he was divorced, although he was not so in fact, and although she knew his living wife, by whom she had been informed there was no divorce, and had been warned by others that there was none. We held that good faith could not be credited under such circumstances. The facts of that case are in such pointed contrast with those of the instant one that they need no comment. We have already detailed the facts, which show conclusively that the plaintiff's belief in the validity of her marriage was shared by both the former husband and wife, accepted by their friends and by the community generally, and, in point of fact, supported by a decree of divorce valid upon its face, never questioned by any one, and which could only have been annulled on proof of extrinsic facts destroying the jurisdiction of the court. A stronger case of good faith could not be presented.

3. The Code provides, as we have seen, that the putative marriage produces its "civil effects" as it relates to parties in good faith. The words "civil effects" are used without restriction, and necessarily embrace all civil effects given to marriage by the law; or, in the language of Marcadé in commenting on the identical article in the French Code, such a marriage, "although actually null, has the same effects as if it were not null,—the ordinary effects of a valid marriage. * * * Every marriage, though invalid, if contracted in good faith, produces the effects of a valid marriage in the interval between the celebration and the judicial declaration of nullity. When once such declaration intervenes, the marriage produces no further effect; but, be it understood, the effects produced remain forever." 1 Marcadé, 525. The marriage of plaintiff was never declared null during the life of Alexander

Smith. It existed as a putative marriage at the instance of his death, and the civil effects resulting therefrom were then complete and indestructible. That the right to the marital fourth, under the circumstances defined in the law, is one of the civil effects of the marriage, does not, as it seems to us, admit of dispute. If not such an effect, what kind of effect is it? It is true that the article of our Code allowing the marital portion is directly derived from the Spanish law, being taken from Partida vi. tit. xiii. law 7. It is equally true that under the Spanish law only the legitimate wife under a valid marriage could claim it, and not a merely putative wife. But why? The answer is self-evident: Because the Spanish law contains no general provision giving all civil effects to putative marriages. The only civil effects allowed by that law to the putative marriage are such as are sanctioned by special provisions, and the right to the marital fourth received no such sanction. Partida iv. tit. xiii. law 1; White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. xii. § 6; Patton v. Philadelphia, 1 La. Ann. 105, and Spanish authorities there cited. So the commentators on the French Code, in enumerating the civil effects produced by the putative marriage, do not include the marital portion for the very simple reason that the French Code does not recognise or provide for any such portion. Reference to those systems is therefore futile. Differing from both of them, our Code embodies both provisions, viz., that of the French law, giving to putative marriages all the civil effects of a valid marriage; and that of the Spanish law, authorizing the claim of the marital portion as one of the civil effects of a marriage. We may add that, while the Roman law established the marital portion in the 53d and 117th Novels of Justinian, we are not advised that the civil effects of marriage were, under that system, given to putative marriages, and therefore the authorities under that system are equally inapplicable. We are bound to hold that the right to the marital portion is one of the civil effects of marriage, and that it was produced by the marriage of plaintiff, even conceding that it was only putative, although we do not decide against validity.

4. The final question is whether the plaintiff's case presents the conditions entitling her to the marital portion. She brought no dowry. Smith died rich. The only question is whether he left plaintiff "in necessitous circumstances." It is well settled in our jurisprudence that the terms "necessitous circumstances" are used relatively to the fortune of her husband and to the condition in which she lived during the marriage. As said in one case: "In estimating her necessities the law requires that we should take into consideration the condition of her husband and the habits of life which his ample fortune must have engendered in his family. The rule derived from the Roman and Spanish laws in such cases is that the surviving wife is entitled to the marital portion, unless she has the means bene et honeste vivere, according to the condition of her husband." Dunbar v. Heirs of Dunbar, 5 La. Ann. 159. The evidence satisfies us that she has not such means. She has nothing except certain donations made to her by him, consisting of a painting, valued at $300; some furniture, valued at $500; and a house, stated to be worth $3,750. In her prayer for judgment she allows that proper and reasonable deductions shall be made on account of said donations. We think she is entitled to the judgment prayed for. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that there be now judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant and guardian, declaring plaintiff to be entitled to, and to have and receive out of the succession of Alexander Smith, deceased, and from his said heirs, in possession thereof by their said guardian, a child's share, or one-fifth part or share thereof, in usufruct, less such deductions on account of certain donations made to plaintiff by said Smith during his life-time as may be just and reasonable, and that she be put in possession of the same; defendants to pay costs in both courts.

Rehearing refused.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATES—INVENTORY OF SUCCESSION PROPERTY—CONSERVATION OF EFFECTS.

1. Article 1213, Civil Code, authorizes the attorney of absent heirs, in the interval between the opening of the succession and the appointment of an administrator, to perform conservatory acts, the delay of which may injure the succession; and, when advised that certain effects in the possession of a third person do or may belong to the succession, he is authorized to inform the court, and to invite such action as may secure the noting of such effects upon the inventory.

2. The law commands the probate judge to cause an inventory of succession property, and prescribes that such inventory shall embrace a proper description of all effects of the succession.

3. In the confection of an inventory, neither the judge nor the notary decides questions of title or possession. But when particular effects are pointed out, even in the possession of a third person, as claimed to belong to the succession, it is proper to have such effects noted and properly described in the inventory, though without prejudice to the rights of the third possessor.

4. Finding that the order of the judge complained of had no other purpose or effect except to secure a proper inventory, and did not divest either the title or right of possession of appellant, and in absence of any showing of injury or reason why they should be reversed, we decline to interfere with them.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

The succession of Carmelite Carcagno, widow of Bertrand Saloy, deceased. Order directing a bank to hold possession of a box containing valuables of deceased until inventory of its contents could be taken. Mrs. Louque claimed ownership of the box by manual gift from deceased, and from the above order appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Louque, for Mrs. Carmelite

Louque, appellant. Benjamin C. Elliott, for heirs, appellees.

FENNER, J. The succession of Mrs. Bertrand Saloy was opened upon the petition of one who represented herself as a resident heir of deceased, who stated in her petition that certain of the heirs were absent, who prayed for the appointment of an attorney of absent heirs, and for an inventory of the property of the succession, and who also prayed for her own appointment as administratrix. The judge entered his order directing that the petitioner's application for appointment as administratrix be advertised according to law, ordering an inventory of all the property and effects left by deceased to be taken by Charles T. Soniat, notary public, and appointing B. C. Elliott, Esq., as attorney of absent heirs. After qualifying according to law, the attorney of absent heirs presented to the court the following petition: "The petition of B. C. Elliott, duly appointed and sworn as attorney to represent the absent heirs of the deceased in this succession, shows that he is informed and believes that a bank-box, containing a very large amount of valuables lately belonging to the deceased, is now in the vault of the Whitney National Bank, deposited in the name of Mrs. Louque or her husband, Louque, or Victor Pedelahore, under the claim or allegation that said box and its contents were received as a manual gift from deceased, and that it is necessary for the preservation of the rights of the absent heirs that said box and contents should be included or noted in the inventory. Wherefore he prays that said Whitney National Bank be ordered to retain said box in its possession until the same shall be examined by the notary ordered to take the inventory herein, and its contents duly noted, or until further orders of this court, without prejudice to the rights of any one claiming said box, and for general relief," etc. On this petition the judge entered the following order: "Let the Whitney National Bank be, and it is, ordered to retain possession of the box herein described, and its contents, until the same shall have been examined and noted by the notary, Charles T. Soniat, Esq., and until further orders of the court. New Orleans, April 11th, 1891. [Signed] N. H. RIGHTOR, Judge." Thereupon Mrs. Louque appeared by a rule upon the attorney of absent heirs, in which she set up her claim as owner of the box and contents under a manual gift from deceased made some days before her death, and called on him to show cause why the above order "should not be quashed and set aside, and why your mover should not be recognized as sole owner of said box and contents." To this rule certain heirs of Mrs. Saloy personally intervened, specifically denying the title of Mrs. Louque, averring that the property belonged to the succession, and praying for an order directing that the box and its contents be turned over to the succession to be distributed among the heirs according to law. These interveners also filed another petition for an order directing the Whitney National Bank to produce the bank-box in open court on a day fixed, to which the bank filed answer that the box was deposited in a steel compartment of its deposit vault, of which Mr. and Mrs. Louque held the key, and which could not be opened without the production of that key. Thereupon it appears that the judge, of his own motion, entered the following order or direction to the notary as supplementary to his original order: "Mem. Mr. Chs. T. Soniat, notary, designated to take the inventory of this succession, will communicate the within order to the Whitney National Bank, and if the officers of said bank should seem unable to give access to the box and contents in question, by reason of the key of said box not being in their possession or under their control, then the notary, having informed himself as to the person who may have possession or control of said box, whether it be Mrs. Geo. A. Louque, née Carmelite Pons, or other person, shall demand and receive said key, and, having completed the inventory of said box and contents according to law, shall, without unnecessary delay, report his action to this court. [Signed] N. H. RIGHTOR, Judge." The procès-verbal of the notary shows that, under this direction, he demanded the key of Mr. George A. Louque, who admitted its possession, but declined to deliver it. On the same day Mrs. Louque discontinued the rule which she had taken, and on the following day she applied for and obtained a suspensive appeal from both the orders above referred to.

We have thus fully stated the proceedings, because they are violently assailed in this court as operating an unwarranted and usurpatory divestiture of plaintiff's title and possession without due process of law. Her counsel has referred us to the following authorities, which we have carefully examined, and which substantially hold that adverse possession and title of third persons of property claimed also by a succession cannot be divested under summary proceedings (and still less by ex parte orders) in the mortuary proceedings, but that the succession, like any other person, must assert its rights in the appropriate ordinary action: Lavigne v. Chalambert, 11 La. 18; Succession of McKinney, 5 La. Ann. 748; Succession of Mielke, 8 La. Ann. 11; Succession of Moore, 18 La. Ann. 512. The correctness of these decisions is too obvious to admit of dispute, and we are quite sure the learned district judge would never have violated the principles therein announced. The orders complained of did not purport either to determine the title, or to transfer the possession, of the property. Their sole and evident object was to subject the property, in the possession in which it stood, to the view of the notary charged with taking the inventory, in order that he might inspect the same, ascertain its nature and value, and make a note thereof on the inventory as property in the adverse possession of a third person, to which the succession had or might have a claim. This clearly appears from the terms of the original petition and order, and the supplemental order must be construed in accordance therewith. The order only directed the bank to retain possession of the box and contents "until the same shall have been examined and noted by the notary." The concluding words, "and until further orders of the court," could only have been intended to hold the order in force until the court, having first satisfied itself that the purpose of the order had been accomplished, should revoke it. If Mrs. Louque had complied with the order by exhibiting the contents of the box to the notary, to be noted on the inventory, we cannot doubt that the order would have been canceled, and her possession relieved from all restraint. If, indeed, after such action, she had demanded the discontinuance of the order, and it had been refused, she would have had grave cause of complaint, which would have justified redress at the hands of the court. But she chose to pursue a different course. Without applying for any explanation or modification of the order, she simply declined to permit access to the box, and filed a rule in the case, in which she herself put her title at issue, and asked for a judgment recognizing her as owner. It was only after the other alleged heirs had intervened, accepting this issue, denying her title, and asserting title in the succession, that she hastily discontinued her rule, and took the present appeal. The action of the attorney of absent heirs, in calling the court's attention to the situation of this property, and in inviting some action in order to ascertain its nature and value, in order that it might be noted on the inventory as a basis for the assertion of any claim the succession might prove to have thereto, was certainly proper, and within the line of his duties as prescribed by article 1213, Civil Code. Nor do we think that, in these orders, as we construe them, the judge exceeds the broad powers conferred upon him in the exercise of his probate jurisdiction. The law makes it his duty to have an inventory taken. Civil Code, arts. 316, 1035, 1036, 1039. The same articles prescribe that the inventory shall include all the effects of the succession, or, in the language of Mr. Cross, "an exact and particular description of all the effects, movable and immovable, of the succession." Cross, Succession, p. 9. In the confection of an inventory, neither the judge nor the notary determines questions of title or possession. But when particular effects are pointed out, even in the possession of a third person, which are claimed to belong to the succession, it is proper to note such claim upon the inventory, and to give a proper description of the effects so claimed, without prejudice, of course, to the rights of the third possessor. Otherwise it might turn out that all the effects of the succession were not included in the inventory, and the mandate of the law would be violated. The only way of giving a description of these effects, or of arriving at any estimate of their value, was by opening the box and examining them. The order of the judge was therefore natural and proper, and presumably not injurious to the rights of any one. We are not to be construed as authorizing anything like a right of search; as to which, under the facts of this case, we express no opinion. Non constat that the judge would have enforced the opening of the box against the will of the possessor. Under the terms of the order, its only effect was to hold the box where it was until its contents were ascertained, and, when the possessor prevented its opening, the box simply remained in the custody of the bank until further order of the court. The effect, in that case, would have been simply that of a judicial sequestration, which we think, in such a case, would have been authorized under article 273 of the Code of Practice, at least until the succession could be represented by the appointment of an administrator, who could invoke the proper conservatory process to protect the interest of the succession. Appellant has suggested no injury suffered by her from these orders, and no reason why they should now be interfered with. On the contrary, her counsel admitted in argument that she had voluntarily exposed the contents of the box, and that the title thereto was now regularly at issue in pending litigation. Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. SCARBOROUGH, District Attorney, v. JUDGES OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS. (No. 10,935.)

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS — JURISDICTION—RECOVERY OF PENALTIES—PROHIBITION.

Act 118 of 1890, which requires all railroad companies throughout the state of Louisiana to put up bulletin boards in a conspicuous place at all regular or way stations where they have a telegaph operator, and to keep posted thereon, for the information of the traveling public or people generally, the time of the arrival and departure of all regular trains, on pain of a fine of not less than one hundred and not more than five hundred dollars for each violation of its provisions "without just cause," "to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction within the parish where said violation may take place," is not a criminal statute in the sense of the jurisdictional articles of the constitution relative to the appellate courts of the state; and the procedure indicated for the recovery of the fine thereunder to be imposed is civil, and not criminal, in character. Of such a proceeding the circuit court of appeal has appellate jurisdiction, and prohibition will not lie to restrain the judges thereof from hearing and adjudging such a cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of D. C. Scarborough, district attorney, for a writ of prohibition to the judges of the circuit court of appeals, first circuit, to restrain further action in a suit pending before them. Application denied.

D. C. Scarborough, Dist. Atty., pro se. Howe & Prentiss, for respondents.

WATKINS, J. Relator seeks to restrain further action on the part of respondents in the suit depending in their court entitled State ex rel. D. C. Scarborough, District Attorney, v. The Texas & Pacific Railroad Company, on the ground that said suit is a criminal, and not a civil, proceeding, over which class of cases the organic law has given circuit courts of appeal no jurisdiction, and therefore they can exercise none in that case, and any attempt on their part to exercise jurisdiction in the premises would be, in effect, a usurpation of power on their part. In respondents' brief we note a suggestion to the effect that relator had proceeded somewhat irregularly in the court below, by appearing in their court to try the said cause on appeal therein, and only urging complaint after it had been unfavorably decided, and first presenting objection to the jurisdiction thereof on a rule taken for a rehearing. As, in our opinion, that makes no essential difference,—consent not conferring jurisdiction ratione materiæ,—we will go to the main question at once. State v. Judge, 41 La. Ann. 540, 6 South. Rep. 821.

Referring to the constitution, we find that courts of appeal are declared to "have appellate jurisdiction only, which jurisdiction shall extend to all cases, civil or probate, when the matter in dispute * * * shall exceed two hundred dollars," etc. Article 95. We find further that "the supreme court * * * shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which jurisdiction shall extend to * * * criminal cases on questions of law alone, whenever * * * a fine exceeding three hundred dollars ($300.00) is actually imposed." Article 81. If, as claimed by relator, the suit or proceeding referred to be "a criminal case" in the sense of the constitutional articles referred to, respondents are without jurisdiction, and the alternative writ must be made peremptory; not otherwise. From the record it appears that relator inaugurated the proceeding in question against the railroad company under and in pursuance of the provisions of Act 118 of 1890, for the purpose of recovering therefrom the pecuniary penalty denounced in the act against "any railroad company violating the provisions thereof." Section 2, Act 118 of 1890, p. 160. Section 1 of that act declares "that all railroad companies throughout the state of Louisiana are hereby required to put up bulletin boards in a conspicuous place at all regular and way stations where they have a telegraph operator, * * * and to keep them up continuously, and keep posted thereon, for the information of the traveling public, * * * the time of the arrival and departure of all regular trains," etc. Section 2 declares "that any railroad company violating the provisions of this act without just cause shall for each offense pay a fine of not less than one hundred dollars ($100.00) nor more than five hundred dollars, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction within the parish where said violation may take place." On the face of the statute, we are of opinion that the law-giver did not contemplate the collection or recovery of the fine thereby imposed by means of a criminal proceeding. It provides that any railroad company violating its provisions "without just cause shall pay a fine." That phrase is not of the essence of a criminal statute, as it appears to involve judgment and discretion on the part of the railroad company in determining the justness of the "cause" of its neglect in the premises. It further provides that, in case of non-payment by the railroad company, such fine may be "recovered" from said company; and that must mean by execution against the company's property. It further provides that such fine may "be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction within the parish where said violation may take place," and that provision leads irresistibly to the conclusion that there is more than one court in each parish of the state competent to test the justness of the company's cause of dereliction, and to assess the fine, in case the cause assigned is not found just; and which fine shall be "not less than one hundred ($100.00) dollars and not more than five hundred ($500) dollars." In country parishes, like Natchitoches is, the only courts possessing the necessary civil jurisdiction to award such recovery are the district courts (Const. art. 109) and justices of the peace, (article 125.) And the only courts possessing the necessary criminal jurisdiction to assess such a fine are the district courts, as "they shall have unlimited original jurisdiction in all criminal * * * matters," (Const. art. 109;) justices of the peace therein being given only "criminal jurisdiction as committing magistrates," (article 126.) It is manifest that, as a committing magistrate in a criminal proceeding, a justice of the peace could not assess a fine of $100; and it is equally clear that, as exercising civil functions, he could both hear and determine the "cause" assigned, and fix and assess the fine. He could also award process for its recovery.

To construe the act in question as a criminal statute would be to negative its provisions, or to effectually read out of it the phrase, "any court of competent jurisdiction within the parish," etc. But if it be accepted and treated as a criminal statute, it would seem to follow logically and necessarily that the district attorney should have initiated proceedings by way of information or indictment; for the constitution declares that "prosecutions shall be by indictment or information," (article 5;) and "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury," (article 7.) And just here another formidable obstacle presents itself, and that is the serious difficulty there appears to be in proceeding criminally by indictment or information against a corporation. The statute under consideration deals with "railroad companies." The duties that are specified in the act are imposed on the companies, and not against their officers or employes. It declares that "any railroad company violating the provisions of this act * * * shall pay a fine," etc. Our Code, in treating of corporations, declares that "a corporation cannot commit the crime of treason, or any other offense, in its corporate capacity, although its members may be guilty of those crimes in their individual and respective capacities." Rev. Civil Code, art. 443. Our constitution, in treating of criminal prosecutions, appears to contemplate only natural persons. Articles 5–11. In the case referred to, relator commenced proceedings against the railroad company by petition and citation in the ordinary form. His petition concludes with a prayer for citation and judgment against the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company in the sum of $1,950, with 5 per cent. interest thereon from judicial demand, and costs. The judgment therein pronounced decrees, inter alios, the state of Louisiana to have and recover from the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company the sum of $600, with 5 per cent. per annum interest thereon from the date of decree, and "costs of suit." From this judgment defendant company prosecuted an appeal to the respondents' court, and by it said judgment was amended and affirmed. Said suit and judgment, like the statute authorizing same, possess all the incidents and elements of an ordinary civil action and decree against a railroad corporation for the assessment and recovery of the fine contemplated therein for its violation. The statute seems rather to comprehend quasi offenses, the gravamen of which is fault or negligence, for the consequences of which railroad corporations may be compelled to respond civilly, than offenses for the commission of which natural persons may be criminally punished by fine. Vide Code Prac. arts. 31, 32; Rev. Civil Code, art. 2316; Insurance Co. v. Werlein, 42 La. Ann. 1047, 8 South. Rep. 435; Knoop v. Blaffer, 39 La. Ann. 23, 6 South. Rep. 9. The following decisions are germane to the question under consideration, and support our conclusions that the statute provides a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding for the recovery of the fine therein provided for in case of violation. Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch, 336; State v. Williams, 7 Rob. (La.) 266; State v. Linton, 3 Rob. (La.) 55; State v. Thomas, 12 Rob. (La.) 48; State v. Thompson, 10 La. Ann. 122; State v. Hollin, 12 La. Ann. 677. It is therefore ordered and decreed that relator's application be denied, at his cost.

PARTY-WALLS — RIGHTS OF OWNERS — EFFECT OF ACQUIESCENCE.

1. A wall of brick which is used in common, as the wall of two adjacent properties in a city or town, is a party-wall, if erected partly on the soil of each, and has been so used for many years, without question or complaint by either.

2. Where each of said parties, by actual measurement, appears to possess a little beyond the boundaries fixed in his title, neither is at liberty to question the encroachment of the other, in order to disturb the status quo between them.

3. In such case the acts, conduct, and apparent acquiescence of the parties, respectively, serve to interpret questions of doubt between them, and courts of justice will not readily interfere therewith.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FRANCIS A. MONROE, Judge.

Suit by Mary A. Kelly against J. D. Taylor to test defendant's right to make openings in a party-wall. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Q. A. Fellows and James B. Rosser, for appellant. Henry P. Dart, for appellee.

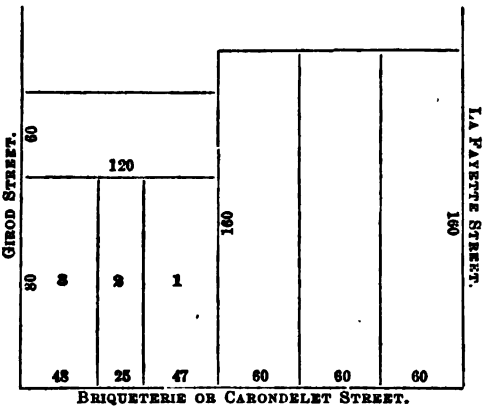
WATKINS, J. The litigants are proprietors of adjoining premises situated on Carondelet street, in the city of New Orleans, and which are indicated as Nos. 1 and 2 on the sketch of the locus in quo which we have extracted from the brief of defendant's counsel, as a means of enabling us to give a clearer and more exact expression of our views. On the sketch plaintiff's property is indicated by the figures "47," as having a front measurement on Carondelet street of 47 feet; and that of the adjoining premises is indicated by the figures "25," as having a front of 25 feet on said street.



BRIQUETERIE OR CARONDELET STREET.

This sketch shows the front of the square between Girod and La Fayette streets. The houses of each of the proprietors are built of brick, and are of two and one-half stories in height, with a single wall separating their properties. Recently the defendant opened windows or made openings in this intervening wall, and this suit is to compel him to close them.

The salient and leading averment of the plaintiff's petition is that the wall in question is a party-wall, or a wall in common, and has been so established, recognized, and used by the occupants of said two adjoining premises for more than 30 years, and that "no one has ever claimed or exercised the right to make openings in the same." She charges that said openings overlook the bedrooms in her house, and destroy its renting value. Defendant, in answer, claims ownership of the lot adjoining that of plaintiff, and the buildings thereon, and the exclusive ownership of the said intervening wall; and he also claims four inches of the soil beyond said wall; and avers that said wall was constructed and now stands on his lot and property, and hence it is not a party-wall; and plaintiff is without right of action or ground of complaint. On the trial there was judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed. The case was tried in the court below upon expert testimony; and the experts consisted of three skilled and competent surveyors, Pilie, Grandjean, and Brosnan, who seem, from their profiles, maps, etc., to have gone into the question thoroughly. The testimony leaves no doubt of the fact that the defendant's building was erected on the lot (the municipal number of which is 157 Carondelet street) something like 30 years ago, perhaps longer. Plaintiff traces title through Benjamin Kendig, who purchased from Charles Gardiner and heirs of A. Babcock on the 4th of June, 1835, and by the following description, viz.: "All that lot of ground situated in the suburb St. Mary, * * * measuring forty-seven (47) feet front on Carondelet street, by eighty-two (82) feet in depth, (opening about three feet in said depth,) and giving about fifty feet, French measure, on the rear line; bounded on the side next to Hevia street by the property now or formerly belonging to Widow Brogrard; and on the side next to Girod street by that now or formerly belonging to Edward Colesward. This lot of ground is sold by the boundaries, be the measurement more or less than is above specified," etc. This is the same description by which Babcock and Gardiner purchased on the 18th of March, 1833, from the estate of Robert Lewis; and the same description is given in the deed of Louis Robert to Robert Lewis on the 22d of September, 1833. In 1818 this lot was conveyed by Jean Laurent to J. P. L'Aubry, as having a front of forty-seven (47) feet, French measure, or fifty (50) feet one (1) inch, American measure; and Jean Laurent seems to have derived title from his father, Jean Louis Laurent, subsequent to 1804,—date not specified. It appears from the profile and exhibits executed by Pilie and Grandjean jointly that since 1833 the titles of plaintiff and of her authors call for a front measurement on Carondelet of 50 feet and 1 inch, American measure,—just the same as that called for in the deeds of the Laurents, in 1810–1818. It also appears from the same evidence that in 1814, when the property of the defendant was owned by Generior Metoyar, that his deed called for 25 feet, French measure, or 26 feet 7 inches and 6-10, American measure. The measurement is just the same in the deed of Euphrasine Duvieux in 1817; and in the deeds of the defendant and his intermediate authors the same American measurement is preserved, viz., "26′ 7″ 6‴, fixed." Thus it appears, irresistibly, to our minds, that the ancient boundaries of these two properties have been well and faithfully preserved. While it is true that the said exhibits do show that plaintiff possesses 7 inches over and above the calls of her title, "i. e., 50′ 8″," instead of 50′ 1″, "more or less;" yet they do not show that same was absorbed from the property of the defendant; for said exhibits show that while defendant's titles call for 26 feet 7 inches and 6-10, he has in possession 26 feet 10 inches and 5-10,—an excess above the calls of his title of 2 inches and 7-10 of an inch. They also show that Fannie Cholard, on the corner of Girod and Carondelet, occupies 2 inches and 3-10 less than her titles call for; and that the M. E. Church (which adjoins the plaintiff on the Canal-street side) is in possession of 1 foot and 3 inches and 5-10 less than the calls of its title. But, as there is an alley-way intervening between the plaintiff and the church edifice, that may be easily adjusted. The defense set up is not good.

In addition to the foregoing argument, we incline to the belief that the title of the plaintiff's authors was one per aversionem, being a designated space within fixed boundaries, that have never been changed. In relation to the actual situs of the wall in controversy, the evidence satisfies us that it only infringes on the plaintiff's premises to the extent of about 5-10 of an inch, i. e., the superstructure, but having about 2 feet of basement or foundation thereon. There was a good deal of proof adduced to show that the wall in controversy, and which was anciently an outer wall, gave evidence of its having been used as a party-wall; but, as our opinion is that the facts stated constitute it in law a party-wall, it is needless to discuss this question. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 677, 685. The acts, conduct, and apparent acquiescence of the parties and their authors are in keeping with the view we entertain of the testimony. It seems to have impressed the judge of the court below as it has impressed us. There is no reason apparent why we should alter his finding.

Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing refused.

STATE v. BAKER. (No. 10,877.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED.

The only error assigned on this record relates to the ruling of the judge in permitting the state, on cross-examination of the accused as a witness, to ask a question objected to on the ground that the matter thereof was not referred to in the direct examination. The statement of the judge negatives the ground of objection by showing that the matter of the question was directly and closely connected with matters testified about on the examination in chief. The rule restraining the state on cross-examination never went further than to exclude questions on matters not connected with those referred to on the direct examination.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from criminal district court, parish of Orleans; JOSHUA G. BAKER, Judge.

Prosecution against Philip Baker. From a judgment of conviction he appeals. Affirmed.

Lionel Adams, for appellant. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FENNER, J. The only complaint brought to our notice by this record arises under a bill of exceptions taken to the ruling of the court in permitting a question propounded to the accused on his cross-examination by the state, which was objected to on the ground that the question related to mattter about which he had not been asked and had not testified in his direct examination. The statement of the judge appended to the bill clearly shows that the question related to a subject closely connected with the matters testified about in the direct examination, and this is sufficient. State v. Poynier, 36 La. Ann. 573; State v. Stuart, 35 La. Ann. 1015. The rule never went further than to restrain the state from cross-examining defendant's witnesses on matters not connected with matters stated on the examination in chief. 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 521, No. 445; State v. Swayze, 30 La. Ann. 1323;

State v. Thomas, 32 La. Ann. 349; State v. Willingham, 33 La. Ann. 538. The case here is entirely without the inhibition.

Judgment affirmed.

PATTISON v. BRAGG et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

1. Where a bill to set aside a conveyance for fraud called for a sworn discovery from the purchasers, and their answers denied all knowledge of or participation in the vendor's fraudulent intent, or any knowledge of his indebtedness beyond what he provided for in such conveyance to them, and the evidence fails to overcome the denials, a decree dismissing the bill will not be disturbed.

2. Though on his failure to have the conveyance set aside complainant might have been entitled to recover the amount of his claim out of the purchase money owing by the purchasers, yet, where the bill contained neither averment nor prayer which could raise that issue, he was in no position to ask that relief.

Appeal from chancery court, Wilcox county; THOMAS W. COLEMAN, Chancellor.

Bill by Thomas H. Pattison against Thomas Bragg and Willis Bragg and others to set aside a conveyance of certain real and personal property on the ground of fraud. Decree dismissing the bill. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant, Thomas H. Pattison, being a creditor of Thomas Bragg, filed the present bill to have a conveyance of property, real and personal, executed by said Thomas Bragg on May 16, 1887, to Willis Bragg and one Carson, annulled and set aside as fraudulent and void; and to have the property therein conveyed, condemned to pay the complainant's debt. The bill charges at length, and with great particularity, that Thomas Bragg was embarrassed and insolvent; that this was known to his vendees, said Willis Bragg and Carson; that the property was sold for greatly less than its real value; that the intention of Thomas Bragg was to hinder, delay, and defraud the complainant; and that this intent was participated in by the vendees. The bill required the respondents to file sworn answers. As is stated in the opinion of the chancellor, "each and every allegation of fact upon which the charge of fraud rests has been squarely denied by the answers." Upon the submission of the case on the pleadings and proof, the chancellor decreed that the complainant was not entitled to the relief prayed, and ordered the bill dismissed. The complainant appeals, and assigns the decree of the chancellor as error.

Brutus Howard and J. N. Miller, for appellant. R. Gaillard and S. J. Cummings, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. We have examined the pleadings and testimony in this case with great care. We agree with the chancellor in finding that Thomas Bragg's intent in selling and conveying his property to Willis Bragg, his brother, and to Carson, his cousin, was fraudulent; and, if he alone were concerned, we would not hesitate to declare the property subject to Pattison's claim. Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 104; Marshall v. Croom, 52 Ala. 554; Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282; Hubbard v. Allen, 59 Ala. 283; Donegan v. Davis, 66 Ala. 362; Lehman v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 192; Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103. The complainant in his bill called for a sworn discovery from the purchasers, and propounded to them searching interrogatories. Their answers are a very full denial of all knowledge on their part of Thomas Bragg's fraudulent purpose, and of his indebtedness beyond what he provided for in his sale to them. They equally denied all participation in any and all fraudulent intent on the part of Thomas Bragg, if he entertained such intent. The testimony fails to overcome these denials, and it results that in this phase of the case complainant must fail.

It is contended here that, if complainant fails in this leading aspect of his case, then he is entitled to recover the amount of his claim out of the $1,600 of purchase money which Willis Bragg and Carson owed when this bill was filed and process served on them. A sufficient answer to this contention is that the bill contains neither averment nor prayer which could raise that issue, even if it be conceded such purpose could be conjoined with the main object of the bill. Caldwell v. King, 76 Ala. 149; Coffey v. Norwood, 81 Ala. 512, 8 South. Rep. 199; Parsons v. Johnson, 84 Ala. 254, 4 South. Rep. 385; Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176. The decree of the chancellor is in all respects affirmed.

WHITE v. BLAIR.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION—NEW TRIAL—REVIEW.

1. Under Sess. Acts 1890–91, p. 779, which provide for appeals from orders of circuit courts granting new trials, and empower the supreme court to grant new trials, or to correct any errors of the circuit court in granting the same, the power conferred is purely appellate, and cannot be invoked until motion has been made and acted on in the circuit court.

2. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, where the evidence did not plainly support the verdict, such order will not be disturbed.

Appeal from circuit court, Barbour county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Suit by W. S. White against D. S. Blair to recover on a promissory note. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Clayton, for appellant. J. N. Williams and G. W. Peach, for respondent.

STONE, C. J. This was a suit by White, transferee, against Blair, on a promissory note alleged to have been made by the latter. The note purports to be payable to T. P. Cawthorn. Defendant interposed a sworn plea denying the execution of the note which is correct in form. Code 1886, p. 796, form 33. On the trial of the issues there were verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. Thereupon defendant moved for a new trial on several grounds, which the court granted, setting aside the verdict and judgment. From that order, granting a new trial, plaintiff prosecutes the present appeal, under the act "to allow appeals to the supreme court from decisions of the city and circuit courts in this state, granting or refusing to grant motions for new trials." This act was approved February 16, 1891, (Sess. Acts 1890-91, p. 779.) Before that time our statutes made no provision for appeals in such cases. The appellate power conferred on this court by that statute is expressed in its last clause,—"to grant new trials, or to correct any errors of the circuit or city court in granting or refusing to grant the same." A correct reading of the statute clearly shows that our power is purely appellate, and cannot be invoked until motion has been made and acted on in the circuit or city court.

The rules for granting or withholding new trials after a verdict has been rendered are not always expressed in the same terms. Some courts give greater weight to the findings of a jury than others do, or, at least, they seem to do so. We are not inclined to adopt extreme views on either side of this question. We hold that no higher duty rests on a court of original jurisdiction than to assert his manhood, and grant, or refuse to grant, a new trial, as the merits of the controversy may point out his duty. Railroad Co. v. Powers, 78 Ala. 244. The case of Cobb v. Malone, 9 South. Rep. 738, (at the last term,) brought this statute before us for the first time. In that case, as in this, the main ground of the motion was that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. In that case the motion had been denied by the trial court, and we were asked to reverse his ruling. We gave the question careful consideration, and declared two rules, which we intended should become a guide and precedent. We said: "The decision of the trial court, refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, or that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, will not be reversed, unless, after allowing all reasonable presumptions in favor of its correctness, the preponderance of the evidence against the verdict is so decided as to clearly convince the court that it is wrong and unjust." When the lower court grants a new trial, and the appeal is from that ruling, we said the decision "will not be reversed unless the evidence plainly and palpably supports the verdict." The bill of exceptions in this case is very full. It sets out all the testimony given on the trial in chief, and on the motion for a new trial. We have scrutinized it with care, and fail to find it "plainly and palpably supports the verdict" which the jury rendered. The order of the circuit court granting a new trial must be affirmed.

WHAT CONSTITUTES WILL.

An instrument, duly executed and registered, which provides that from natural love and affection towards his wife, and that she may have a permanent estate, "and, further, that my said wife has aided me in the accumulation of the estate I am possessed of, I hereby give, convey, and confirm unto my said wife, and her heirs, in absolute right, all my" estate, "which I now, or may hereafter, own," and which reserves a life-estate, and provides for the payment of the maker's debts, and sufficiently executed to operate as a deed or will, is a will.

Appeal from circuit court, Pike county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Ejectment by B. F. Smith et al. against Wiley E. Crocker to recover their undivided interest in certain lands. The rights of the parties rested on the construction of a certain instrument executed by one David Fleming, and the case was submitted on an agreed statement of facts. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and judgment rendered for defendant.

W. L. Parks, John Gamble, Sr., and Alex. T. London, for appellant. P. O. Harper, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. The parties having agreed in the circuit court that if the instrument executed by David Fleming, September 17, 1887, is construed to be a deed, judgment should be rendered for plaintiffs; and if a will, for defendant; and, this being the only question on which any ruling was asked or made by the court, the judgment on this appeal must also depend on the interpretation of the instrument. The general characteristics which distinguish deeds from wills have been repeatedly declared, yet no definite uniform test has been stated by which to determine the character and operation of each particular instrument, and none can well be. The intention of the maker is the ultimate object of inquiry,—whether it was intended to be ambulatory and revocable, or to create rights and interests at the time of execution which are irrevocable. If the instrument cannot be revoked, defeated, or impaired by the act of the grantor, it is a deed; but if the estate, title, or interest is dependent on the death of the testator, if in him resides the unqualified power of revocation,—it is a will. Jordan v. Jordan, 65 Ala. 306. Ordinarily the intention is to be collected from the terms of the instrument, considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances; but, there being no proof of the circumstances under which the instrument was executed, consideration is necessarily limited to the operation of its terms. The purpose and consideration are expressed as follows: "Being moved and influenced, as I have uniformly been, from the natural love and affection which I have and bear for and towards my beloved wife, Sarah Ann Fleming, being able to provide well for her in after life, as well as for her present comfort, and that she may have and enjoy a permanent and substantial estate and property, and from the further consideration of one dollar, and, further, that my said wife has aided me in the accumulation of the estate I am possessed of;" followed by these words of conveyance: "I hereby give, convey, and confirm unto my said wife, and her heirs in absolute right, all my entire estate, real and personal, lands, negroes, stock, and all manner of property which I now, or may hereafter, own," excepting a negro girl, which was given to his sister-in-law. The instrument was sufficiently executed to operate as a deed or will, and has appended a certificate of proof of execution and of registration. It has been said that these facts raise the presumption of delivery, and are persuasive to show that the maker regarded the instrument as a deed; but they bear little, if any, significance, in the absence of proof that the instrument was delivered or recorded in the life-time of the donor. The fact that it is designated on its face as a deed of gift is ordinarily regarded of little moment; though it may become of more or less importance when, upon a comparison of the terms of the instrument, and consideration of the bearing of each on the others, the meaning is ambiguous, and the mind is left in doubt as to the intention of the makers. Though the instrument may be in the form of a deed of gift, and designated as such, it is a will, if its purpose be testamentary, if it cannot operate during life, and is only consummated by death. Dunn v. Bank, 2 Ala. 152. While the passing of present and immediate right of possession and enjoyment is not essential to constitute the instrument a deed, and the reservation of the use and enjoyment of the property to the grantor during his life does not, of itself, make it a will, yet if it has not present effect in fixing the terms of such future enjoyment, and requires the death of the alleged testator for its consummation,—when the interest and enjoyment are posthumous,—it is a will, if properly executed as such. Trawick v. Davis, 85 Ala. 342, 5 South. Rep. 83; Griffith v. Marsh, 86 Ala. 302, 5 South. Rep. 569; Sharp v. Hall, 86 Ala 110, 5 South Rep 497; Elmore v Mustin, 28 Ala. 309. By reference to the instrument, it will be observed that the right or interest which it purports to pass is not only of all the property, real and personal, which the maker then owned, but also of all that he might thereafter own. It is manifest, in the absence of covenants of warranty, it is ineffectual to convey property thereafter acquired. As to such property, it can have no operation as a deed, but may as a will. In doubtful cases, the instrument will be pronounced a will when it cannot have operation as a deed, but may as a will. Sharp v. Hall, supra. The inclusion of after-acquired property seems to indicate an intent that the instrument should not pass any present right or interest. Also the last clause reads as follows: "Reserving a life-time estate and enjoyment of said property to myself, and for the payment of my just debts. This deed of gift to take effect absolutely at my death, and to be valid and conclusive." The reservation is not only of a life-time estate and enjoyment, but also of all the property for the payment of his just debts. All the property is made subject to the payment of debts thereafter contracted, and only so much of the estate as remains after the death of the donor, and the payment of his debts, can pass by the terms of the instrument,—tantamount to a general power of disposition. Furthermore, it expressly provided that it shall not take absolute effect until his death, at which time it is to be valid and conclusive. When there is a reservation of a general power of revocation or disposition, and a provision that the instrument shall not be in force or take effect until the death of the maker, it is in its nature ambulatory and revocable. "When there is a general reservation, or something like a reservation, of the maker's right to deal with the property as his own, notwithstanding the instrument, and no conclusive effect can be given to it until the death of the maker, the law regards the instrument as testamentary." Gillham v. Mustin, 42 Ala. 365. The reservation of the property for the payment of his debts, and the provision as to the time when it should take effect, seem to have been incorporated for the purpose of limiting or qualifying what might otherwise be the legal operation of the preceding words, "give, convey, and confirm in absolute right." Applying the foregoing principles and tests, we are forced to pronounce the instrument to be a will. Reversed, and judgment rendered for defendant.

ANNISTON PIPE-WORKS v. MARY PRATT FURNACE CO.

PROMISSORY NOTES—ACTION BY PAYEE—INDORSEMENTS.

1. In an action on a note by the payee against the maker, the payee makes out a prima facie case by showing possession, and he need not, therefore, set out in the complaint or establish by evidence indorsements on the back of it.

2. In an action on a note by the payee, where only the general issue has been filed, it is in the discretion of the court to deny defendant's request, made during the trial, to file a plea denying plaintiff's title, so as to allow the introduction of an indorsement on the note by payee to a third party.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Assumpsit by the Mary Pratt Furnace Company against the Anniston Pipe-Works on a promissory note executed by defendant to plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The note was set out in the complaint without any indorsement. When the note was offered in evidence there appeared on the back of it an indorsement by plaintiff to a third party, and defendant objected to the introduction of the note without the introduction of the indorsements, which objection was overruled.

Knox & Bowie, for appellant. Kelly & Smith, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. To a recovery on a bill or promissory note it is only necessary for the plaintiff to prove such of the indorsements as carry the title into him. All others may be pretermitted in averment, and, of course, in the evidence. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 166. If the paper, though indorsed and transferred, gets back into the hands of the payee, the presumption is that he has paid the sum evidenced by it to the indorsee, and thus become prima facie again the legal owner. Dugon v. U. S., 3 Wheat.

172; Herndon v. Taylor, 6 Ala. 461; Oil Co. v. Perry, 85 Ala. 158, 4 South. Rep. 635. And upon such title he may maintain an action on the note against the maker. Pinney v. McGregor, 102 Mass. 186; Oil Co. v. Perry, supra. It results necessarily from these principles that, where the note is in the possession of the payee, the law converts that possession into a prima facie legal title, upon which suit may be prosecuted wholly regardless of the condition of the paper as to indorsements, and puts the onus of showing the absence of the title on the defendant. Such indorsements, of themselves, do not stand in the way of recovery, and, whether they import a final indorsement back to the payee or not, they need not be alleged or proved. In the case at bar, therefore, it was no part of plaintiff's case to set forth in the complaint or establish by the evidence the indorsements found on the back of the paper. Its title to maintain the suit did not depend upon them, and its right to recover was not in any degree—certainly in the absence of a plea denying ownership—affected by any possible conditions with respect to them; and the court properly, in our opinion, admitted the note in evidence without the indorsements, and without requiring plaintiff to adduce the indorsements. Upon these rulings of the court being made and put on the ground that no plea denying plaintiff's title had been interposed, the defendant, after pleas had been filed and the issues made up, and after the time for pleading had lapsed, and, indeed, in the midst of the trial, asked leave to file such special plea, duly verified. We are clear to the conclusion that at this stage of the proceeding it was in the discretion of the court to allow or refuse to allow the filing of this new and additional plea, and that its action in refusing the leave prayed cannot work a reversal of the judgment. Jones v. Ritter, 56 Ala. 270.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—INJUNCTION.

In a suit to enjoin the sale by judgment creditors of S. of land conveyed by S. to complainant, claimed by complainant to be in consideration of an antecedent debt of $700, and by defendants to be in fraud of creditors, it appeared by the testimony of complainant that she lent S. $200, all the property that she had, except a home worth $700, that she afterwards borrowed $400, and lent this to S., and that these sums, with interest, a small account, and $50, made up the consideration for the conveyance of the property, consisting of two lots and two tracts of land, worth $950. Soon afterwards complainant sold one of the tracts for $150; leased to the wife of S., who was not shown to have had any property, one of the lots for $30 a year, on which a livery stable worth $400 or $500 was then erected, and kept in the name of the wife of S., but superintended and managed by S. The other lot was sold to the wife of S. for $650. Held, that the injunction was properly refused.

Appeal from chancery court, Cullman county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Suit by Margaretha Zeigler against Carter Bros. & Co. and others to enjoin the sale by defendants, under executions on judgments obtained by them against Christ Scheuing, of certain real estate, claimed by complainant under a conveyance from Scheuing, which conveyance was claimed by defendants to be in fraud of creditors. From a decree dismissing the bill of complaint, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Will Brown and Geo. H. Parker, for appellant. W. F. L. Cofer, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. That Scheuing's failure in business was fraudulent—glaringly fraudulent—is very clearly manifest in the record before us. Mrs. Zeigler's contention is that she was a creditor of Scheuing in the sum of about $650; that in payment she received from him real property, valued at $700, paying the difference, $50, in money; and that $700 was the reasonably fair market value of the property at the time she received it. The next day after this transaction with Mrs. Zeigler, Scheuing, by one sale in gross, sold all his remaining property, except what was exempt from execution under our statutes. The property thus sold consisted mainly of a stock of merchandise then recently purchased, and which the testimony tends to show was sold at a great sacrifice. There is, however, no attempt to prove that Mrs. Zeigler, when she made her purchase, had any notice of Scheuing's intention to sell his merchandise and retire from business. So the transaction must stand or fall by the testimony relating to it, without reference to the sale of the merchandise. The chancellor pronounced her purchase fraudulent, and from that decree she appeals to this court. The principles of law applicable to this case have been so often declared that a mere statement of them is all that is necessary. It is every man's duty to pay his debts as far as he is able, and any attempt to hide or secrete his property for his own benefit is fraudulent. And every one, having knowledge, actual or constructive, of such intent, who aids him in his attempted fraud by purchasing his property, even at its full value, and for money, is a participant in the fraud, and acquires no title against the claim of creditors of the seller. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 515, § 119; Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282; Kellar v. Taylor, 90 Ala. 289, 7 South. Rep. 907; Gibson v. Furniture Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 370. There is an exception to the rule. A creditor having a just and legal demand against the failing debtor may save himself, without incurring the law's displeasure. This he may do by receiving money or property at its reasonably fair value, in payment of his claim. And even though he may know his debtor is failing, and that the effect of the collection or purchase will be to leave him without means to pay his other debts, unless some benefit beyond what the law provides is secured to the debtor by the arrangement, the transaction will stand. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 517, § 137; Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103; Gordon v. McIlwain, 82 Ala. 247, 2 South. Rep. 671; Tompkins v. Henderson, 83 Ala. 391, 3 South. Rep. 774; Dollins v. Pollock, 89 Ala. 351, 7 South. Rep. 904. There was a great deal of testimony taken in this case. Much of it relates to the value of the property at the time Scheuing conveyed it to Mrs. Zeigler. On this question the witnesses differ very widely. We will state our own conclusion, drawn from the testimony, further on. Many questions were asked Mrs. Zeigler as to her means and resources. These were objected to. So there was testimony tending to show that Mrs. Scheuing had no estate of her own. For reasons which will be presently made apparent, we think each of these lines of inquiry was legitimate. Mrs. Zeigler was a widow with three children. She had an humble home in Cullman, estimated to be worth $700. With industry and economy, working at laborious occupations, she testified that she had saved $200. This was January 1, 1886. It was her intention with this money to purchase goods, and start a little notion store. There is no proof of any other means or resources then owned by or available to her. About this time Scheuing embarked in merchandise in Cullman. Mrs. Zeigler lent Scheuing the $200, taking as security for its repayment the joint note of himself and wife, with waiver of exemptions. This note bears date January 1, 1886, and was made due six months after date, with interest from date. On April 6, 1886, Mrs. Zeigler borrowed from her friend Mrs. Mehne, living near Cincinnati, Ohio, $400, and to secure its repayment, with 8 per cent. interest, gave her a note, with waiver of exemptions, due at 12 months, or April 6, 1887. This sum, in bank-bills, was sent by ordinary, unregistered letter, through the mail, from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Mrs. Zeigler, at Cullman, Ala., and was received by her April 7th, 8th, or 9th. On April 12, 1886, Mrs. Zeigler lent this $400 to Scheuing, and for its repayment took from him the waive note of himself and wife, due at six months, bearing 8 per cent. interest. It is not stated that the money was or was not borrowed from Mrs. Mehne to be lent to Scheuing, or that Mrs. Mehne knew it was to be lent, or was lent to him. These two notes, with their accrued interest, a small account, and $50 in money, making in all $700, were the consideration on which the deed from Scheuing to Mrs. Zeigler was executed. Mrs. Zeigler did not engage in any business until June, 1886, when she opened a little notion shop, with goods valued at $75. Mrs. Zeigler, Mrs. Mehne, and Scheuing were neither of them related to each other. The foregoing is Mrs. Zeigler's account. Mrs. Mehne confirms her in her testimony as to the loan of the money, and remitting it through the mail in unregistered letter; and Mrs. Scheuing confirms her as to borrowing the two sums of money, and giving the two waive notes. Scheuing was not examined as a witness. There was some testimony tending to show that when these two transactions, and those after noted, took place, Mrs. Scheuing had no property. There was none that she owned any property or means with which to make purchases. There are other noteworthy features and some discrepancies in the testimony of Mrs. Zeigler and that of Mrs. Mehne, but we will not point them out. It will be seen in what we have stated that the business transactions of these parties, as testified to, while not altogether impossible, are nevertheless peculiar, and outside of the customary paths of human dealings. They do not command assent by their reasonablenesss. The second, or larger, of Scheuing's notes to Mrs. Zeigler matured October 12, 1886. Ten days afterwards,—October 22, 1886,—Scheuing and wife, on the recited consideration of $700, conveyed to her two lots in the town of Cullman, and two tracts of land in the country,—one of 80, and one of 40, acres. We have stated above the items which it is claimed made up this $700 of consideration. Soon after the purchase Mrs. Zeigler sold to Abels the 40-acre tract for $150, and leased to Mrs. Scheuing, for the balance of that year, one of the lots, on which were standing some old stables. The terms of this lease are not clearly shown. Another formal letting was made by written lease from Mrs. Zeigler to Mrs. Scheuing, commencing January 1, 1887, and to run 10 years. By the terms of this lease the tenant had the privilege of erecting a building or other structure on the lot, and was to pay an agreed annual rent of $30 a year. Under this lease a livery stable was erected worth four or five hundred dollars. The livery stable has been kept in the name of Mrs. Scheuing, but has been superintended and managed by Scheuing himself. The other of the town lots was sold by Mrs. Zeigler to Mrs. Scheuing for $650. It is thus shown that for the two pieces of property she has received back $100 more than she claims to have paid for the four. After weighing the testimony with some care, we have reached the conclusion that the entire property when sold to Mrs. Zeigler was worth $950. Giving due weight to the very peculiar and unusual circumstances brought to view in this transcript, our ruling would have been the same as that of the chancellor, if the case had come before us in the first instance. Affirmed.

BROWN et al. v. PETERS.

NEW TRIAL — SPLITTING JUDGMENT — BREACH OF WARRANTY — ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS.

1. An order granting a new trial declared the "motion granted to this extent, judgment set aside as to all but $77.50, and parties allowed to litigate as to any balance claimed by plaintiff." Held, that if this was an exercise of the power to split up the demand as a matter of right, and therefore unauthorized, the subsequent payment by defendants of the amount for which the judgment was allowed to stand was an acceptance of the grant of the new trial in the manner awarded, and therefore estopped them from denying the court's authority.

2. Where lumber sold is of such a quality as to justify the purchasers in refusing to pay the contract price, and they notify the seller of this, and refuse to take it except at a price named by them, their subsequent use of it, on not hearing from the seller, renders them liable for at least its market value.

Appeal from circuit court, Dale county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Action by J. E. Peters against J. M. Brown & Co., counting on the common counts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The claim of plaintiff was founded upon an alleged contract by which he was to furnish the defendants hewed lumber, for which he was to receive $16.66⅔ per thousand feet. Defendants pleaded the general issue, and that the plaintiff did not comply with his contract to furnish them hewed lumber, but had furnished them sawed and planed lumber, which was not worth as much as they agreed to pay for the hewed lumber, and hence there was not due the plaintiff the full amount claimed. On the trial from which this appeal is taken, as is shown by the bill of exceptions, the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that he had delivered to the railroad, for transportation to the defendants, lumber which had been sawed and planed; that the defendants, upon the receipt of the said lumber, informed the plaintiff that it was not the lumber contracted for, and that they would only give $10 per thousand feet for it; that, if this was not satisfactory to him, the lumber was subject to his order; that plaintiff had not replied, and that three days afterwards defendants used the lumber, and tendered the amount to the plaintiff, which he had offered for said lumber, to-wit, $10 per thousand feet. Defendants testified that the lumber contracted for was to be used for piling, and that hewed lumber was far superior to any other kind for this purpose, and was the only kind of lumber they used for piling. The bill of exceptions stated that, "under the rulings of the court, the market value of the sawed and planed lumber at the time of delivery was the amount for which defendants were liable. Upon this point the evidence was in conflict, some witnesses saying that it was worth $16.66⅔ per thousand feet, and some saying that it was worth only $10. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed damages at $16.66⅔ per thousand feet. The defendants asked the court in writing to charge the jury 'that if they believed the evidence they should find for the defendants.' This charge was refused by the court, and the defendants duly excepted." The first trial in this case was had at the January term of the Dale circuit court, 1890, at which term judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $122.61, the full amount claimed. On motion of the defendants to set aside the verdict as above rendered, and grant a new trial, the court granted said motion, and the judgment entry recited as follows: "Judgment set aside as to all but $77.50, and the parties allowed to litigate as to any balance claimed by plaintiff." At the July term, 1890, of said court, the defendants made a motion to strike the said cause from the docket of said court, on the ground that the record of said court showed that the judgment had been rendered in said court at the January term in favor of the plaintiff, and that said judgment had been satisfied by the defendants, and that said cause is merely a redocketing of the cause in which judgment has been rendered, and the record shows that said judgment has been satisfied. This motion was overruled by the court. On the second trial of the cause, at the January term, 1891, the defendants pleaded res adjudicata, in addition to the other pleas, and among other facts offered to introduce in evidence the record of the former trial between the same parties, about the same subject-matter, and upon the same pleadings. But this evidence was disallowed by the court, and the defendants duly excepted to this ruling. After the rendition of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff at the January term, 1891, the defendants again moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury in this cause on the ground that one of the jurors which then tried the case was a juror at the January term, 1890. The court overruled this motion. On this appeal the various rulings of the court upon the motions and evidence, and the refusal to give the general affirmative charge to the defendants, are assigned as error.

Sayre, Stringfellow & Le Grand and Borders & Carmichael, for appellants. H. L. Martin, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. Issue having been joined, and a verdict thereon returned against defendants for the sum of $122.60, judgment was rendered at the January term, 1890, in favor of plaintiff for that sum. During the same term the court, on motion of defendants for a new trial, set aside the judgment, except as to $77.50, and granted a new trial as to the residue of plaintiff's demand. Defendants, by motions to dismiss the suit, made at subsequent terms of the court, and by plea, raised the question of the power of the court to grant a new trial as to a part of plaintiff's demand, leaving the judgment to stand in reference to the balance, and also the legal effect of such order. On the principle that a judgment is an entirety, it may be conceded, as a general proposition, that when issue has been formed, and verdict thereon, the court has no authority to sever the matter thus put in issue and found by the jury. It was so held in Dale v. Mosely, 4 Stew. & P. 371, which was a trial of the right of property to two slaves. Judgment of condemnation as to both having been rendered, a new trial was granted as to one, and refused as to the other, which, it was held, the court had no authority to do. In the subsequent case of Edwards v. Lewis, 18 Ala. 494, though the decision of the question was not necessary to its determination, Justices PARSONS and DARGAN affirmed the same principle, on the ground that a judgment "cannot be severed, so as to authorize one execution for one part, and another for another part." In both of these cases the power of the court to impose terms as a condition on which a new trial will be granted is recognized. In the first it is said: "It would have been competent for the court below to have offered the complainant his choice, to take a new trial for one of the slaves on condition of his relinquishing claim to the other;" and in the latter, DARGAN, C. J., says: "The courts can always, in the exercise of their discretion, impose terms, as a condition upon which a new trial will be granted;" suggesting, however, that when the court may be disposed, in its discretion, to grant a new trial after judgment is rendered as to part of what is recovered by the verdict, it should be set aside entirely, and the cause continued to await the second verdict; and that the terms should not be the rendition of judgment for part of the demands sued for, and the cause continued for the purpose of litigating the residue. It may be that this mode of proceeding is more technically correct, but the practice of requiring a party asking a new trial to confess judgment for the part of plaintiff's demand not contested, or to pay it, as a condition on which a new trial is awarded, has prevailed too long, and been too uniformly followed, to be now departed from without sufficient reason therefor. As said by CHILTON, J., in Edwards v. Lewis, supra: "There is no necessity for departing from the practice of requiring parties, who admit a portion of a demand to be justly due, to confess a judgment for that portion, or even to pay it, as a condition for granting a new trial or a continuance. * * * I concede that the court has not the power to split up demands as a matter of legal right, but can, in the interposition of terms, require the party asking a new trial to submit to such terms as a condition upon which it will be awarded; and it is well settled no writ of error will lie for the purpose of reversing the exercise of such discretion." This practice subserves the ends of justice; the plaintiff receiving that part of his demand admitted by the defendant to be due, or at least not contested, and the defendant is allowed the right to litigate as to the disputed portion. The same principle has been declared in respect to requiring a confession of judgment for a part of the demand sued for as a condition of continuance. Davis v. McCampbell, 87 Ala. 609. It is true the order granting a new trial as to a part of the amount recovered by plaintiff does not expressly prescribe a confession of judgment, or a consent that it may stand for the undisputed part of plaintiff's demand, as a condition on which the new trial was awarded. Its terms are: "Motion granted to this extent; judgment set aside as to all but seventy-seven 50-100 dollars, and parties allowed to litigate as to any balance claimed by plaintiff,"—apparently an exercise of the power to split the demand as a matter of legal right. If conceded that the order was unauthorized, so far as it allows the judgment to have effect as to a part of the sum recovered by the verdict, the legal effect of the order granting the new trial as to the residue would be to set aside the judgment in toto, and to continue the cause for a new trial as to that part of plaintiff's demand which by the order the plaintiff was allowed to litigate on another trial, only that part of the order leaving the judgment unaltered to a partial extent being unauthorized and void. In Dale v. Mosely, supra, it was held that the new trial should be entire, or not at all; and a writ of error taken to reverse the judgment of condemnation as to the slave in reference to whom the new trial was refused, while the suit as to the other was pending, was held to be irregular and dismissed. It also appears that the sum for which the judgment was allowed to stand was subsequently paid by defendants. This may be regarded as a virtual consent to, and acceptance of, the grant of the new trial in the manner in which it was awarded, and operated to estop them from a denial of the authority of the court to grant a new trial for a part of the sum recovered by the verdict, leaving the judgment in full force as to the residue. From the foregoing principles it follows that, in any view taken of the case, the court did not err in overruling the motion to dismiss the suit, nor in refusing to admit in evidence the record of the judgment and the order granting a new trial.

Admitting that the proof showed a breach of warranty of the character and quality of the lumber on the part of plaintiff sufficient to justify defendants in refusing to pay the contract price, their subsequent use of the lumber rendered them liable for, at least, its market value. The mere fact that they notified plaintiff that the lumber was not of the character contracted for, and would not answer the purpose for which it was ordered, and their offer to pay a lower named price, which was not accepted, did not, under the circumstances, exempt them from liability to this extent. The evidence as to the market value being conflicting, the affirmative charge requested by defendants was properly refused.

Neither is there error in overruling the second motion for a new trial. The record is silent as to the offer of any evidence showing the existence of the facts on which it is based. Such being the case, without deciding the sufficiency of the facts, if established, to authorize a new trial, we must presume, in support of the ruling of the court, either there was no evidence, or that the evidence disproved the ground of the motion. Affirmed.

BUFORD et al. v. SHANNON et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF PURCHASER—CONSIDERATION.

1. In ejectment, the fact that defendant knew of his vendor's insolvency does not render his deed inadmissible as against a purchaser at a sale under an attachment levied soon after the deed was executed, but before it was recorded, the attaching creditor knowing of his claim.

2. Though the recited consideration of a deed is money "in hand paid," it may be shown that the real consideration was the satisfaction of prior indebtedness.

3. A motion to strike out all the testimony of a witness, only a part of which is inadmissible, is properly denied.

4. A conveyance of land by an insolvent debtor in part satisfaction of prior indebtedness is not invalidated by a subsequent and independent transaction made on the same day, wherein the debtor sells merchandise to the vendee to settle the rest of the debt, though the vendee then pays the debtor a small sum of money to balance the account.

5. Where an insolvent debtor conveys land to satisfy prior indebtedness to a creditor with knowledge of his insolvency, though the burden of proof is on such creditor to show, by clear and convincing evidence, that the consideration was equal to the value of the land, he need not prove all the separate items aggregating such indebtedness.

Appeal from circuit court, Blount county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Ejectment by Buford, McLester & Co. against M. L. Shannon and another. Verdict and judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The court refused to give the following written charges requested by plaintiffs: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that Shannon owed the plaintiffs a sum of money before the 6th day of February, 1886, then the law casts upon the defendants the burden of proving the consideration of the conveyance from Shannon to Allred by clear and satisfactory proof; and if the jury further find from the evidence that Allred was the son-in-law of Shannon, then the law is that defendants must prove the component amounts aggregating the fair value of the land; and if they fail to prove the different amounts by items which, added together, will show the payment of the value of the property conveyed, then it is the duty of the jury to find for plaintiffs." (2) "The court charges you, gentlemen of the jury, that, if you believe the evidence in this case, you will find that Allred either knew or was in possession of the facts calculated to stimulate inquiry; and if you find the fact so to be, and that on the day the conveyance was made from Shannon to Allred that Allred paid Shannon $25.00 or $30.00 in money, then this would render the transaction fraudulent and void as to plaintiffs, and your verdict should be for plaintiffs." (3) "The law requires the defendants to show an indebtedness from Shannon to Allred equal to the fair valuation of the land conveyed by Shannon to Allred on February 6, 1886; and if defendants have failed to show by clear and satisfactory proof the different items of indebtedness from Shannon which, when added together, will aggregate the reasonable value of the land at the time it was conveyed by Shannon to Allred, then plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment for the land sued for; and, if you believe this evidence, you should so find by your verdict." (4) "The court charges you, gentlemen, that the loans of $150.00, $50.00, $35.00, $25.00, and $50.00 are the only payments by Allred to Shannon established by defendants by that measure of proof the law requires of defendants in this case, and this amount is insufficient to establish the bona fides of the deed from Shannon to Allred, and your verdict should therefore be for plaintiffs for the lands sued for." (5) "The defendants must prove the payment of the reasonable value of the lands conveyed by Shannon to Allred; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the payments of $150.00 at one time, $50.00 at another, $35.00 at another, $25.00 at another, and $50.00 at another, were all the payments made by Allred to Shannon, as established by clear proof, then the court charges you, gentlemen, that said deed is fraudulent and void as against the plaintiffs, and your verdict should be for plaintiffs for the lands sued for." (6) "The burden of proof is upon the defendants to show, by clear and satisfactory evidence, that Shannon owed Allred on the 6th day of February, 1886, an amount equal to the reasonable and market value of the land conveyed, and also to show the different amounts due by Shannon to Allred aggregating the value of the land conveyed at that time; and, unless the jury believe the evidence shows this to their satisfaction, the defendants are not entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the plaintiffs for the lands sued for." (7) "If the jury believe from the evidence that Allred got $60.00 or $100.00 worth of goods from Shannon on February 6, 1886, in addition to the land conveyed by deed of that date, then the duty devolved upon the defendants of showing, by clear and satisfactory evidence, the existence of an indebtedness from Shannon to Allred equal to the value of the goods and land so conveyed; and, unless the jury believe that evidence clearly establishes this amount of indebtedness, the verdict, under the law, should be for plaintiffs." (8) "If the jury believe the evidence of J. P. Green is the only evidence before them of the sale of both the land and goods, and if they further believe that both sales were made at the same time, and that $25.00 or $30.00 were paid, and if there is no other evidence of said sale, and said Green is uncontradicted and unimpeached, then they cannot disregard his testimony capriciously; and if they believe this testimony, in connection with the other evidence, then they should find that the deed from Shannon to Allred is void, and find a verdict for plaintiffs." (9) "If the jury believe from the evidence that Allred bought $60.00 or $100.00 worth of goods from Shannon on February 6, 1886, then the burden of proof is upon the defendants to show that Shannon owed Allred an amount equal to the value of the goods, in addition to the value of the land; and, unless this indebtedness is shown by clear and satisfactory proof, your verdict should be for plaintiffs." (10) "In this case the burden of proof is upon the defendants to show, by clear, satisfactory proof, the value of the consideration passing from Allred to Shannon for the property conveyed by Shannon to Allred, and, in absence of such proof, to the satisfaction of the jury, they should find for the plaintiffs." (11) "The court charges you, gentlemen, that under the law of this case, and the evidence before you, if you believe the evidence, the deed from Shannon to Allred of date of February 6, 1886, is fraudulent and void as against the plaintiffs." (12) "The jury cannot indulge in any presumption of payment by Allred to Shannon, but it devolves upon the defendants to show, by clear and satisfactory proof, the payment by Allred to Shannon of the value of the property conveyed, and, if defendants fail to prove this, then the jury will find a verdict for plaintiffs." (13) "There is no proof before you, gentlemen of the jury, of an indebtedness from Shannon to Allred of $1,400.00, such as the law requires by clear and satisfactory evidence." (14) "There is no proof before the jury of an indebtedness of $1,400.00 from Shannon to Allred, and the jury will not look to any evidence about $1,400.00 being due." (15) "There is no proof before you, gentlemen, of any indebtedness from Shannon to Allred of $1,400.00."

(16) "If the jury believe the evidence in this cause, they should find for the plaintiffs."

John C. Eyster and Dickinson & Hall, for appellants.

McCLELLAN, J. This is an action of ejectment prosecuted by Buford, McLester & Co. against John A. Allred and others. Plaintiffs claim under a deed executed to them by the marshal of the United States district court for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, by whom the land was sold under a judgment and condemnation in attachment prosecuted by said plaintiffs against M. L. Shannon for the collection of a debt existing prior to February 6, 1886. The attachment was levied on the land February 11, 1886. The marshal's deed bears date as of December 1, 1887. Defendants claim under a deed executed February 6, 1886, prior to the levy of the attachment by Shannon, the debtor and defendant in attachment, to John A. Allred, on a recited consideration of $700 "in hand paid." This deed was not recorded until February 25, 1886, subsequent to the levy. Shannon's insolvency at the date of his deed to Allred may be taken as having been conceded on the trial below. For all the purposes of this appeal, it may be further conceded that Allred had knowledge or notice of his grantor's insolvency. From the foregoing facts and concessions it follows that the burden was on Allred to show a conveyance by Shannon to him in satisfaction of an antecedent bona fide debt, and substantially equal in amount to the value of the land conveyed. In discharge of this burden, defendants offered the deed which we have described. Its introduction in evidence was objected to in limine, on the ground that "it was fraudulent and void on its face as against plaintiffs, creditors of Shannon, in this: Because said deed was executed on the 6th day of February, 1886, and was not filed for record until the 25th day of February, 1886, and plaintiffs' lien on said property was acquired by the levy of the writs of attachments thereon on the 11th day of February, 1886." The court very properly overruled this objection. The delay in putting the deed to record shown in this case did not avoid it as against an intervening attachment levy; and, moreover, it is not controverted but that plaintiffs had actual notice of Allred's claim of title to the land before the levy was made.

2. The assignment of error based on the refusal of the court to exclude testimony going to show that the consideration of the deed was an indebtedness from the grantor to the grantee is untenable. This class of cases does not involve an exception to the rule that, where a particular valuable consideration—as money presently paid—is recited, another and valuable consideration, as the satisfaction of a pre-existing indebtedness, may be shown in support of the deed. Wait, Fraud. & Conv. § 221; Bank v. McDonnell, 89 Ala. 434, 8 South. Rep. 137.

3. It may be that certain declarations of Shannon as to what he was paying Allred for his services deposed to by the witness Green, were not competent to prove the debt relied on by Allred as a consideration for the conveyance to him; but this witness also testified as to the compensation agreed on between Shannon and Allred as the latter's wages. We know of no more direct or approved method of establishing the fact in question than this. The motion of plaintiff in this connection was to exclude, not only Shannon's declarations, but his agreement with Allred. There was no error in overruling it. Kellar v. Taylor, 90 Ala. 289, 7 South. Rep. 907; Badders v. Davis, 88 Ala. 367, 6 South. Rep. 834; Lowe v. State, 88 Ala. 8, 7 South. Rep. 97.

4. The evidence tended to show that the whole amount of Shannon's indebtedness to Allred was $1,400. On the day on which Allred purchased the land involved here from Shannon, in satisfaction in part of this indebtedness, he also purchased from him a stock of goods valued at $20, or $25 more than the balance of his claim, and paid therefor either $20 or $25 in money, and the balance by satisfying that part of his debt not liquidated in the land transaction. In view of Shannon's insolvency and Allred's knowledge of it, this latter transaction, involving, as it did, a present cash consideration in part, would have invalidated the sale and conveyance of the land could the transactions be considered as one, or had there been any connection between the two. But that there was no such connection is put beyond a doubt, for all our purposes, by the following recital in the bill of exceptions: "The evidence further tended to show, and upon this point there was no controversy, that the deed for the property in suit was executed and delivered before any negotiations were had with reference to the goods; that afterwards, and perhaps on the same day, Shannon sold Allred groceries, etc., to pay balance due; that after the goods were selected and invoiced they amounted to some $20 or $25 more than the balance, and Allred paid that difference in money." In view of this recital, it is not conceivable how the purchase of the goods can in any way affect the prior and wholly disconnected transaction with respect to the land. Yet the objection to the charge given for the defendants, and the exceptions to the refusal of the court of charges 2, 7, 8, and 9, proceed on the theory that the first transaction, though in and of itself bona fide and valid, was infected with fraud and avoided by what subsequently and wholly independently took place between the parties in reference to the stock of groceries; while charges 10 and 12, asked by plaintiff and refused by the court, manifestly tended to mislead the jury to the same conclusion. The assignments of error addressed to the court's action on these several charges are without merit.

5. While the burden of proving the prior existence and present satisfaction of an indebtedness from Shannon to Allred in amount equal to the value of the land as a consideration for the deed, by clear and convincing evidence, was on the defendants, as declared in many of the charges refused to the plaintiffs, it is quite an error to suppose, as these charges further declare, that it was essential to prove each separate item aggregating the requisite sum. Cases may well be imagined—and, indeed, this is one of them—where proof of a gross sum found to be due, acknowledged, and agreed to be paid, on a settlement between the parties, might well be entirely satisfactory to a jury, though the witnesses deposing thereto had no knowledge whatever of the dealings between the parties, or the items of debit and credit involved therein, which necessitated and led up to such settlement. Such instructions are especially pernicious in cases like this, where, it appears, both the creditor and debtor, the only persons who ordinarily would be conversant with the itemization of the account, die before the trial is had. Charges 1, 3, 6, 11, 13, 14, 15, and 16, asked by the plaintiffs, either expressly require proof of the items of the alleged indebtedness, or proceed on the theory that such proof is essential, and this, though the jury might reasonably be entirely satisfied of the amount and bona fides of the claim from other competent evidence. And charges 4 and 5 were well calculated to mislead the jury to the conclusion that they could not find an indebtedness beyond certain specific sums which one witness testified that Allred loaned to Shannon, because the alleged debt in excess of this amount was not proved, item by item, though there was abundant proof, even by plaintiffs' own witnesses, that these loans did not constitute the whole indebtedness, and other evidence tending to show that, on settlements made between the parties, the balance in Allred's favor was largely more than the sum of these loans. Many, if not all, of these charges were faulty in other particulars, but it is unnecessary to further discuss them. Each of them was properly refused. We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

ABANDONMENT OF HOMESTEAD—LEASE.

Code, § 2539, provides that when a declaration of claim to a homestead exemption has been filed in the office of the judge of probate, leaving the homestead temporarily or leasing it shall not constitute an abandonment. Held that, where no declaration was filed, leasing the homestead, although with the intention of reoccupying it at the end of the term, was an abandonment.

Appeal from circuit court, Macon county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Ignatius Pollak against W. P. Caldwell and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Foster, for appellant. Watts & Son, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. Pollak, the appellant, claims under a purchase at sheriff's sale and sheriff's deed made pursuant thereto. The judgment and execution under which he purchased were against Mrs. A. M. Kelly. The judgment was rendered in 1881, and soon thereafter execution was levied on the house and lot which are the subject of the present suit. Mrs. Kelly interposed a sworn, written claim of homestead exemption. The claim was not contested, and no sale was made under that levy. No other execution was issued on the judgment for some years. All the testimony tends to show that the house and lot were worth not exceeding $1,000, and that she occupied the property as a residence and homestead, at least until she left the premises in 1888. This is the second appeal in this case. Caldwell v. Pollak, 91 Ala. 353, 8 South. Rep. 546. On the first trial it was shown that, commencing a few years after the first levy and claim of exemption in 1881, executions had been regularly issued and kept in the hands of the sheriff of the county, without a lapse of a term, until the sale was made in 1889. Execution was issued in March, 1888, and returned by the sheriff, without action, in September following. Another execution was issued in September, 1888, on which the sheriff, on February 2, 1889, indorsed a levy on the property sued for in this action, and returned the execution, with his indorsement thereon "that he had not sold the same for want of time to make publication." On April 2, 1889, the last execution was issued, under which the sheriff sold the property in May, 1889, and Pollak became the purchaser, receiving the sheriff's deed. The testimony shows without conflict that Mrs. Kelly died in January, 1889, before the sheriff made any levy, after 1881. So, whether the levy made in February, 1889, and sale made in May afterwards, vested any title in the purchaser, depends on the inquiry, had the execution acquired a lien on the house and lot during the life-time of Mrs. Kelly? Unless it had acquired such lien before her death in January preceding, the sale was void, and Pollak was without title. Code 1886, § 2897; Hendon v. White, 52 Ala. 597; Sims v. Eslava, 74 Ala. 594. On the first trial it was testified that Mrs. Kelly had a married daughter living in Columbus, Ga., and that in October or November, 1888, she left the premises, and went to her daughter's home. She never returned, but died at her daughter's, in January, 1889. The facts affecting her previous occupancy of the house, and her leaving it in 1888, were testified to as follows: "Mrs. Amanda M. Kelly, after Mr. Kelly's death, for many years resided on, occupied, and controlled said house and lot before her death, which occurred in January, 1889; that Mrs. Kelly, while so in possession of said house, at different times rented a portion of said house to other persons; that she rented a portion of said house to Mr. ———, in the year 1888." Another witness testified "that Mrs. Kelly occupied and controlled said house and lot for some 4, 5, or 6 years past. * * *" It was also proven by plaintiff that Mrs. Kelly left Tuskegee and went to Georgia in October or November, 1888. The claim of exemption filed in 1881, when the first levy was made, consisted of Mrs. Kelly's affidavit of claim, which was lodged with the sheriff. We have now stated everything which the record on the former appeal showed bearing on the question of Mrs. Kelly's abandonment of her residence. The record affirmed that it contained all the evidence. It cannot be gainsaid that, according to the facts then shown, the dwelling had for years been Mrs. Kelly's homestead. Renting out some of her rooms, she continuing to reside in the house, was not a change of residence on her part. So, going off on a temporary visit, with the expectation of returning and occupying the house as her home, would not be a forfeiture of her homestead. Boyle v. Shulman, 59 Ala. 566; Lehman v. Bryan, 67 Ala. 558. The trial court had charged the jury, as matter of law, that, if they believed all the evidence, they must find for the plaintiff. This we held was error. We said it should have been left to the jury to determine with what intention Mrs. Kelly left home when she went to Georgia. On the facts then presented, we find nothing to cause us to change our ruling. We still hold that merely going off on a visit, even though it be a long visit, if there be nothing else in the transaction, is no forfeiture of the homestead. On the second trial in this case the testimony was materially different. Mr. Motley testified on the second trial "that Mrs. Kelly had rented the house and lot and a part of the furniture to Rev. Mr. Jones at the beginning of 1888, reserving a room in the house for her board; and that she had remained in the house until about the 1st day of May, 1888, when she left the same, and went to Georgia, where her daughter lived, on a visit to her." If the testimony had stopped at this point, we would hold that our rulings on the former appeal would be applicable to this. It would still remain a question for the jury to inquire whether in going to Georgia Mrs. Kelly's intention was to cease to be a resident of her former dwelling, or simply to visit her daughter. Speaking, however, of the time Mrs. Kelly left home on that occasion, this witness stated "that she [Mrs. Kelly] then rented the house and lot and a part of the furniture to Mr. Jones for ten dollars per month." This testimony is nowhere disputed or qualified by any other testimony, and the bill of exceptions states it contains all the evidence. This testimony, unexplained, if true, brings the case directly within section 2539 of the Code of 1886,[1] and was a forfeiture of the homestead exemption, even though Mrs. Kelly intended to return and reoccupy the residence after the termination of the lease. It was a break or chasm in her continued occupancy, and, unlike a mere visit paid, was a surrender of the exemption, unless a declaration of claim of homestead exemption had been filed in the office of the judge of probate. Code, §§ 2515, 2516, 2539; Stow v. Lillie, 63 Ala. 259; Scaife v. Argall, 74 Ala. 473; Murphy v. Hunt, 75 Ala. 438. It is nowhere shown that Mrs. Kelly had made and filed such declaration of claim in the probate office. On the testimony found in this record the general charge asked by the plaintiff ought to have been given. There is nothing in the other exceptions. Reversed and remanded.

[1]Code, § 2539, provides that "when a declaration of claim to a homestead exemption has been filed in the office of the judge of probate, leaving the homestead temporarily, or a leasing of the same, shall not operate an abandonment thereof, or render it subject to levy and sale," etc.

EMINENT DOMAIN—REMEDIES OF ABUTTING OWNERS—DAMAGES.

1. Where a corporation vested with the power of eminent domain, and authorized by its charter to build its railway along a certain street, builds its road without the consent of the owners of property abutting thereon, and without making them compensation, such owners may maintain an action at law for the injuries suffered thereby.

2. In such case, plaintiff may recover prospective damages.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Action by Jonathan Matthews and others against the Highland-Avenue & Belt Railroad Company for damages. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

In this action plaintiff sought to recover damages for injuries caused by defendant to his lot by the construction of an embankment along the avenue upon which the lot adjoined. To the complaint as amended the defendant demurred, among others, upon the ground that the plaintiff cannot recover damages for permanent injury to the land, in this form of action. This demurrer was overruled. The court, at the request of the plaintiffs, gave the following written charges: (1) "The rule by which the damages are to be estimated in this case is the difference between the market value of the property immediately before the taking or injury and such value immediately after the taking or injury caused by the construction of the railroad; in other words, the diminution in value at the time, produced thereby." (2) "Market value is the price which the property will bring when offered for sale in the market, not at a forced sale on short notice, but after such reasonable time as would be ordinarily taken to make a sale of like property. It is the highest price which at such sale those having the ability and the occasion to buy are willing to pay." (3) "If the jury are reasonably satisfied that the overflow of water on plaintiffs' property is increased by the embankment erected by the defendant for their railroad, then this is a circumstance to be considered by you in estimating any damage to the market value of the plaintiffs' property." (4) "Plaintiffs are entitled to just compensation for all injury done to plaintiffs' property by the construction of defendant's railroad on the embankment in front of the property, and the fact that property along the line of defendant's railroad appreciated in value generally, or was generally benefited by the construction of the railroad, cannot be considered by you to diminish or as a set-off to any special damage that you may find to have been done to plaintiffs' property, resulting in a reduction of its market value by the construction of defendant's railroad." The defendant separately excepted to the giving of each of these charges, and also separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of the following written charges: (1) "That the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover as damages the difference between the value of the property before the construction of the railroad and the value thereof after such construction." (2) "That the cost of filling the lot up to the level of the railroad is not the measure of damages in this case, and the jury cannot consider such cost in estimating damages." (3) "That in estimating damages the jury cannot consider the permanent injuries, if any, which the plaintiffs have sustained by reason of the construction of the railroad in Avenue E, in front of the plaintiffs' lot." (4) "That in estimating damages the jury cannot take into consideration the smoke, rumbling, shaking, or noise incident to the operation of the railroad along Avenue E." There was, on the first trial, judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $750. Upon the court's granting a new trial, from the rulings in which the present appeal is prosecuted, there was judgment for $1,000.

Alex. T. London, for appellant. Chisholm & Whaley, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This was an action to recover damages caused to the plaintiffs' lot near the city of Birmingham by the construction of an embankment for the track of the defendant's railroad in the street or highway upon which the lot abutted. It was alleged in the complaint, and there was evidence tending to show, that the defendant is a corporation clothed with the right to call into exercise the power of eminent domain, and authorized by its charter to build its railroad along the street or highway in question, and that, without the consent of the plaintiffs and without making them compensation, it built its railroad upon a fill or embankment made in front of the plaintiffs' lot, and thereby obstructed the ingress and egress to and from such lot, and otherwise injured it. The averments and proof show that a corporation invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use has, in the construction of its works, injured such property without first paying compensation for such injury. This constitutes a violation of the rights secured by section 7 of article 14 of the constitution of Alabama. For the redress of such a wrong an action at law lies. The jurisdiction of a court of equity to prevent the commission of such a wrong is not based upon the absence or inadequacy of legal remedies for the recovery of damages for the wrong when it has been consummated. The recognized equitable remedies may find support upon either of two grounds: (1) Upon the special jurisdiction of courts of equity to confine corporations to the exercise of the powers conferred upon them by law; and (2) upon the inadequacy of legal remedies to protect the constitutional right in its entirety, courts of law being unable to compel the payment of compensation to the property owner before his property is taken, injured, or destroyed. Railway Co. v. Witherow, 82 Ala. 190, 3 South. Rep. 23; East & W. R. Co. v. East T., V. & G. R. Co., 75 Ala. 275. The property owner, however, may fail to avail himself of the preventive equitable remedies, and rely upon his action at law for the redress of the wrong after it has been committed. If his land has been taken without his consent, and without having been duly acquired by condemnation proceedings, he can maintain ejectment for its recovery. Hooper v. Railway Co., 78 Ala. 213; Railroad Co. v. Jones, 68 Ala. 48. If his property has not been so taken, but has been injured by the construction of the defendant's works, he may sue at law to recover damages for such injury. Jones v. Railroad Co., 70 Ala. 227. Such actions have been maintained in this court without question, and we are unable to discover any reasonable ground upon which the right to maintain them can be controverted. Railway Co. v. Coskry, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 202; Railway Co. v. Williams, Id. 203; Evans v. Railway Co., 90 Ala. 54, 7 South. Rep. 758; City Council v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489, 2 South. Rep. 155; City Council v. Maddox, 89 Ala. 181, 7 South. Rep. 433. The property owner may waive formal condemnation proceedings, and yet recover such damages as he may suffer in his property by reason of the building of the railroad upon or near it. Railroad Co. v. McGehee, 41 Ark. 202; U. S. v. Manufacturing Co., 112 U. S. 645, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306; Cohen v. Railroad Co., (Kan.) 8 Pac. Rep. 138. A claim in the complaint of damages which the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action does not impair the right to maintain the suit. A demurrer to a complaint which states a good cause of action is not the proper mode of evoking a decision of the court as to the rule to govern in the admeasurement of damages for the injury alleged. Kennon v. Telegraph Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 200; Carl v. Railroad Co., 46 Wis. 625, 1 N. W. Rep. 295. There was no error in overruling the demurrers to the complaint.

The principal contention in the case is upon the rulings of the trial court on the question of the measure of damages. The appellant insists that the plaintiffs could not be entitled to recover prospective damages, that they were treating the obstruction complained of as a nuisance, and that in an action for the injury caused thereby their recovery could not go beyond the damages sustained prior to the commencement of the suit. In the Alabama cases against municipal corporations, the measure of damages for injury caused to abutting property by changes in the grades of streets or sidewalks has been stated to be the difference in the market value of the property before and after the act complained of. City Council v. Maddox, 89 Ala. 181, 7 South. Rep. 433; City Council v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489, 2 South. Rep. 155. The appellant contends that those authorities are not applicable here. It is true that the rule contended for by the appellant is supported by the decisions in several states. In Uline v. Railroad Co.,

101 N. Y. 98, 4 N. E. Rep. 536, the suit was by an abutting owner to recover damages sustained from the construction of a railway in the street fronting his premises, and, after a full consideration of the question of the measure of damages, it was held that the plaintiff could recover only temporary damages; that is, such damages as had been sustained up to the commencement of the action. This ruling has been adhered to in later cases arising in that court, and some other courts have reached similar conclusions. Carl v. Railroad Co., 46 Wis. 625, 1 N. W. Rep. 295; 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 595, note 4. There are evidences in the later New York cases that that court has not remained satisfied with the decision in the Uline Case. The inconveniences which have been developed in the attempts to adhere to that ruling have, however, been obviated, in a great measure, by encouraging such shifts as permitting damages for permanent injury to property to be assessed in such cases if the defendant failed to invoke the benefit of the decision against the propriety of this course, thus allowing the rule as to the measure of damages to be determined by the acquiescence of the parties, rather than by the law; or by allowing a judgment for past loss of rentals, and in the same case granting an injunction restraining the further operation and maintenance of the road, unless the defendant paid a certain sum equal to the amount of depreciation in the value of the property, as for a permanent appropriation. Pond v. Railway Co., 112 N. Y. 186, 19 N. E. Rep. 487; 3 Sedg. Dam. (8th Ed.) 465–476, where there is a review and criticism of the New York cases. The principal reasons suggested for limiting the recovery in a case like this one to the damages sustained up to the commencement of the suit are (1) that when the defendant has paid the permanent damages it should have a clear title to the property taken, and such title cannot be acquired as a result of a judgment against it in an action for trespass or for a nuisance; and (2) that the person injured by a nuisance may have it abated, and it would be unjust to allow the plaintiff to recover damages for the permanent injury caused to his property by the nuisance, and still retain the right to bring subsequent actions for damages caused by a continuance of the nuisance, and also the right to have the nuisance itself abated at any time. The first of these reasons can have no weight on this case. The counsel for the plaintiffs expressly waived the right to recover compensation for the property which was taken by the defendant. The claim was for damages for the injury to the lot abutting on the street where the obstruction was made. The plaintiffs' entire claim would be satisfied by the payment of damages. If the defendant had had those damages assessed in condemnation proceedings, it would have acquired no title to the injured property. It is no objection to a judgment for the whole damages in this case that the defendant does not thereby get title to property which it has not taken, and which it does not seek to acquire. When compensation has been made to the plaintiffs for the injury to their property, they can no longer disturb the defendant on that account. The other reason suggested implies that the obstruction complained of must be treated as an abatable nuisance. It was not so treated in this case. There is nothing in the complaint or in the evidence to indicate that the embankment or fill was constructed otherwise than as the defendant would have been authorized to construct it if the damages occasioned thereby to the plaintiffs' property had been first assessed and paid. If the injury was such that final compensation therefor could have been made in condemnation proceedings, its character was not changed by the fact that such proceedings were not resorted to. There is no magic in such proceedings to compel a resort thereto in order to obtain an assessment of damages for an injury, the full damages from which in any other proceeding would be regarded as legally unascertainable or as incapable of recovery. Damages which can be assessed in condemnation proceedings can be assessed just as well in an ordinary action at law. It is not perceived why the payment of the damages awarded on a formal condemnation could be any more effectual to prevent the maintenance of subsequent suits by the property owner than would the payment of a judgment of a court of law for damages for exactly the same injury. The grievance of the plaintiffs is that they have not been paid for the injury caused to their lot. That claim can be fully satisfied by payment of a judgment for damages. There is nothing to indicate that the maintenance in its present condition of the structure erected by the defendant in front of the plaintiffs' lot will furnish them with any legal cause of complaint after they shall have been paid for the injury to their property. The plaintiffs' entire cause of action can be disposed of just as effectually in this suit as in any other form of proceeding. If the structure in question is of a permanent character, its existence and continuance in its present condition constitute but one wrong. Future and past damages on account of it are attributable to but one cause. To allow successive suits for the recovery of such damages in parts would amount to giving several causes of action for a single tort. This would be in violation of the principle that fresh damage, without a fresh injury, does not authorize a second or subsequent action. That cases like the present one come within this principle is the generally accepted view. The New York rule of damages recoverable at law has not prevailed in analogous cases decided in other jurisdictions. New York El. R. Co. v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 135 U. S. 432, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 743. In O'Brien v. Railroad Co., 119 Pa. St. 184, 13 Atl. Rep. 74, the action was for damages to property caused by excavations made along the street upon which the property abutted. It was held that the injury was single and indivisible, and that the damages could not be severed. In Fowle v. Railroad Co., 112 Mass. 334, it was held that the plaintiff could recover for prospective as well as past injury caused by the construction of a road-bed in such a manner as unnecessarily to turn the current of a stream against his land and wash away his soil. In Railroad Co. v. Loeb, 118 Ill. 203, 8 N. E. Rep. 460, it was decided that for taking or injuring land by the permanent structures of a railroad there should be but one response in damages. The reasonable rule on the subject, and the one which is maintained by the preponderance of the authorities, is that, where permanent structures are erected so as to cause a depreciation in value of adjacent or contiguous realty, the injured party may, and therefore must, recover compensation in one action for the entire loss, (1 Sedg. Dam., 8th Ed., § 95; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 20; Railway Co. v. Eberle, 110 Ind. 542, 11 N. E. Rep. 467; City of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 314, 2 N. E. Rep. 821; Troy v. Railroad Co., 23 N. H. 83;) and that the damages in such a case are to be measured by the depreciation in the market value of the property caused by the structure in question, (3 Sedg. Dam. 414.) The result is that the rule as to the measure of damages which has been stated in the Alabama cases against municipal corporations for similar injuries to property is equally applicable here. The charges given by the trial court on the question of the measure of damages are in harmony with the rule above announced. The charges upon that subject which were requested by the defendant, and refused by the court, were to the effect that prospective damages were to be excluded. As the evidence tended to show that the obstruction complained of is of a permanent character, causing permanent injury to plaintiffs' lot, those charges were properly refused. The rulings of the court involving other questions, though assigned as errors, were not insisted upon in the argument for the appellant, and for that reason will not be considered. Affirmed.

ELYTON LAND CO. v. SOUTH & NORTH ALA. R. CO.

RES JUDICATA — RAILROAD COMPANIES — USE OF RIGHT OF WAY — ERECTION OF DEPOTS — EJECTMENT.

1. In ejectment for land held by defendant railroad company as a right of way, which plaintiff claimed to hold as trustee for right of way of other railroads, by reason of the misuser of defendant in erecting thereon a freight depot, etc., it appeared that defendant took possession under a tripartite agreement made by plaintiff land company, defendant, and A. & C. R. Co., by which plaintiff was to hold the land forever as a perpetual right of way for all railroads doing business in B.; that afterwards plaintiff brought suit in equity against defendant and A. & C. R. Co., wherein a final decree was entered reciting that it appeared from "the bill and the admissions of complainant in open court that" defendant has complied with the agreement, and is entitled, under said agreement, "to the lands so designated and set apart to" defendant, "and, as to all other rights acquired for its use * * * under said agreement, the said agreement remains unaffected by this decree;" that following the decree plaintiff executed a deed to defendant, covering the land in question, with other lands, in which it was expressly stipulated that the right of the defendant acquired by said original agreement should remain in full force and effect. Held, that plaintiff was estopped from setting up a claim inconsistent with such decree and deed.

2. A railroad company may make any use of the land acquired by it for a right of way for its railroad, which contributes to the safe and efficient operation of the road, and which does not interfere with the rights of property pertaining to the adjacent lands, and the erection of a freight depot and other structures thereon was not a misuser.

3. If defendant had been guilty of a misuser of its right of way, plaintiff could not recover in ejectment, since, according to its own allegations, defendant and other railroads were entitled to possess and use the land as a right of way.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

Ejectment by the Elyton Land Company against the South & North Alabama Railroad Company to recover a strip of land used by defendant as a right of way in the city of Birmingham, with other lands. Trial was had by the court without a jury, and judgment entered for plaintiff, except for the strip in question, which was adjudged to defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alex. T. London, for appellant. Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The land involved in this suit is included in the description of the strips of land lying on either side of the right of way of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company, which, by the terms of the contract of April 21, 1871, between the Elyton Land Company, the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company, and the South & North Alabama Railroad Company, were to be held by the Elyton Land Company forever, as a perpetual right of way for all railroad companies doing business in and through the city of Birmingham. That contract was before this court in the case of the Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. South & N. A. R. Co., 84 Ala. 570, 3 South. Rep. 286, and the extent of the right conferred by its terms upon the South & North Alabama Railroad Company in the right of way of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company was there determined. In March, 1881, the Elyton Land Company filed its bill in chancery against the South & North Alabama Railroad Company and the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, alleging, in substance, the existence of the contract above referred to, the non-compliance by the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company as the successor of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company with the conditions of said agreement to be performed by the former of these two companies, and the partial compliance by the South & North Alabama Railroad Company with the conditions to be performed by it under said contract, so as to entitle that company to a portion of the lands which it was to receive under the contract. The complainant in that bill sought thereby to have revoked and declared forfeited the benefits stipulated for by said agreement in favor of the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, and of all other railroad companies, except the South & North Alabama Railroad Company. Decrees pro confesso were entered against both the defendants. A final decree was rendered, in which it was recited that "it appears from the allegations of the bill and the admissions of complainant in open court that the South & North Alabama Railroad Company has complied substantially with the terms and conditions of the agreement of April 21, 1871, and has agreed with the complainant on the boundaries of the lots or parcels of land to which the South & North Alabama Railroad Company is entitled under said agreement, being part and parcel of the lands therein described; and as to the lands so designated and set apart to the South & North Alabama Railroad Company, and as to all other rights acquired for its use, by said South & North Alabama Railroad Company under said agreement, the said agreement remains unaffected by this decree." It was decreed that said agreement be revoked, annulled, and declared void and of no effect as to the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company and its successor, the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, and as to all other railroad companies and all other persons; but the decree expressly reserved the right of the South & North Alabama Railroad Company for its own use under said agreement. The conclusive effect of this decree upon the rights of the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company was fully recognized in the case above cited. The result of the decree was to exclude all claim by that company upon any lands of the Elyton Land Company covered by the terms of the contract in question, and to leave the interest of the South & North Alabama Railroad Company in the strip of land involved in this suit undiminished, and, indeed, augmented, certainly to the extent of the exclusion of the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company from participation in the benefits of the contract. The decree just referred to was followed by a deed, executed in April, 1882, whereby the Elyton Land Company conveyed to the South & North Alabama Railroad Company certain lands, which were accepted by the latter company as the residue of the lands to which it was entitled under the contract of April 21, 1871. It was again recited in this deed that the Elyton Land Company claimed that the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company, and all other railroad companies, except the South & North Alabama Railroad Company, had failed to comply with the terms and conditions of said original contract or agreement, and that said agreement was revoked and annulled as to all other companies or persons, except the South & North Alabama Railroad Company. It was expressly stipulated in that deed that the right of the grantee therein, acquired by said original agreement, to the strip of land 35 feet wide, a portion of which is involved in this suit, should remain in full force and effect, but that the right of way over said strip was abrogated as to all other railroad companies.

It is contended for the appellant that the agreement of April 21, 1871, together with the maps of its property made and published at that time, effected a dedication of the strips of land, a portion of which is involved in this suit, for the purposes stated in the agreement, and that this dedication was irrevocable, and could not be affected by the decree and the deed of 1882, above referred to. It is further contended that the erection of the depot on the strip in controversy is a misuser and a diversion of it from the purposes to which it was devoted by the dedication, which entitle the plaintiff to maintain ejectment for the recovery of the property. The consideration that railroads are devoted to public uses affords the justification for the exercise of the power of eminent domain for the acquisition of private property for railroad purposes. But the land held by a railroad company for the purposes of its enterprise, whether acquired by condemnation proceedings or by purchase from the owners, is, so far as the right of property is concerned, private property. The incidents of private ownership attach to it. The title is in no manner vested in the public or in any part of the public as such. The title of the railroad company is as exclusive as that of any sole grantee in a conveyance of land. It must use the property for the public purposes for which it was acquired under public authority. Though the property must be so used, still the ownership is private, and the public do not share in such ownership. The public are entitled to use the property, but they use it as the property of the company, and the company is entitled to compensation for its use. The law secures to the company the exclusive possession and dominion of the property, and only requires that it be devoted to the purposes of public use and convenience, to subserve which its acquisition was authorized. Land set apart for a railroad right of way, if accepted by the railroad company, is taken as the company's private property, and for its individual profit, though such company, by taking the property, charges itself with a public duty as to the use to which the property is to be devoted. The acceptance by the company is in its own behalf, and cannot properly be said to be in behalf of the public. A dedication is "an appropriation of land to some public use made by the owner of the fee, and accepted for such use by or on behalf of the public." The public is treated as the grantee, and the gift inures immediately to the public. 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 395, 399; Steele v. Sullivan, 70 Ala. 589. Dedication is not a mode of conferring a private property right in land. The only cases, not controlled by special statutory provisions on the subject, in which we have found the donation of land for railroad purposes spoken of as a dedication, involved only the assertion of a claim to the property in question by the railroad company itself; and in such cases the claim was either disallowed or was rested, not upon a common-law dedication, but upon an adverse possession by the railroad company, or upon a state of facts raising an estoppel in pais against the holder of the legal title, which would have precluded him from asserting his title against any one who had occupied and improved the land with his knowledge and consent, under similar circumstances. Morgan v. Railroad Co., 96 U. S. 716; Railway Co. v. Sutor, 56 Tex. 496; Daniels v. Railroad Co., 35 Iowa, 130; Forney v. Calhoun Co., 86 Ala. 463, 5 South. Rep. 750. It seems that when the act to be relied upon as the acceptance of a proposed appropriation of property is to be done, not by the public or in behalf of the public, but by an individual or by a private corporation, intending to take the property in its own behalf for use in a business enterprise to be prosecuted for its own profit, and the property is to be acquired as private property and for private gain, so that the public are not to share in the ownership or in the benefits of ownership, but the new private proprietor, by taking the property for the purposes in view, only charges itself with the duty of using the property for public purposes on receiving compensation for such use, then such appropriation of the property, to be binding upon the holder of the legal title, must be effected by his contract, grant, or conveyance, unless he has precluded himself from asserting his title as the result of a state of facts which would have a like effect against him in favor of a purely private party; and that it does not follow that such an appropriation is effected because the act of the proprietor would have amounted to a common-law dedication if the gift had inured immediately to the public, and a private ownership for private profit had not intervened. It seems that a railroad company cannot hold its road, rights of way, depot grounds, or other property against the former proprietor thereof, unless its alleged interest therein has been secured to it in one of the modes provided by law for the vesting of private property rights in private parties. In the cases found by us in which the claim of a railroad company to such property has been rested solely upon a state of facts which would have amounted to a dedication if the appropriation had been for a public use, such claim has not been allowed; and the rejection thereof has been put upon the ground that such an interest in property could not be conferred upon a private party by what is known to the law as a dedication. Watson v. Railroad Co., 48 N. W. Rep. 1129, a decision by the supreme court of Minnesota; Todd v. Railroad Co., 19 Ohio St. 514.

But, even if it be conceded that the contract of April 21, 1871, if standing alone, should be given effect as an irrevocable dedication of the property in question as a perpetual right of way for all railroad companies doing business in and through the city of Birmingham, and that other railroad companies could claim the benefit of that dedication, and would be entitled to prevent the appellee from appropriating the property to a purpose inconsistent with its use as a common right of way, yet the Elyton Land Company is not now in a position to assert such claim against the South & North Alabama Railroad Company. In the first place, it plainly appears that the appellant obtained the decree on the bill in chancery above referred to by representing that the appropriation of lands, including that involved in this suit, which was provided for by the contract of April 21, 1871, was conditional and revocable, and the adjudication that such was the effect of that contract was necessarily involved in the decree then made. Furthermore, the deed of April 28, 1882, was, in effect, a final settlement and adjustment between the parties to this suit of their respective rights under the contract of April 21, 1871. It plainly appears from the recitals contained in that deed that the appellant thereby formally admitted that the claim of all other railroad companies to participate in the use of the strip of land, a portion of which is involved in this suit, had been duly and rightfully abrogated, and that the appellee's right to the exclusive use of that land for the purpose to which it was devoted by the original contract was fully recognized. The recital in that deed of the reservation of the appellee's right in said strip, and of the forfeiture of the claims of all other railroad companies thereto, was a particular recital of material facts which entered into the consideration moving to the appellee for the covenants and releases then made by it. The appellant, having obtained the decree above referred to by representing the instrument upon which it now relies as having an operation wholly different from that now sought to be imputed to it, and having, in its subsequent deed, solemnly admitted as a material fact that the appellee alone is entitled to use the land in dispute as a right of way, is now estopped from setting up a claim inconsistent with such representation and admission. The proceedings in the chancery cause, and the recitals in the deed referred to, show solemn admissions by the appellant that the land in dispute was not irrevocably dedicated, as is now claimed, and the appellant is bound by those admissions, certainly so far as concerns its present claim against the appellee. Pratt v. Nixon, 9 Ala. 192, 8 South. Rep. 751; Jones v. Morris, 61 Ala. 518; Tait v. Frow, 8 Ala. 543; Brown v. Hamil, 76 Ala. 506; Caldwell v. Smith, 77 Ala. 157; Hill v. Huckabee, 76 Ala. 183; Bigelow, Estop. (5th Ed.) 366 et seq.; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 7.

The extent of the interest acquired by the appellee in the land in dispute is to use it as a right of way. The appellant has not deprived itself of the right to confine the appellee to this particular use of the property, though it cannot longer claim that other railroad companies are entitled to share in such use. The claim now made is that the erection of a freight depot and other structures on the strip is a diversion of the property from the purpose to which it was appropriated. In the interpretation of an agreement, regard is to be had to the situation of the contracting parties at the time it was made, the occasion which gave rise to it, and the obvious design intended to be accomplished. Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. East Alabama Ry. Co., 73 Ala. 444. For reasons already stated, the appellant cannot now deny that the appropriation of the property for the particular use mentioned was conditional, and that the right to participate in the use was forfeitable by any railroad company which should fail within a reasonable time to comply with the conditions imposed. According this meaning to the contract, and it is plain that the contingency of only one railroad company becoming entitled to the benefits offered by the contract was within the purview of its terms. The appellant has admitted by its deed that such contingency has happened; that all railroad companies other than the appellee have forfeited all claims under the contract to the use of the strip in dispute; and that the right to use it for the stipulated purpose is vested in the appellee alone. The parties are to be treated as having contemplated the possibility of the appellee acquiring the exclusive use of the strip as a right of way for its railroad alone.

It is to be observed that another provision of the same contract secured to the appellee the perpetual and free use of the right of way, 100 feet wide, of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company, (Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. South & N. A. R. Co., 84 Ala. 570, 3 South. Rep. 286;) so that the result of the appellee's compliance with the terms of the contract was to secure to it one right of way to be enjoyed by it in common with one or more other railroad companies, and also an exclusive right of way in another strip. In view of the fact that the use of the right of way of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad Company was secured to the appellee, the question to be determined is, did the appellant, in stipulating for an additional right of way, which might become vested in the appellee exclusively, intend, in the event of such right so becoming exclusive, that the strip so appropriated should not be occupied by depots or other buildings adapted to railroad purposes, but should remain open so that tracks could be run over it? Such a meaning cannot be imputed to the contract, unless a railroad right of way is an interest of such limited scope that the land included therein must be devoted by the railroad company exclusively to a track or tracks over which trains may pass. It is a matter of common knowledge that the railroad business involves the use, not only of cars and tracks, but of buildings and structures of various kinds. It was contemplated that the strip of land in dispute in this case should be used as a right of way in a city. The place was expected to be the scene for the transaction of many phases of the business different from, but incident to, the mere act of carrying persons or things. It was to be the place for receiving, delivering, storing, and transshipping freight. In such places it is frequently necessary for the convenient transaction of a railroad business to have platforms, warehouses, lumber-yards, elevators, cattle-pens, engine-houses, car-sheds, depots, repair-shops, and other like facilities contiguous to the tracks. The space which is commonly called the railroad right of way is, in populous localities, generally found dotted with structures, other than the tracks, which are necessary or convenient for the transaction of the business of a common carrier; and we think that the erection of such structures is to be regarded as within the contemplation of the parties to a contract which stipulates for the use of land in such a locality as a railroad right of way, unless the contrary appears from the terms of the contract. Ordinarily, the right of way of a railroad company is its exclusive property, and the company is entitled to its free and unobstructed use. Railroad Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149, 4 South. Rep. 618. The company is entitled to an absolute and exclusive possession, so far as to secure fully every purpose for which the railroad is made and used. Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. East Alabama Ry. Co., 75 Ala. 524. The question is, what are the uses to which the right of way may be devoted? The Western Railroad Corporation was authorized by its charter to lay out its road, not exceeding five rods wide, through the whole length, and to acquire such strip by condemnation proceedings. In reference to the rights of the company within this area, SHAW, C. J., delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Massachusetts, said: "To the extent of five rods, it appears to us, the legislature intended that the franchise of this corporation should extend, for any and all purposes incident to the object of its creation. It was contended in argument that their franchise for public purposes extended only to the use of this strip of land as a way, and that if they had occasion for buildings and store-houses, as incident to their operations as carriers of persons and merchandise, they were to be regarded, in their latter capacity, as carrying on a distinct business, for their own profit, and therefore that such buildings were not to come under the same franchise. But no such limitation is contained in the act of incorporation, and none such results from the nature of its provisions. The establishment of the rail track, and the maintenance of engines and cars, for the transportation of persons and goods, are all combined together, as one public object to be attained, and the privileges incident to the other. No doubt, in practice, the main use of the strip of land of five rods in width, in the greater part of its extent, will be for sustaining the track for the trains to pass over. But such restriction of its use is not found in the act, and therefore, when the corporation have occasion to use any part of such strip of five rods for any of the purposes incident to their creation, it is within their franchise." And, under the law of that state exempting public works from taxation, it was decided in that case "that this railroad corporation is not liable to taxation for the land, of the width of five rods, located for the road, nor for any buildings or structures erected thereon, so that they be reasonably incident to the support of the railroad, or to its proper or convenient use for the carriage of passengers and the transportation of commodities; and that this includes engine and car houses, depots for the accommodation of passengers, and warehouses for the convenient reception, preservation, and delivery of merchandise, and all goods and articles carried on the road." Inhabitants of Worcester v. Western R. Corp., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 564. That court has, in later cases, continued to recognize the right of a railroad company to occupy, with buildings or other structures, the land acquired for its railroad, so long as the mode of occupation is necessary or proper for the convenient exercise of the privileges and the performance of the functions defined by its charter. Proprietors v. Railroad Co., 104 Mass. 1; Boston Gas-Light Co. v. Old Colony & N. Ry. Co., 14 Allen, 444; Brainard v. Clapp, 10 Cush. 6; Peirce v. Railroad Co., 141 Mass. 481, 6 N. E. Rep. 96.

In Railroad Co. v. Wathen, 17 Ill. App. 582, it was held that on land granted for "railroad and depot purposes," the company could permit the erection and use by private parties, without the payment of rent, of elevators, corn-cribs, lumber-yards, and lime-houses which facilitated the business of the company in the receipt, transportation, and discharge of freight. In Telegraph Co. v. Rich, 19 Kan. 517, it was held that a railroad company may, for its own use in operating its road, construct a telegraph line over and along its right of way, and that by such use of the property it did not subject itself to an additional claim of the original land-owner for compensation. The opinion of the court was delivered by Judge BREWER, now an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. In the course of the opinion it was said: "In short, the railroad company may use its right of way, not merely for its track, but for any other building or erection which reasonably tends to facilitate its business of transporting freight and passengers, and by such use in no manner transcends the purposes and extent of the easement, or exposes itself to any claim for additional damages to the original land-owner." The authorities support the conclusion that a railroad company may make any use of the land acquired by it for use as the right of way for its railroad, which, directly or indirectly, contributes to the safe, economical, and efficient operation of the road, and which does not interfere with the rights of property pertaining to the adjacent lands. Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 584, 588, and cases there cited; Gudger v. Railroad Co., (N. C.) 11 S. E. Rep. 515; Railroad v. Deal, 90 N. C. 110. The land here in dispute must be treated for the purposes of this case as secured to the appellee alone as an additional right of way in the heart of a city. The depot and other structures erected thereon afford such conveniences and facilities as a railroad company may be expected to provide for the transaction of its business in such locality. The land is used for purposes incidental and auxiliary to the transportation business authorized to be conducted on and over it; and, as the appellant cannot complain of the exclusive character of the occupancy, the uses shown do not, in our opinion, constitute a diversion of the property from the purposes to which it has been devoted. The conclusion is that the evidence does not support the claim that there has been a misuser by the appellee of the right of way in question. The right to maintain the action is based upon the alleged misuser. It is not intended to be admitted that, if such misuser had been shown, the appellant would be entitled to a judgment in the statutory action in the nature of ejectment for land of which it could not hold possession, because, according to is own claim, the appellee and other railroad companies were entitled to possess it and use it as a right of way. Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 324, § 27.

HIGHLAND-AVE. & B. R. CO. v. DUSENBERRY.

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—PLEADING.

Plaintiff's intestate, while in defendant's employ, received injuries in a collision of two hand-cars, from which he died. The complaint in one count successively attributed his death (1) to the negligence of the foreman in charge of both hand-cars; (2) to the negligence of some person or persons in charge of the rear hand-car; (3) to the defective and worn condition of one or both hand-cars, arising from, or not having been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of defendant, or of some person in its service who was intrusted by it with seeing that the ways, works, and machinery or plant were in proper condition; and (4) to the negligence of some person or persons in the employ of defendant, who had the superintendence of the moving of the rear car, while in the exercise of such superintendence. Held, that such count was demurrable, on the ground that it was uncertain and ambiguous in stating several independent causes of action, without disclosing which one was relied on to support plaintiff's claim.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHAUPE, Judge.

Action by H. F. Dusenberry against the Highland-Avenue & Belt Railroad Company for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Alex. T. London, for appellant. Whittaker & Whittaker, for appellee.

WALKER, J. Demurrers to the three counts contained in the original complaint having been sustained, a fourth court was added by amendment. This count avers, in substance, that on the 16th day of November, 1889, the plaintiff's intestate was an employe of the defendant as a section hand on its railroad, and as such employe was rightfully on one of the defendant's hand-cars; and, while he was riding on the same, and engaged in the line of his employment, another hand-car was being run and moved over and along said line of road, each of said cars being under the superintendence and control of the foreman in charge, and running at a high and reckless rate of speed, and in close and reckless proximity to each other, so that by the carelessness and gross negligence of the foreman in charge in directing or allowing said cars to run at such a high rate of speed, and in such close proximity the one to the other, the same collided, or the rear car ran into the front car, throwing or knocking plaintiff's intestate between said cars, and thereby inflicting injuries from which he died. The portion of the complaint just summarized states a cause of action based upon the carelessness and gross negligence of the foreman as the person having the superintendence and control of both hand-cars. But the complaint does not stop here. Immediately following the averments already mentioned there are additional allegations to the effect that said injuries were caused by reason of the negligence of some person or persons in the service or employment of the defendant, who, at the time of said injuries, had the charge or control of the running, moving, or operating of the rear hand-car, and that one or both of said hand-cars were in a defective and worn condition; that the brakes or cog-wheels to one or both of said cars were in a bad and defective condition, and that said injuries were caused by reason of the defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer, and said defect arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition; that the defects aforesaid were known to, or could have been known to, the defendant by the exercise of reasonable diligence; and that said injuries were caused by reason of the negligence of some person or persons in the service or employment of the defendant who had the superintendence of the moving of said rear hand-car intrusted to them at the time of said injuries, and while in the exercise of such superintendence. The result of the allegations is that the death of the plaintiff's intestate is in one count successively attributed (1) to the gross negligence of the foreman in charge or control of both hand-cars; (2) to the negligence of some person or persons in charge or control of the running, moving, or operating of the rear hand-car; (3) to the defective and worn condition of one or both of the hand-cars, which defect had arisen from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in its service, who was intrusted by it with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition; and (4) to the negligence of some person or persons in the service or employment of the defendant who had the superintendence of the moving of the rear car, while in the exercise of such superintendence. We do not construe the complaint to charge that the several acts of negligence were concurrent, co-operating causes, and that all of them together contributed to the alleged injury, so that each specification is to be regarded as an integral feature in the description of the mode in which the injury was inflicted. If that construction could be put upon the complaint, the plaintiff would be in the position of having stated his case with unnecessary particularity, and he would not be entitled to recover unless his proof made out the case with equal particularity of description. Smith v. Causey, 28 Ala. 655; Railroad Co. v. Johnston, 79 Ala. 436; Railroad Co. v. Dickson, 88 Ill. 431; Railroad Co. v. Coulton, 86 Ala. 129, 5 South. Rep. 458; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 57 et seq. Here the several specifications of negligence are stated as disconnected defaults, and each one of them seems to be put forward as a separate ground of liability, independent of the others.

In Railroad Co. v. Coulton, supra, the injury complained of was attributed solely to the defective condition of the brakes on a train, but it was charged that the defendant was negligent in several ways in reference to the condition of said brakes. The averments in this regard were construed to be cumulative charges of several independent acts of negligence; and, no demurrer to the complaint having been interposed, it was held that a judgment on the complaint should be affirmed, though there was an absence of proof to sustain one of the cumulative charges or averments. In that case the court was careful to call attention to the fact that no demurrer to the complaint had been interposed. No judgment can be arrested, annulled, or set aside for any matter not previously objected to, if the complaint contain a substantial cause of action. Code, § 2835. It was plain in that case that a good cause of action was stated, and the cumulative charges of negligence could have been stricken out, and the complaint would have remained amply good. The averment which was not proved was not incorporated as part of the description of the cause of action which was sustained by the evidence. In the present case several distinct breaches of duty, each constituting an independent cause of action, are alleged in one count. Neither of the specifications of negligence could be stricken out or disregarded as surplusage, or as immaterial or impertinent matter, for each of them is an essential part of one of several causes of action, upon either of which, as well as upon another, the plaintiff may rely. Nor can that which is one count in form be treated as several independent counts which could be pleaded to separately, for the averments are linked together in one continuous narrative, the several allegations of negligence are all made in connection with and in reference to a single statement of the fact of injury, the circumstance of the death of the plaintiff's intestate is averred only once, but the defendant's liability therefor is rested upon several independent grounds, stated distributively. A cause of action is shown by coupling the averment of injury with either of the specifications of negligence, yet the allegations as to the several independent breaches of duty are so mingled together that they cannot be singled out and met separately, but issues must be made upon all of them at once by any single plea which would answer the whole of the one count of the complaint. If the plaintiff is entitled to a recovery upon proof of only one of the causes of action, then equally substantive averments in the same count are ignored, and the practical effect is to treat the several averments of breaches of duty as if they were made in the alternative, so that the plaintiff may select any one of them and abandon the rest, though, as they are all in one count, they must all be met by the same plea or pleas. Alternative averments of matters of substance are destructive of all certainty in the formation of definite issues for trial. The prime object of the successive steps in pleading under our system is to evolve such issues so that they may be presented pointedly and distinctly. If, on the other hand, the proof must sustain all the specifications of negligence, the result is to require proof of several independent causes of action to sustain one recovery. It is quite usual in actions for torts, where a single act or transaction is complained of as the cause of the alleged injury, to insert several counts, stating that act in varying shapes to meet different phases of the proof as it may be developed, and to charge in the successive counts different breaches of duty as separate grounds of recovery. Each count is treated as the statement of a distinct cause of action, and appropriate issues may be pleaded to them severally. Maupay v. Holley, 8 Ala. 103. The separation into counts serves the double purpose of supplying apt averments to meet varying phases of proof, and at the same time presenting material issues singly, and not jumbled together. Under our system, "all pleadings must be as brief as is consistent with perspicuity, and the presentation of the facts or matter to be put in issue in an intelligible form. No objection can be allowed for defect of form, if facts are so presented that a material issue in law or fact can be taken by the adverse party thereon." Code, § 2664. It cannot be said of a complaint that it is perspicuous, or that it presents the facts in an intelligible form, so that a material issue can be taken thereon by the defendant, unless it contains a clear and distinct statement of the facts which constitute the cause of action, so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and by the court who are to give judgment. 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Amer. Ed.) 256. When the complaint states a good cause of action it is not subject to demurrer because of redundant allegations which could be stricken out as surplusage, or because part of the damages claimed are not recoverable. The pleading is not vitiated by the insertion of merely irrelevant or impertinent matter. Kennon v. Telegraph Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 201; Railroad Co. v. Hall, 91 Ala. 112, 8 South. Rep. 371; Railroad Co. v. Hanlon, 53 Ala. 70; Manufacturing Co. v. Thomas, 20 Ala. 473; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659. But when the plaintiff, in a single count, shifts his right of action from one ground to another, and states several breaches of duty in the alternative or disjunctively, so that it is impossible to say upon which of several equally substantive averments he relies for the maintenance of his action, then there is such confusion and obscurity as to the ground upon which a recovery is claimed that the defendant is not clearly informed of the matter to be put in issue; and a count so substantially variant and contradictory in its allegations is demurrable. Andrews v. Flack, 88 Ala. 294, 6 South. Rep. 907; Munter v. Rogers, 50 Ala. 283. In the present case, a plea of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff's intestate, though it would present a good defense to several of the causes of action stated, yet would perhaps be insufficient as an answer to the whole count because one of the separable grounds of recovery is the alleged gross negligence and recklessness of the foreman in charge of the two hand-cars. Likewise, a plea setting up a state of facts which would relieve the defendant of liability for the alleged injury if it was caused by reason of a defect in machinery would not be a good answer to the count because it would not meet other issues wholly foreign to this one. In short, if several independent causes of action may be so joined in one count that they may be regarded either as stated in the alternative, or as putting upon the plaintiff the burden of proving averments which are not joined together as parts of the description of a single transaction, then the defendant is put to the answer of a multiplicity of equally material issues at once, and no steps in pleading can reduce the contention of the parties to a single material issue. Inextricable confusion of issues would result from the blending in one count of a number of distinct breaches of duty as independent grounds of recovery, to be chosen from and relied on at the election of the plaintiff. Perspicuity and certainty in his pleading are not exacted of the plaintiff if he is permitted to put forward in one count several independent causes of action, stated in such ambiguous terms as to leave the defendant wholly in doubt as to what alleged breach of duty is really made the ground of the charge of liability. The defendant is entitled to be clearly and distinctly informed of the facts relied upon as the basis of recovery against him. The count which was added by amendment in this case is uncertain and ambiguous in stating several independent causes of action without disclosing which one was relied upon to support the plaintiff's claim, and the demurrer pointing out the defects in the complaint should have been sustained. Reversed and remanded.

WARDEN v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — RIDING ON COW-CATCHER—CUSTOM—OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiff was the head brakeman on a freight train running between two stations 17 miles apart, between which were four other stations from one to seven miles apart. His duty, when the train was proceeding along the line, was to attend to the brakes on the front cars, which could be performed only on the tops of the cars. When the train approached a station at which cars were to be left or taken on, it was his duty to open switches, which could only be done on the ground, in front of the engine. While the train was proceeding from one station to another, plaintiff, who was at the time sitting on the cross-beam in front of the engine, with his legs hanging over the cow-catcher, was injured by the collision of the pilot with a rail of a bisecting road. But for his position on the pilot he would not have been injured. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. There was no error in rejecting evidence that it was the custom of plaintiff and other head brakemen on that train to ride between stations on the pilot.

3. In such case, opinion evidence that it is not more dangerous to ride on the front of the engine than on top of the cars is not admissible.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Taliaferro & Houghton, for appellant. Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. Appellant was plaintiff below. He received personal injuries while in the service of the appellee as head or front brakeman on a freight train, and brought this action to recover damages therefor. The trial was had upon the general issue, and several special pleas, each averring plaintiff's contributory negligence. No evidence was adduced except on the part of the plaintiff, and upon this the court gave the general affirmative charge in favor of the defendant on the theory that his own evidence was free from conflict and all contrary inferences to the proof of negligence on plaintiff's part which proximately contributed to the injury sustained by him. This evidence showed that the train on which plaintiff was employed was a regular cross-country freight train of the defendant company. Its run was over the line between Bessemer and Boyles station, a distance of 17 miles, between which points were four other stations from one to seven miles apart. The business of this train was to receive and deliver at these intermediate and terminal stations cars laden with ore, pig-iron, and the like, and also general freight; and in doing the work assigned to it, it was necessary to do more or less switching, and setting in upon and taking out from side tracks loaded cars, at each one of these stations. It was plaintiff's duty, when the train was proceeding along the line, to attend to the brakes on the two or three cars next to the engine,—a duty which could be performed only on the tops of the cars; and, on approaching a station at which cars were to be left or taken on, his duty was to open switches leading into and out of sidings,—a duty which could only be performed on the ground, in front of the engine. It does not appear that he had any duties to perform, or that any of his duties could be performed, on the pilot, cross-beam, or cow-catcher of the engine, or that it was in any sense necessary for him to be on the cross-beam in front of the engine at any time, and certainly at no time while the train was passing from one to another of the stations served by it. Yet it is uncontroverted in this case that he received the injuries of which he now complains while sitting on this cross-beam in front of the engine,—the beam to which the pilot or cow-catcher is attached,—with his legs hanging over in front of the pilot, and this while the train was out on the main line, proceeding from one station to another, and when the only duty he could possibly have had to perform was upon the top of the train. Not only so, but it is equally clear from the testimony that the casualty was directly the result of the pilot's colliding with a rail of a bisecting road; that no other part of the train or engine was injured; that no other of the several persons on the train was hurt; and that he would not have been hurt but for his having taken this position on the pilot. There being thus no doubt that plaintiff's presence on the pilot contributed proximately to the injuries he sustained, the main question in the case is whether his being there at the time of the accident was negligence in se on his part, and to be so declared by the court as a matter of law. The authorities are believed to be uniform to the support of the affirmative of this inquiry. The investigations of the court and counsel have failed to disclose a single adjudged case to the contrary, while many courts are upon the record as holding, either by analogy or directly, that to ride upon the pilot or cross-beam in front of an engine while proceeding on its way along the line of its track, without justifying necessity therefor, involves per se such negligence as will defeat an action counting upon injuries received while so riding, and which would not have been received but for the plaintiff's being there. Even the assumption of less dangerous, but, at the same time, improper, positions on moving trains, voluntarily and unnecessarily, has been many times held to be contributory negligence as a matter of law, neutralizing the negligence of the defendant, and destroying an otherwise good cause of action, as is illustrated in the following cases: Martin v. Railroad Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 125; Judkins v. Railroad Co., (Me.) 14 Atl. Rep. 735; Hickey v. Railroad Co., 14 Allen, 429; Railroad Co. v. Langdon, 1 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 87; Railroad Co. v. Thomas, Id. 79; Railroad Co. v. Greiner, (Pa. Sup.) 6 Atl. Rep. 246; Railroad Co. v. Ray, 70 Ga. 674; Martensen v. Railroad Co., (Iowa,) 15 N. W. Rep. 569. And it is laid down as a general proposition that the act of riding, without a necessity so to do, on an engine is contributory negligence per se, which will defeat recovery for injuries resulting in consequence from collisions, and the like. Abend v. Railway Co., 17 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 614; Doggett v. Railroad Co., 34 Iowa, 284; Robertson v. Railroad Co., 22 Barb. 91. As an engine is justly considered the most dangerous place to be on a train moving forward, so, for the same reasons, the pilot is manifestly and obviously the most perilous place on a forward moving engine. Its very name is a proclamation of danger. The sole end it is intended to conserve—the removal of obstructions from the track—is alone sufficient to impress upon it, to the apprehension of every man in his right mind, the character of being the most perilous place capable of occupation on a train while proceeding from station to station on its way. And so, we repeat, the authorities present unanimity to the proposition that to take position there under such circumstances is a fact not only authorizing the inference of negligence to be drawn by the jury, but to which the law itself imputes negligence.

A leading case on the point is that of Railroad Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439. There the plaintiff was one of a party of men employed by a railroad company in constructing and repairing its road-way. They were usually conveyed to and from their place of labor by the company, and a box-car drawn by an engine was used for this purpose. The plaintiff, although forbidden on several occasions to do so, and warned of the danger, on returning from work one evening rode on the pilot or bumper of the locomotive, and was injured from a collision with some cars standing on the track in a tunnel. There was room for him in the box-car, as there was room for the plaintiff here on the train; and none of those in the box-car were hurt, as here all who remained on the cars escaped injury. It was held that, as the plaintiff would not have been injured had he used ordinary care, he was not entitled to recover, Mr. Justice SWAYNE observing: "His injury was due to his own recklessness and folly. He was himself the author of his misfortune. This is shown with as near an approach to a demonstration as anything short of mathematics will permit." In the case of Kresanowski v. Railroad Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 229, the facts were that the plaintiff, an employe of the defendant railroad company, while being transported to the place where his services were required, along with other employes, on an engine provided by the company, sat, with one or two others, on the front of the engine, with his feet hanging over the pilot, and was injured by a collision with another engine. It was held, on a motion to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, (1) that the plaintiff himself so far contributed to his injury by his own negligence in placing himself in such a dangerous position that he could not recover; and (2) there being evidence that there was no room for the plaintiff on the tender, and that he had in effect been authorized or invited by the company to ride over the pilot, that, the plaintiff being of age, and able to see and know the risks of the position, even the fact of such invitation and authorization would not justify him in placing himself in a position of obviously great risk and danger. But the strongest support of this doctrine is found in the circumstances of a Michigan case, and the several decisions which were made in different actions which grew out of it. The facts were that a switchman in the employ of a railway company was killed. The engine upon which he was employed, and which was at the time engaged in switching cars about the yard of the company, ran into a truck owned by the defendant, an individual having no connection with the railway company, and driven by his teamster. The result of the collision was the death of the switchman, injury to defendant's teamster, and destruction of the truck and team. The switchman, at the time of the collision, was sitting on the cross-beam of the pilot, with his feet hanging down over the "cow-catcher." He had no duties to perform while on the engine. His duty was to attend to the switching of tracks in front of the engine, getting off and on the cars for that purpose. It is to be noted that, while this case is strikingly like the one at bar in most of its features, it is yet different from it in that the party injured there was a switchman having no duties to perform on the cars, and the engine was being run in the railroad yard, and only for the purposes of switching, while here plaintiff's duties while the train was in motion were all on top of the cars, and at the time of the accident the train was running across country, and not engaged in switching at all, and was in fact engaged in switching at no time except as an incident of its carrying business from station to station; so that in every particular in which there is a difference between the two cases the Michigan case is a much stronger one in favor of the injured party than the present one. Several actions grew out of the transaction. The teamster sued the railroad company, counting on the personal injuries he sustained. The company was found negligent, and judgment went against it, which was paid. The railroad company also paid the owner for the loss of his truck and team. The personal representative of the dead switchman sued the railroad company in the circuit court of the United States, claiming that the death of his intestate resulted from the negligence of the railroad company in not ringing the bell or blowing the whistle for the crossing, over which the truck was passing when the collision occurred, in not having a flagman there to keep the way clear, in obstructing the switchman's view of the crossing, etc. Judge BROWN, now of the supreme court of the United States, before whom that case was tried, directed a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that the switchman was guilty of contributory negligence in being at the time on the cross-beam of the pilot. The administrator of the switchman then sued the owner of the team and truck, and this last case went to the supreme court of Michigan, and was there determined against the plaintiff, who had recovered in the nisi prius court, on the ground that the trial judge had left it to the jury to say whether the switchman was guilty of contributory negligence, when the court itself should have determined that he was guilty of negligence which contributed to his death as a matter of law, and thus withdrawn that issue from the jury altogether. GRANT, J., rendering the opinion of the court, said: "Several questions are raised by the record, but the plaintiff's right to recover is barred by his decedent's contributory negligence, rendering a determination of the other questions unnecessary. There is no dispute about the facts. The judge found as a fact, and so charged the jury, that there was no testimony in the case that the deceased was obliged to ride upon the cow-catcher, and left it to the jury to determine whether or not this constituted negligence on his part. In the absence of proof, we cannot believe that any railroad company requires its switchmen, or any of its employes, to ride in so dangerous a place. There was a safer place for him to ride. He was neither required nor directed to ride in a position which every person of ordinary intelligence and observation knows was the most dangerous he could have chosen. The fact that upon switch-engines switchmen rode standing upon the platform provided for them in front of the engine had no tendency to prove that the deceased was justified in riding in a sitting posture upon the cow-catcher of a road-engine; nor would the fact that switchmen were in the habit of riding upon the cow-catcher excuse the deceased, as between him and defendant. Yet the judge substantially left the jury to determine the question of contributory negligence by the determination of the question as to whether the deceased was riding in the usual and ordinary place upon the engine. If switchmen always rode there, still that fact would not take them without the rule of contributory negligence. When a safer place is provided, and employes choose a more dangerous one, they do it at their own risk. The difference in danger between standing on a platform of a regular switch-engine and sitting on a cow-catcher, with one's legs hanging over it, is apparent. In the one case the switchman is ready to jump upon the approach of danger; in the other, considerable time must elapse before he could recover his standing position upon the pilot-beam, and put himself in readiness to avoid danger. In the present case deceased was the only one upon the engine who was injured. He chose the only place in which he could have been injured, and chose a sitting posture, instead of a standing posture. Railroad Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439; Doggett v. Railroad Co., 34 Iowa, 284; Kresanowski v. Railroad Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 229. We quote with approval from the language of the court in Railroad Co. v. Jones, as applicable in this case: 'This [contributory negligence] is shown with as near approach to demonstration as anything short of mathematics will permit.' There was no fact in this case for the determination of the jury. The question was therefore one purely of law. It was therefore the clear duty of the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant. It was as clearly its duty as it would be to determine the legal effect of a contract the terms of which are undisputed." Glover v. Scotten, (Mich.) 46 N. W. Rep. 936. The exigencies of the case at bar do not require that we should go to the full length of the opinion in Glover v. Scotten, and hold that for a switchman to sit upon the pilot or cross-beam of a road-engine being moved about in the yards of a railroad while performing the functions of a regular switch-engine would be negligence per se. It may be that the true doctrine in such case is that declared by the supreme court of Kansas in Railway Co. v. McCally, 21 Pac. Rep. 574, where it is held, the company having failed to provide a switch-engine, and having always required switching to be done with an ordinary freight-engine, there being some evidence of a necessity for switchmen to stand on the cross-beam while the engine was being moved about the yard, and to the effect that it was the usual custom of all brakemen in that yard to so ride, that the question as to whether that position was one of danger and voluntarily chosen by the deceased was a question of fact to be determined by the jury under all the circumstances. The position of the Kansas court may be conceded for all the purposes of the case we are considering without affecting the result we have foreshadowed. Here the engine was not a switch-engine, nor being used at the time of the accident as a switch-engine. It was an ordinary road-engine, proceeding on its way along the line of the road between two stations, engaged in its regular business of drawing a freight train. The case is thus wholly unlike McCally's Case, and upon all-fours with Jones' and Kresanowski's Cases. The person injured was not standing on the steps of the pilot, and thus in a position to escape a collision with facility by jumping, as in the Kansas case, but sitting down on the beam, with his legs hanging over the cow-catcher, as in the Cases of Jones, Kresanowski, and Glover, though we are not prepared to say that the particular attitude assumed on the pilot by the person injured could ordinarily be a material consideration. McCally's Case is strenuously pressed upon our attention in connection with the facts that the line over which the train on which plaintiff was injured was running was a short one; that the stations on it were not far apart; that this train had to stop at each one of them, and at each do more or less switching. We do not conceive that these facts can exert any influence on the question. Certain trains on all roads stop at all stations. Usually such trains have switching to do at all stations. The right of the front brakeman on such trains to leave his post of duty—which is on the top of the cars—and take a position of obvious danger on the pilot cannot be made to depend upon the frequent recurrence of stations and a consequent necessity for him to open switches in front of the engine. However frequent the stations are, and whatever the duties of the head brakeman may be at the stations, it is certain that, while the train is passing from one station to another, there are no duties for him to perform on, or even near, the pilot, and no possible necessity for his presence there. We feel entirely safe in the conclusion that plaintiff's conduct in unnecessarily and voluntarily leaving his post of duty, and assuming a position of obviously greater danger, but for which he would not have been injured, involved such negligence on his part as justified the trial court in giving the general affirmative charge against his right to recover.

It is insisted, however, that the case should be reversed because of the exclusion of certain testimony offered by the plaintiff, going to show a custom on the part of himself and other head brakemen on that train to ride between stations on the pilot. The city court did not, in our opinion, err in the exclusion of this testimony. The fact that one is in the habit of doing an obviously dangerous thing does not make his act any the less a dangerous one. The fact that many or all of a limited class of persons customarily ride upon the pilot of an engine does not alter the characteristic of obvious peril which the law imputes to that position. It is negligence per se for persons to walk upon the track of railroads. Doubtless many persons are in the habit of using the track in this way. Yet it has never been supposed, and it cannot be the law, that such custom would convert the track, which the law declares to be per se a dangerous place, into a safe place. So a person may be in the habit of crossing railway tracks without stopping and looking and listening for approaching trains; yet we have never heard it suggested such person, when he finally reaps the penalty of his lack of care, is, because of such habit, not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Custom and usage may be relied upon to excuse the violation of a rule when the act involved is not negligent in itself, but only by relation to the rule violated; and so, when an act may be done in two or more ways, a resort to neither of which involves such obvious peril as raises the legal presumption or conclusion of negligence in the doing of it, a custom or usage to do it in a particular way may be looked to as tending to show that it was not negligence to resort to that method in the instance under consideration. But custom can in no case impart the qualities of due care and prudence to an act which involves obvious peril, which is voluntarily and unnecessarily done, and which the law itself declares to be negligent. Glover v. Scotten, (Mich.) 46 N. W. Rep. 936; Hickey v. Railroad Co., 14 Allen, 429; Judkins v. Railroad Co., (Me.) 14 Atl. Rep. 735; Railroad Co. v. Clark, 15 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 261; Railway Co. v. Robbins, (Kan.) 23 Pac. Rep. 113; Humphreys v. News, etc., Co., (W. Va.) 10 S. E. Rep. 39; Hibler v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501; Bryant v. Railroad Co., 56 Vt. 710.

Nor do we conceive that the court committed error in refusing to receive opinion evidence to the effect that it was not more dangerous to ride on the front of the engine than on the top of the cars. The general rule is well established that such evidence is not competent where all the facts upon which the opinion is founded can be ascertained and made intelligible to the court or jury. All the facts upon which the opinion which was offered here proceeded were before the court, either through the ordinary vehicles of evidence or as matter of judicial knowledge; and they presented such a state of case as that it became the court's right and duty to declare, in effect, as a matter of law, that the cross-beam in front of the engine was an obviously more dangerous position on a moving train than the top of the train; and the authorities are uniform in support of the proposition that the mere opinions of witnesses to the contrary can exert no influence upon the conclusion which the court itself is esteemed more competent to reach and declare. Chicago v. McGiven, 78 Ill. 347; Bridge Co. v. Pearl, 80 Ill. 251; People v. Morrigan, 29 Mich. 5; Muldowney v. Railway Co., 36 Iowa, 462; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., Id. 31; Railway Co. v. Peavy, 11 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 260. We discover no error in the record, and the judgment of the city court is affirmed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO. v. THOMPSON.

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—RESIDENCE—EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY—HEARSAY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A pipe projecting from a water-tank, whereby a brakeman is knocked off a railroad train and killed, is a part of the "ways, works, machinery, or plant" of a railroad company, within the meaning of Code, § 2590, which renders a master liable to a servant for injuries caused by any defect of the "ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master."

2. Where, in an action against the railroad company by the personal representative of such servant, one of the issues was whether the pipe hung so low that a brakeman on top of a car could not safely pass under it, evidence of the height of ordinary freight-cars on the road was relevant, especially in connection with testimony as to the distance of the pipe from the level of the track.

3. In determining the residence of a decedent, and the consequent jurisdiction of the probate court to grant letters of administration, evidence of general reputation and of statements of various persons is hearsay.

4. A question put to the conductor whether he did not, on the night of the accident, or the next day, telegraph the superintendent that deceased lived in another state, and to send his body there, was properly excluded, since, if the purpose was to prove the residence of deceased, it was hearsay, and, if the purpose was impeachment, the telegram, being in writing, should have been produced or accounted for.

5. Although the fact that the pipe, without injury to any one, had been for several years in the same relative position in which it was at the time of the death of deceased is properly considered by the jury in determining the negligence of defendant and the contributory negligence of deceased, yet charges that the jury may infer certain conclusions from such fact are properly refused, as being arguments, and as giving undue prominence to certain phases of the evidence.

Appeal from circuit court, Shelby county; LE ROY F. BOX, Judge.

Action by Mary Thompson, administratrix, against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. The witness Robinson, mentioned in the opinion, was the conductor of the train on which deceased was at work when the accident occurred. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The court, at plaintiff's request, gave the following charge: "If a person standing on a moving freight-car should be struck by a supply-pipe and knocked from the car, while the tendency would be for the man to fall near the pipe, yet you are to consider other natural laws, such as the forward motion of the body of the man on the train if the train was in motion, and all other natural laws that may enter in and control the motion of the man's body after he was so struck." The following written charges, requested by defendant, were refused: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the pipe to the tank had stood as it was for a number of years, this is a circumstance at which the jury may look in determining whether or not that pipe was safe, if they believe, further, that trains had passed by each day, and no one had been theretofore injured by said pipe." "(9) If the jury believe the evidence, they ought not to find a verdict for the plaintiff." "(13) If the jury believe the evidence, they must find for the defendant. (14) The supply-pipe of a water-tank is not a part of the ways, works, machinery, or plant of a railroad company." "(k) If the jury believe from the evidence that the supply-pipe to the water-tank had been in the same position for a number of years, and trains had passed there each day during all the time, and no one had been injured at that point, this is a circumstance tending to show that the construction of said pipe was not dangerous." "(z) The fact, if it be a fact, that the supply-pipe to the water-tank at Montevallo, in the same relative position to the defendant's railroad track in which it was at the time said Anderson Thompson was killed, has been safely used for a number of years, is a circumstance at which the jury may look in determining whether or not the negligence of Anderson Thompson contributed proximately to the death of the said Anderson Thompson." "(p) If the jury believe from the evidence that the supply-pipe to the tank had been in the same relative position as it was at the time Anderson Thompson was killed for a number of years, and freight trains had passed said pipe each day and night during all the said time, and no brakeman or other person had been injured before said time by said pipe, this is a circumstance at which the jury may look in determining whether or not the leaving of said pipe in said condition was negligence on the part of the defendant."

Pettus & Pettus, for appellant. Linton A. Dean, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. This action is brought by appellee, as administratrix of Anderson Thompson, under section 2591[1] of the Code. The complaint, which is framed under the first subdivision of section 2590,[2] avers that plaintiff's intestate was, at the time he was killed, in the employment of defendant as brakeman, and that while in the discharge of his duties on the top of a car, attached to a running train, he was struck by a pipe projecting from a water-tank, knocked off, and caused to fall under the train, resulting in his death. The defect which caused his injury is alleged as follows: "That said pipe was projecting from said tank and overhanging defendant's road-bed in such a careless and dangerous position that a brakeman, standing on the top of a moving train, could not pass thereby without being knocked off." There can be no question that the supply-pipe of a water-tank is, in the meaning of the statute, a part of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of a railroad company; and if an employe is injured, without contributory negligence on his part, by reason of a defect therein, which arose from or was not discovered and remedied owing to the negligence of defendant or of some person intrusted with the duty of seeing that such ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition, the company is answerable in damages. Railway Co. v. Brooks, 84 Ala. 138, 4 South. Rep. 289.

Among other pleas, the defendant filed two special pleas negativing the existence of the statutory facts which confer authority on courts of probate within their respective counties to grant letters of administration, and averring that the letters granted to plaintiff are void. Whether the validity of the letter can be collaterally assailed it is unnecessary to decide. Plaintiff having joined issue on the pleas, any competent evidence tending to support their truth is admissible. Residence is a fact to which a witness may testify, or he may testify to the acts of the party or the circumstances from which it may be inferred. But it cannot be proved by what the people at the alleged place of residence or the relatives of the deceased said, or the general reputation among the people with whom he associated, as to where he lived. This is mere hearsay.

One of the main issues being whether the pipe projected so far and extended so low that a brakeman on the top of a car could not safely pass under it, evidence of the height of the ordinary freight-cars in use on defendant's road was relevant, especially in connection with testimony as to the distance of the pipe from the level of the track. Such evidence throws light on a material inquiry. Railroad Co. v. Smith, 90 Ala. 25, 8 South. Rep. 43.

Neither was there error in refusing to allow defendant to ask the witness Robinson if he did not, on the night of the accident, or the next day, telegraph the superintendent of defendant's road that deceased lived in Rome, Ga., and to send his body to that place. If the purpose was to prove the residence of deceased, the question is obnoxious to the objection that residence cannot be proved by declarations of a third person, and especially when such third person is the agent of defendant. If the purpose was impeachment, the telegram, being in writing, should have been produced and shown, or read to the witness, that he might have opportunity to inspect and explain, or its non-production accounted for. Floyd v. State, 82 Ala. 16, 2 South. Rep. 683.

[1] Section 2591 provides that, "if such injury results in the death of the servant or employe, his personal representative is entitled to maintain an action therefor," etc.

If the supply-pipe to the tank had been for a number of years in the same relative position in which it was at the time plaintiff's intestate was killed, and freight trains had passed the pipe each day and night during that period, and no brakeman or other person had been previously injured, these are facts proper to be considered by the jury on the inquiry of negligence on the part of defendant, or of contributory negligence on the part of defendant. Railroad Co. v. Hall, 87 Ala. 708, 6 South. Rep. 277; Railroad Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159, 4 South. Rep. 359. It is the duty of the jury to consider the evidence tending to show such facts, as it is their duty to consider all evidence admitted before them. But the charges asked by defendant, based on the hypothesis of these facts, are objectionable for the reason that they select and direct special attention to the evidence tending to show that phase of the defense, and give it undue prominence. We have heretofore observed, more than once, that "charges of this character —assuming that the jury may look to this fact, or may consider that fact, or are authorized to infer certain formulated conclusions from the evidence, and especially from specific parts of it—have often been condemned by us as objectionable, and should never be given, although the giving or the refusal of such instructions may not be a reversible error. They are legitimate arguments to the jury, not announcements of legal principles, proper to be in the form of instructions by the court." Snider v. Burkes, 84 Ala. 53, 4 South. Rep. 225. Such charges are regarded as mere arguments, and on this account properly refused. Salm v. State, 89 Ala. 56, 8 South. Rep. 66; Hawes v. State, 88 Ala. 37, 7 South. Rep. 302; Riley v. State, 88 Ala. 188, 7 South. Rep. 104. The charge given at the instance of plaintiff is subject to the same objection. It is a mere argument, announcing no legal proposition, but, having been given, will not reverse the judgment. It is manifest on the evidence that the court would not have been justified in giving the affirmative charge in favor of defendant, or the charge that the jury could not find for plaintiff. We have examined the other rulings assigned for error, and discover no error in them.

Affirmed.

KANSAS CITY, M. & B. R. Co. v. HIGDON.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — LIABILITY FOR DOGS LOST BY CARRIER—RULES OF COMPANY—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Plaintiff was a passenger for E. in a second-class car, with his dog. The conductor told him, under the company's rules, dogs must go in the baggage-car. Plaintiff delivered the dog to the baggage-master, and told him to put it off at E., and that he would not pay him any money for the dog. On arriving at E., the baggage-master refused to deliver the dog without the payment of 25 cents, which plaintiff refused to give, and the dog was carried further on, and lost by the negligence of the baggage-master. Plaintiff afterwards, and before learning of the loss of the dog, offered to pay what was due on it. Held, that plaintiff could recover for the dog from the company, though it had a rule providing only for the payment of a fee to the baggage-master, and relieving itself of all liability; plaintiff not being informed of the rule, and having no knowledge of it.

2. Defendant having had the benefit under certain pleas of matters set out in others, demurrers to which were sustained, any error in sustaining the demurrer was harmless.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

Action by E. L. Higdon against the Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham Railroad Company to recover damages for the loss of a dog. From a judgment on a verdict directed for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant's pleas numbered 1 and 2 were the general issue, and the special pleas interposed by defendant set up a rule of defendant regulating the carriage of dogs, and disclaimed responsibility for dogs so carried; averred that the defendant was not, and did not hold itself out to be, a carrier of dogs on its passenger trains; that the only compensation provided for their carriage would be the personal perquisites to the baggage-master for their carriage.

Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellant.
Cabaniss & Weakley, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendant had the benefit under pleas numbered 1 and 2 of the matters set up by the three special pleas, the demurrers to which were sustained. Such being the case, if there was error in sustaining the demurrers, it was error without injury to the defendant, and does not afford ground for a reversal of the judgment. Railroad Co. v. Davis, 91 Ala. 487, 8 South. Rep. 552.

The appellee was a passenger on the appellant's train from Birmingham to Elliott, a station on the appellant's line of road. When he boarded the train he went into a second-class car, carrying his dog along with him. When the conductor passed through the train collecting tickets he saw the dog, and then told the appellee that it was against the rules of the company to carry dogs on its passenger-coaches, and that he would have to put the dog in the baggage-car. Thereupon the appellee and a brakeman took the dog into the baggage-car, and delivered it to the baggage-master. The appellee testified, without contradiction, that he told the baggage-master to put the dog off at Elliott, and also that he told him that he would not pay him any money for the dog. When the train arrived at Elliott, the baggage-master refused to deliver the dog, unless the appellee would pay him a fee of 25 cents. The appellee declining to make this payment, the dog was carried to Memphis, and was lost. The appellee afterwards offered to pay what was due on the dog, but did not renew such offer after he was informed that the dog was lost. There is no evidence to show that when the appellee delivered the dog to the baggage-master he had knowledge or notice of the rule under which the appellant seeks to relieve itself of responsibility. The conductor was acting within the apparent scope of his authority when he gave directions as to the disposition to be made of the dog. When the baggage-master received the dog, there was nothing to indicate that he was acting in his own behalf, rather than as an employe of the appellant and for it. It does not appear that the appellee was in any way made to understand that in reference to the carriage and custody of the dog he was to look to the baggage-master individually, and not to the railroad company. He was not informed that the company was unwilling to transport the dog or to become responsible for it. He was simply told to leave the dog in another part of the train, and with the person in charge of the baggage. He was not presumed to know the rules of the company as to the kinds of property it would receive for transportation. It does not even appear in this case that the rule relied on was posted in the depot, or in any other public place, at the station where the appellee was received as a passenger. The rule itself shows that it was the duty of the defendant's employes to give notice to the owners of dogs of the conditions upon which they would be carried by the railroad company, and, if the owners were unwilling to accept such conditions, to refer them to the express company. In the present case the conductor permitted the dog to remain on the train, and had it put in the baggage-car, and neither he nor the baggage-master intimated to the appellee that the company was unwilling to carry the dog or to become responsible therefor. It affirmatively appears that the appellee did not know of the rule in question. He was entitled to rely upon and to follow the instructions given by the conductor. Railroad Co. v. Huffman, 76 Ala. 492; Jones v. Railroad Co., 89 Ala. 376, 8 South. Rep. 61; Railroad Co. v. Rosenzweig, (Pa. Sup.) 6 Atl. Rep. 545. A rule of which the passenger has no notice cannot have effect to relieve the railroad company of responsibility for an article accepted for carriage by an employe who is intrusted with the duty of receiving and taking charge of goods delivered for transportation, and who accepts the article in question apparently in the course of his employment and on behalf of the principal. The conductor and the baggage-master could be treated by a person having dealings with the defendant as having all the ordinary powers incident to their respective positions except so far as restrictions are imposed upon their authority which are known, or ought to be known, to the person dealing with them. In transacting the business intrusted to them, within the usual and ordinary scope of such business, they act within the extent of their authority; and the principal is bound, provided the party dealing with them acts in good faith, and without notice of any restrictions or limitations upon their authority, (Wheeler v. McGuire, 86 Ala. 398, 5 South. Rep. 190; Coffin Co. v. Stokes, 78 Ala. 372;) and the principal is responsible for the act of the agent when done within the apparent scope of his authority, though in violation of a rule or instruction of the principal, which was unknown to the person dealing with the agent, (Gilliam v. Railroad Co., 70 Ala. 268.) In the present case, the baggage-master, when he received the dog, was engaged in the particular business with which he was intrusted by the defendant. The plaintiff was entitled to suppose that he was dealing with the defendant through its regularly accredited agent in that department of its business. If the defendant was unwilling to receive or to become responsible for the dog, the plaintiff should have been informed to this effect by the agent. No such information having been given, and the rule now set up being unknown to the plaintiff when his dog was received without objection, he was entitled to look to the defendant for its carriage and proper delivery; and as the dog was lost, and was not accounted for, the defendant was liable on the undisputed facts shown by the evidence. The plain conclusion from the evidence is that the dog was lost in consequence of the negligence of the baggage-master; and, in the circumstances developed by the proof, the defendant could not shift the liability from itself to the baggage-master individually. Cantling v. Railroad Co., 54 Mo. 385; Minter v. Railroad Co., 41 Mo. 503; Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 1157. The affirmative charge in favor of the plaintiff was properly given. Affirmed.

MEMPHIS & C. R. CO. v. GRAHAM.

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—RULES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—CUSTOM—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a railroad company for the negligent killing of a conductor while uncoupling cars, a plea that deceased was negligent in violating a rule of the company forbidding employes from going between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them, where not demurred to because it does not aver that deceased knew of the rule, raises a valid issue for the jury.

2. A rule of a railroad company forbidding employes from going between cars in motion to uncouple them is reasonable and "wholesome."

3. Since this rule is clear and explicit, evidence that for many years it had been the custom of brakemen to go between cars in motion to make uncouplings was inadmissible to show that the rule, not having been insisted on, was not binding on deceased.

4. Where it was contended that a rule of the company requiring freight-car conductors to "assist" in shifting and making up trains meant that they should only superintend and give orders, evidence that for many years it had been their custom to couple and uncouple cars was admissible, since "assist" is ambiguous.

5. A conductor who voluntarily, even though with the acquiescence of the railroad company, undertakes to uncouple cars, subjects himself to all reasonable rules prescribed for those whose duty it is to do such work.

6. Where the evidence tended to show both that the conductor could have uncoupled the cars in no other way, and also that he might have uncoupled them from the platform with perfect safety, it was error to refuse to charge that, if the car could have been uncoupled with safety after it had stopped, or with safety from the platform, and if deceased knew of the rule which required all employes to exercise great care in coupling and uncoupling cars, then his failure to wait till the car stopped, or to uncouple the car from the platform, would preclude his recovery.

7. Although a conductor is not a person intrusted with the duty of seeing that the "ways, works, machinery, or plant" of a railroad company are in proper condition, within Code, § 2590, subd. 1, which declares a master liable to a servant for injuries caused by any defect therein, yet a rule requiring railroad employes to examine the soundness of cars, engines, machinery, etc., as far as reasonable, before using them, is proper.

8. A charge predicated on a fact not in evidence is properly refused.

9. It is not negligence for a servant to go between cars, contrary to rules of the railroad company, when the duty required cannot otherwise be performed.

Appeal from circuit court, Madison county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

Action by Ella P. Graham, as administratrix, against the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

The printed rules of the company required the coupling to be done by the brakemen with sticks made for that purpose. Rule No. 139, introduced in evidence, required that "every employe must exercise the utmost caution to avoid injury to himself or to his fellows, especially in the switching of cars and the movement of trains, which work each employe must look after, and be responsible for his own safety. Jumping on or off trains or engines in motion, getting between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them, and all similar imprudences, are dangerous and in violation of duty." Defendant excepted to the following portions of the general charge given by the court: "Again, if you find that there was such defect, and the same was known to the person in the employment who was intrusted with the duty of seeing that the draw-head of defendant's car was in proper condition, and that such defect had existed for such a length of time as, with proper diligence, it could have been discovered or remedied by defendant, then, in that event, you would be authorized under the law to say that the defendant was negligent. (2) And if you further believe that the death of deceased was caused by the negligence of defendant as above described, then the law would authorize you to find a verdict for the plaintiff. (3) You must also look to all the evidence, including custom referred to by the witnesses, to determine the reasonableness of said rules, and whether or not they had been modified by the custom of employes in coupling and uncoupling cars, and whether or not such custom or usage was known to defendants." The court refused to give the following written charges, requested by defendant: "(1) If the jury believe the evidence they must find for the defendant. (2) I charge you that rule 139, in the rules attached to the time-table, and which has been introduced in evidence, is such a rule as defendant had a right to establish; and, if John L. Graham came to his death in consequence of his trying to get between cars while in motion to uncouple them, he was acting in violation of such rule, and your verdict should be for defendant. (3) It is not shown in this case that it was the duty of the defendant, while the car with the broken draw-head was at Huntsville for several days prior to October, 1887, to examine or inspect the same, or to notify said Graham, as conductor, of its condition. (4) If the jury find from the evidence that a rule of the defendant made it a violation of duty for an employe to get between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them, and that John Graham came to his death in trying to get between cars in motion to uncouple them, then the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. (5) If the jury believe from the evidence that John L. Graham came to his death while violating a rule of defendant in trying to get between cars in motion to uncouple the same, the verdict must be for the defendant. (6) I charge you that rule 138, in the rules attached to the time-table, and which has been introduced in evidence, is a reasonable rule, which the defendant had the right to establish. (7) If it was safer for Graham to go on the platform of the coach, and from there couple or uncouple, and it was more dangerous to go between the cars to couple or uncouple, and these facts are shown by the evidence, and Graham adopted the more dangerous method of coupling or uncoupling, then Graham was guilty of contributory negligence, and the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant. (8) No failure of duty on the part of defendant in allowing the draw-head or coupling apparatus to become or remain defective or broken would excuse John L. Graham from examining the condition of such draw-head or coupling apparatus before using the same, or exposing himself between the cars; and, if the jury believe from the evidence that if John L. Graham had examined the condition of the draw-head or coupling apparatus he would have discovered that it was defective or broken, so as to be dangerous to use,—then the verdict must be for the defendant. (9) Although the railroad company may have been negligent in having a defective car, yet if the jury believe from the evidence that Graham violated a rule of the company in going between a car in motion to uncouple it, and thereby was killed, and that at the time he violated such rule he had knowledge of the said rule, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this case. (10) If the jury believe from the evidence that it was a rule of the company that no employe should enter between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them, and that Graham had knowledge of such rule, and in violation of such rule he did go between said cars while in motion, and if you believe from the evidence that his violation of said rule approximately contributed to his death, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this case. (11) If the jury believe from the evidence that said car could have been uncoupled with safety after said car had stopped, or with safety from the platform of said car, and the rule of the company required that all employes should exercise great care and caution in coupling and uncoupling cars, and that Graham had knowledge of such rule, then he was bound to uncouple said car from the platform, or wait till said car had stopped before he attempted to uncouple it; and if you believe that his failure to do so proximately contributed to his death, then the plaintiff cannot recover."

Humes & Sheffey, for appellant. Wm. Richardson and E. L. Palley, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The evidence shows that the plaintiff's intestate, John L. Graham, whose regular employment was that of freight-car conductor, went between the cars while in motion to uncouple a freight-car from a passenger-car, and on account of a defective or broken draw-head or coupling appliance was crushed and killed. There was a platform to the passenger-car next to the freight-car where the uncoupling was to be done. The defense was contributory negligence, and that plaintiff's intestate came to his death in violation of a rule of defendant, which prohibited employes from going between the cars while in motion to uncouple them. The plea does not set out the rule, or aver that plaintiff's intestate knew of the existence of such rule. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Hawkins, 92 Ala. —, 9 South. Rep. 271, it was distinctly declared as the settled doctrine in this state that the adoption and promulgation by an employer of a rule for the guidance of an employe does not charge the latter with knowledge thereof, so as to impute negligence to him for its violation, but that to such end it is essential that knowledge of its existence be brought home to the employe. It was further held that a plea setting up a violation of such rule as establishing contributory negligence was open to demurrer which failed to aver knowledge of such rule. It is also well settled that where issue is joined upon an insufficient plea it becomes one of the issues to be tried by the jury, and that the defendant is entitled to the advantage of such plea, in the introduction of evidence in support of it, and in the instructions to be given by the court to the jury. Farrow v. Andrews, 69 Ala. 97. A conductor who voluntarily, even though by the permission or acquiescence of the employer, undertakes to perform the duties of coupling or uncoupling cars, subjects himself to all reasonable rules and regulations prescribed by the employer for the government of those whose duty it is to perform this work. Rule 139, offered in evidence, prescribes that "getting between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them is dangerous, and in violation of duty. All employes are warned that, if they commit these imprudences, it will be at their own risk and peril." This rule, or one similar to it, has been declared by repeated decisions of this court to be reasonable and "wholesome," and that railroad companies were justifiable in adopting and enforcing it for their own protection and that of employes. Railway Co. v. Propst, 90 Ala. 3, 7 South. Rep. 685, 83 Ala. 518, 3 South. Rep. 764; Pryor v. Railroad Co., 90 Ala. 35, 8 South. Rep. 55; Railroad Co. v. Watson, 90 Ala. 69, 8 South. Rep. 249. When the authorities declare that the rule is "reasonable" and "wholesome," it is with the qualification or understanding that the duties required may be performed consistently with the observance of the rule; and if the sticks furnished by the employer —as the evidence in this case tends to show—are so short that a coupling cannot be made by their use without going between the cars, the rule which forbids employes from going between cars to effect a coupling while in motion would afford no protection to the master if the duty imposed necessitated its non-observance. The rule which requires the use of sticks to make couplings is "reasonable" and "wholesome," and an employe who, having knowledge of the rule, and provided with a stick by which this duty can be performed without going between the cars, and in violation of the rule, without urgent and excusable necessity, goes between the cars, and is thereby injured, is guilty of contributory negligence of an aggravated character, and his remedy is gone. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 141; Pryor v. Railroad Co., supra; Railway Co. v. Propst, 83 Ala., 3 South. Rep., supra. There is no evidence to show that cars can be uncoupled by the use of a stick, and we presume sticks, as now prepared, cannot be used for that purpose. In referring to the use of sticks, the rule prescribes that they must be used for making couplings, not uncouplings.

In considering this case, we have kept in view the fact that the injured person was the conductor himself, authoritatively exercising control over the engineer and brakemen and the movement of the cars. Is there any evidence to show that the work of uncoupling the cars could have been performed in an apparently safe way, which deceased did not adopt, or that the condition of the cars was such that they could not be uncoupled with reasonable safety except by going between them, or that the company had waived its right to insist upon an observance of the rule? As a legal proposition, independent of any rules provided by the master, if an employe selects a dangerous way to perform a duty, knowing it to be attended with danger, when there is a safe way apparent to him, and he undertakes to perform the duty in the dangerous way, and in consequence thereof is injured, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as to cut off all legal remedy for the injury. Railroad Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 South. Rep. 364; Railroad Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 137, 4 South. Rep. 146; Highland Ave. v. Walters, 91 Ala. 435, 8 South. Rep. 360. The act of uncoupling cars while in motion by going between them does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence, under all circumstances. Goodrich v. Railroad Co., (N. Y. App.) 22 N. E. Rep. 397. It is, however, necessarily an act attended with more or less danger. There was evidence introduced on the trial which tended to show that the cars, on account of their condition, could not have been uncoupled from the platform of the passenger-car; but there was evidence tending to show that the uncoupling could have been effected in this way with perfect safety, and that that was the proper way, under the circumstances existing in this case. Applying the principle of law declared in the Orr Case and Holborn Case, supra, in regard to the duty of an employe when there is a dangerous way and a safe way to perform an act, the court was in error in refusing to give charge No. 11, requested by appellant. It is contended by appellee that this charge and other charges were properly refused, under the authority of Railroad Co. v. Perry, 87 Ala. 394, 6 South. Rep. 40, because the charges failed to hypothesize the question of knowledge or notice of the existence of the rule. The plea in the present case failed to aver knowledge or notice, and issue was joined upon it in this insufficient condition. The fact of knowledge or notice was not an issue before the jury, and the charges requested were not objectionable for ignoring an outside issue. Railroad Co. v. Watson, 90 Ala. 68, 8 South. Rep. 249; 87 Ala. 394, 6 South. Rep. 40, supra. It may be that ordinarily freight or box cars, which have no platform, cannot be uncoupled without going between the cars; but this would not excuse an employe who failed to use the platform, if there was one, and the use of the platform was obviously the safer way.

A disputed question in the case arises upon the proper construction of rule 201, which requires freight-car conductors "to assist in the shifting and making up of trains." In behalf of plaintiff, evidence was introduced tending to show that under the rule it was the custom, and had been for many years, for conductors to couple or uncouple cars, and that at times all the conductors on the road performed this duty, and it was generally understood that the word "assist" included this duty. One witness testified that he had seen every conductor on the road assist in this way in coupling or uncoupling cars. For appellant it was contended that coupling and uncoupling was the duty of brakemen only, and the word "assist" meant that conductors should superintend and "give the proper signals." We think the evidence of custom on this question was properly received. Rules for the government of employes should be written with precision, and be free from ambiguity. The principle of law is "that parol evidence of a usage is admissible to explain terms ambiguous or doubtful in significance, or from which to infer the intention, understanding, and agreement of the parties, and to incorporate a stipulation or element wherein the contract is silent." Railroad Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 604; Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704. The court properly received evidence which tended to show the meaning of the word "assist" as used in rule 201, and, the evidence on this point being in conflict, the determination of the disputed fact was a question for the jury.

Evidence of usage and custom for many years, on the part of brakemen, to go between the cars while in motion to make an uncoupling, was introduced to show that rule 139, which prohibits this mode of coupling and uncoupling, was not insisted upon by the railroad company, was not binding upon the employes. The rule is clear and explicit in terms, free from ambiguity or equivocation. It does not "pander in a double sense." Mr. Greenleaf (2 Ev. § 251) says: "The true office of a usage or custom is to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intention of parties to fix the meaning of words and expressions of doubtful or various senses." In the case of Railroad Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 604, this court declared that evidence of usage or custom will not be received when it varies or contradicts the express terms of a contract. Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala., supra. "When persons enter into express stipulations, it is a reasonable rule, subject only to a few exceptions, that neither custom nor usage will be allowed to dispense with such express stipulations." Railroad Co. v. Kolb, 73 Ala. 401. The rule has been declared to be "reasonable" and "wholesome." It was adopted for the protection of the company and for the safety of its employes. Evidence of usage and custom of its violation by those it was intended to protect, either to exempt them from its obligations or to subject the company to damage because of its repeated violation, does not come within the exception, and such evidence is inadmissible. The case of Hissong v. Railroad Co., 91 Ala. 518, 8 South. Rep. 776, does not in any manner conflict with the rule here declared.

So far as rule 140, or any other rule, militates against the liability imposed upon the employer or master under section 2590, or contravenes the principle of law which requires the employer or master to furnish and maintain suitable material and appliances for the safe prosecution of its business, and the right of the employe to presume that this has been done, it will be regarded as wholly inoperative, and afford no protection to the employer or master; but, so far as rule 140 imposes the duty upon employes to examine for their own safety the condition of the car, engines, and machinery, etc., before using them, or exposing themselves on or with the same, so as to ascertain, as far as reasonably can be done, their condition and soundness, it is reasonable and proper. It cannot be expected of car conductors or brakemen to make the same careful examination, and to be able to discover defects to the same extent, as that expected and required of the employer or master, or person intrusted generally with this duty for the public safety or safety of employes; but the character of the general duties to be performed by conductors and brakemen are such that they necessarily become more or less familiar with the appliances and machinery constantly in their use and under their supervision, and to know to some extent when they are not in proper condition for safe use. To the extent of their information and the opportunities afforded to make such examination, consistently with their other duties and the circumstances attending, they should observe and obey the rule. Whether the deceased was negligent in not making such examination, or whether the defect was of that character that it could not have been discovered upon such examination as it was his duty to make, and whether he did conform to the rule, and failed to discover the defect, is a question of fact for the jury. We do not think a conductor or brakeman is "a person in the service of the master or employer intrusted with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition," within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 2590[1] of the Code, and our understanding of the rule of the company is that the duty imposed upon conductors and brakemen to examine the machinery and appliances devolves upon those conductors and brakemen who are using the machinery, ways, works, etc., in question. The fact that a brakeman or conductor of some other train at a former period may have noticed the defect, and neglected to report such, did not exempt the conductor, whose duty it was to use the defective appliance or machinery, from making the examination for his own safety as required by the rule.

The employe's act does not and never was intended to take from the master the defense of contributory negligence. Railway Co. v. Bradford, 86 Ala. 579, 6 South. Rep. 90; Railroad Co. v. Holborn, 84 Ala. 133, 4 South. Rep. 146. The principles of law declared in Railroad Co. v. Orr, and Railroad Co. v. Holborn, as to what constitutes contributory negligence on the part of an employe, may be applicable to two phases of the tendencies of the testimony in this case,—that which defines when an employe must select the safer way to perform a duty, and also when an employe assumes at his own peril that proper appliances have been provided by the master. The jury is the sole judge whether the facts bring the case within their application. The general charge of the court, considered as a whole, with but few exceptions, is a clear and correct exposition of the law as applicable to the many questions raised by the evidence. The court, however, should not have left it to the jury to say whether the rule was reasonable which requires that employes shall use a stick in coupling cars, or which prohibits them from going between cars while in motion to couple or uncouple. As a matter of law the rule is reasonable. When the proof shows that the company refused to furnish sticks, or that the duty required, on account of the appliance or other proper causes, could not be performed without a violation of the rule, the master cannot invoke the rule for its protection. In such cases the court might and should hypothesize the enforcement of the rule upon the finding of the jury as to these facts.

We have attempted to limit and define the proper boundaries of usage and custom as applicable to the facts in this case. Charge No. 1, requested by defendant, was properly refused. Charge No. 3 is abstract, as there is no evidence tending to show the car was in Huntsville prior to October. Charges 2, 4, 5, 7, 9, and 10 were faulty, in ignoring the evidence which tended to show that on account of the condition of the appliances the duty could not be performed except by going between the cars. Charge 8 assumes that John L. Graham did not examine the draw-head and coupling apparatus. This was a fact to be determined by the jury. Charge 11 states the law very clearly, as we understand it, and ought to have been given. Charge 6 also ought to have been given. If desired, and the evidence justified it, an explanatory charge should have been requested by appellee. Reversed and remanded.

WALKER, J., not sitting.

[1] Code, § 2590, provides that a master shall be liable to his servant for any personal injury "caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master."

GRADY v. IBACH et al.

USE AND OCCUPATION — RIGHTS OF CESTUI QUE TRUST.

1. Under Code, § 2715, which provides that a reasonable satisfaction may be recovered for the use and occupation of land demised by deed, the action is one for the recovery of rent, and the relation of landlord and tenant must have existed; and where executors, holding land in trust to manage for the testator's daughter until her majority, leased the same, she cannot, on reaching her majority, recover of the lessee for use and occupation during her minority, she not having had actual possession of the land.

2. Where the trust devolved on the executors was also for the purpose of paying to the testator's wife during her life one-third of the net income of other property, taking possession of the property by the daughter on becoming of age would not operate to substitute her in place of the executors so as to vest in her the right of action.

3. As the trust would not fail for want of a trustee, it mattered not that all of the executors had resigned or died during the daughter's minority.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARK, Judge.

Action by Carrie J. Grady against M. Ibach and others for the use and occupation of certain premises. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frederick G. Bromberg, for appellant. W. E. Richardson, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. The appellant brings the action to recover for the use and occupation of two stores under and a part of the Gulf City Hotel, in Mobile, from November, 1883, to February, 1890. The hotel was leased to James Flanagan by the executors of D. O. Grady, who was the father of the plaintiff, for the term of one year, commencing November, 1879. In November, 1882, Flanagan sublet the stores to defendants, who occupied them until February, 1890, renting in the mean time from, and paying the rent to, Flanagan, who held over after the expiration of his lease, and continued to occupy the hotel during the entire period of defendant's occupation of the stores. By the fifth clause of the will of D. O. Grady, under which plaintiff derives title to the premises, the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal property, not otherwise disposed of, to his executors, named in a prior clause, in trust to take possession and hold the real estate, rent the same from time to time, receive the rents, pay the taxes, keep the property insured at their discretion, and pay to the wife of the testator during her life one-third of the net proceeds arising therefrom in lieu of dower; also to hold, manage, and control the balance of his estate, except the portion of the personal property bequeathed to his wife and certain contingent legacies, until plaintiff should reach 21 years of age, when they were to deliver the same, real and personal, together with what remained of the contingent fund provided in the will, to plaintiff. The executors were required to appropriate money of the estate at their discretion, for the support, maintenance, and education of plaintiff. The contingent fund alluded to consisted of the annual revenue remaining after paying the several sums directed, which the executors were required to keep as a fund to be applied to the payment of any debts incurred by the estate which the current net revenue was insufficient to discharge, and to be appropriated to the support of his wife, if one-third of the rents should be insufficient for that purpose. Two of the four executors resigned in February, 1881; another died in March, 1883; and the fourth in July or August, 1886. Plaintiff became of age March 31, 1890, since which time defendants have paid her the rent for the stores.

The question arising on these facts, which are undisputed, is, can plaintiff maintain the action against defendants for use and occupation of the premises during her minority? Such action is regulated by statute, which provides a reasonable satisfaction may be recovered for the use and occupation of land, where there has been a demise by deed or by parol, and no specific sum agreed on as rent; or when the tenant has been let into possession upon a supposed sale of the land, which, from his act, has not been consummated; or when the tenant remains on the land by the sufferance of the owner. Code, § 2715. The action is limited to the enumerated cases. It is essentially an action to recover rent, and rests on an agreement, express or raised by the law on the facts, to pay the value of the use of the land. As a general rule, to support the action the conventional relation of landlord and tenant must have existed. A contract, express or implied, either creating the technical relation, or bringing the parties into a relation from which like rights and duties result, is an indispensable element. These principles have been uniformly recognized by this court. Powell v. Security Co., 89 Ala. 490, 8 South. Rep. 136; Stringfellow v. Curry, 76 Ala. 394; Weaver v. Jones, 24 Ala. 420. There are insurmountable obstacles to the maintenance of the action by plaintiff. In the absence of an express agreement, or of actual possession, only the owner of the legal estate can maintain an action for use and occupation. 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, § 757. In such case, the law will not imply a promise to pay rent to other than the owner of the legal estate. It is manifest that, by the devise, the legal estate was vested in the executors. They alone were authorized to take possession and hold the real estate, and rent it, and receive the rents during the minority of plaintiff. They alone could have dispossessed the tenants. The executors let the premises to Flanagan; the relation of landlord and tenant existed only between them. The plaintiff was not entitled to receive or recover the rents during her minority; she could not have maintained ejectment or an action on the lease to Flanagan. The express contract would have supported an action against him for use and occupation after the expiration of his lease by the executors, in their individual names, though they were accountable for the proceeds recovered. It is self-evident that a several right of action on the same agreement cannot exist at the same time in two persons, there being no several covenants. A cestui que trust cannot maintain an action for use and occupation, where the letting was by the trustee. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 639. Plaintiff not having had actual possession, and there being no express contract between her and Flanagan for the rental year commencing November, 1879, or with the defendants when they first entered into possession, the law will not imply a promise from defendants to her in the absence of title. Couch v. McKellar, 33 Ala. 473. If it be said that the delivery of the property to her, on attaining her majority, operated, the trust having been executed, to vest the title in her, the general rule is that, as defendants did not enter under or by her permission, she can recover for use and occupation only from the time she had the legal estate, though she may have had the equitable estate. Balls v. Westwood, 2 Camp. 13, note; Harris v. Booker, 12 Moore, 283.

Neither did the delivery of the property operate to substitute her in the place of the executors so as to vest in her the right of action. Whatever might have been the effect had the trust been solely for the benefit of plaintiff, and there had been a settlement discharging the executors from liability to further account, mere taking possession of the property on attaining majority cannot have such effect, when the trust devolved on the executors is for other uses and parties; for this would be a substitution, by her own act, in the place of the executors as to the trust.

It matters not that all the executors had resigned or died; a trust does not fail for the want of a trustee. We do not wish to be understood as holding or intimating that plaintiff is without remedy, at least for the period of occupation after the authority of the executors ceased by resignation and death. It may be that she could maintain an action against Flanagan for money had and received, (Vincent v. Rogers, 33 Ala. 224,) or hold the tenants accountable as trustees in invitum. As to this we express no opinion. All we decide is that plaintiff cannot, under the circumstances, maintain the action for use and occupation prior to the acquisition of the legal title, not having had actual possession. Affirmed.

MOBILE & O. R. CO. v. DISMUKES.

CARRIERS OF GOODS — INTERSTATE COMMERCE — VALIDITY OF FREIGHT CONTRACT — KNOWLEDGE OF SHIPPER—SCHEDULE RATES.

1. The interstate commerce law makes it unlawful for a carrier to issue bills of lading at rates different from those established and filed with the commission, or to demand or receive freight charges variant from such established rates. The act makes it penal for any person to knowingly obtain transportation at less than the regular rates in force at the time. Defendant agreed to carry goods from C., Ill., and deliver them to plaintiff at a point in Alabama on the line of the M. & B. R. R., with which road defendant had a joint tariff. The bill of lading called for $5.44 freight charges, but the M. & B. road refused to deliver the goods except on payment of $29.30, the schedule rate. Held, that plaintiff could recover the value of the goods, since it did not appear that he or the consignor knew of the schedule rate.

2. It is not in the contemplation of the interstate commerce law that persons dealing with common carriers should be held to know their published schedules of rates.

3. Code, § 1159, providing that carriers exacting exorbitant charges for freight are guilty of extortion, and liable for double the damages sustained, does not apply to shipments over lines without the state.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARK, Judge.

Action by H. C. Dismukes against the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company for failure to deliver goods. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Russell, for appellant. Sheton Sims, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. A statute of this state (Code, § 1159) provides that "any person or corporation engaged in the business of transporting passengers or freights over any railroad in this state who shall exact and receive more than just compensation therefor, or demands more than the rates specified in any bill of lading issued for such freights, * * * is guilty of extortion, and is liable to the party injured in double the damages sustained," etc. The act of congress, known as the "Interstate Commerce Law," of February 4, 1887, as amended by acts approved March 2, 1889, makes it unlawful for any common carrier to issue bills of lading at rates, or to demand or receive freight charges variant from the rates, established and published as therein prescribed, and filed with the interstate commerce commission; and this, whether the carriage in a given instance is by one common carrier, or by more than one, having traffic arrangements and a joint tariff of charges. Not only so, but it is also made unlawful for any person or corporation, by what means soever, and whether with the consent and connivance of the carrier or otherwise, to knowingly obtain transportation at less than the regular rates at the time in force on the line of transportation; and the infraction of the statute in the particulars referred to, as well by consignors and consignees as by carriers, is made a highly penal offense. In the case at bar the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company received at Cairo, Ill., certain goods of the value of about $40 for transportation to Sunny South, Ala., a station on the Mobile & Birmingham Railway, with which the initial line connected at Mobile, Ala.; and delivered to the shipper a bill of lading whereby it was undertaken to transport the goods over the two roads in question to Sunny South, and there deliver them to H. C. Dismukes, for a compensation of $5.44. There was at the time a joint tariff of rates in force between the Mobile & Ohio and the Mobile & Birmingham Railway Companies between the initial and terminal points of this shipment, which had been duly filed with the interstate commerce commission, approved, promulgated, and published in consonance with the act of congress; and, according to the rates fixed in this schedule, the freight charges on this consignment were, or should have been, $29.30. On arrival of the goods at Sunny South, the consignee tendered to the agent of the Mobile & Birmingham Railway Company $5.44, the amount of charges stipulated in the bill of lading, and demanded the property. This demand was refused, the insistence being that, the bill of lading to the contrary notwithstanding, the consignee was liable for the schedule rate of $29.30; and thereupon the consignee instituted this action for the value of the goods as upon a failure to deliver the same to him, before a justice of the peace, whence, on judgment for plaintiff, an appeal was taken to the circuit court, where a trial de novo was had before the judge without jury on agreed facts. Judgment was again entered for plaintiff in the circuit court, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted, presenting for review the conclusion of the trial judge on the facts.

The statute of Alabama which we have quoted is relied on in support of the judgment. We do not think any aid can be derived from that source. The shipment—the transportation being from a point in Illinois, through the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi, into Alabama—was an act of interstate commerce, and clearly within the laws of the United States regulating that commerce. It, of course, cannot be doubted that Alabama is without power to declare what rates of charge in respect of such commerce shall amount to extortion on the part of the carrier, or to declare that the demand for an amount of freight charges which the carrier is authorized under the act of congress to impose is rendered extortionate by reason of the fact that a less amount is stipulated to be paid and received between the parties to the bill of lading. To hold otherwise would be to give paramount efficacy to state regulation of a subject which is not only within exclusive national control, but with respect to which national legislation has already provided all regulations deemed necessary or expedient. Our statute may, no doubt, be looked to as determining what is extortion in freight charges for transportation within the state, and also, it may be, as affording a remedy and measure of redress for extortion in interstate shipments, but not as declaratory of what shall constitute extortion in transactions of the class last named.

But, leaving the Alabama statute out of consideration, there is an element of contract in this case which, in our opinion, upon the agreed facts, will support the judgment below. The Mobile & Ohio Company agreed and bound itself to carry this consignment to Sunny South, Ala., and there deliver it to Dismukes, for a certain compensation. That company had no right, under the law and its tariff of rates adopted, approved, and promulgated as by the law provided, to enter into any such contract; and so far as the company is beneficially concerned in it, so far as the contract might otherwise be relied on by the carrier against the consignee, it is void, as being in the teeth of the law of congress, as the same has been put into practical operation, upon the carrying business of the company. But it by no means follows that the consignee has no rights under it, or, indeed, any less or other right than would have been his had the rate set down in the bill of lading been the approved rate for the transportation. It nowhere appears that either the consignor or consignee knew that the stipulated rate was different from the approved rate. It is not in the contemplation of the interstate commerce law that persons dealing with common carriers should be held to a knowledge of what their published schedules of rates contain. These schedules are no part of the law which all men are held to know, but are resultants in pais, so to speak, of the acts of the carrier, and of the interstate commerce commission, done under and in execution of the law. There is nothing in the law which forbids shippers to contract for transportation at other rates than those specified in these schedules. It is only when the shipper knowingly contracts for a rate differing from that therein prescribed that his act is denounced as unlawful and punished as a crime. The motive of this legislation, moreover, is the protection of persons dealing with common carriers. Its primary purpose is to prevent a resort on the part of carriers to the undue advantages which accrue to them from the circumstances of their relations to persons having need for their services. The provisions of the law should not be so strained or contorted as to defeat its purposes, and convert the shield it was intended to afford the unwary shipper, who has no choice but to patronize the carrier, into a sword with which to work his destruction more certainly and completely than would have been possible had not the arm of the government been put forth in his behalf. To allow the carrier to draw the shipper, entirely ignorant of the schedule of rates approved by the commission, into a contract of affreightment, upon which the goods are delivered and carried, at a stipulated rate which the shipper can afford to pay,—as in this instance, about 12½ per cent. of the value of the property,—and then to refuse to deliver the shipment to the consignee, except upon payment of a rate which he cannot afford to pay,—in this instance, 75 per cent. of the value,—and upon which the property would not have been shipped at all, would be to put a construction on the law of congress which its terms do not require or justify, and which would defeat the purposes which actuated its enactment. True it is that the contract here is one which the Mobile & Ohio Company had no right to make. True it is that its execution on their part involved a crime. But the act of the shipper in entering into it is not, in the absence of knowledge on his part of the schedule rate, tainted with criminality, or violative of any provision of the interstate commerce acts. He is not in pari delicto with the contracting carrier; and he is entitled to the protection of that principle of law which enforces such a contract in behalf of the innocent party to it,—a principle which we conceive to be logically sound, and thoroughly settled upon authority. See Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y. 162, and numerous later cases, which are cited and discussed in a note to that case as reported in 67 Amer. Dec. 153. Affirmed.

CREDITORS' BILL — SETTING ASIDE CONVEYANCE — FRAUD.

1. Where property has been mortgaged, and a part of it conveyed absolutely by one corporation to two other corporations, the boards of directors of the three companies being composed of the same persons, a creditor of the first corporation cannot, regardless of their fairness or unfairness, set aside the mortgage and conveyance merely because the corporation itself or its stockholders could have done so, but the creditor to set them aside must show that the transactions were fraudulent.

2. Where the evidence shows that the mortgage was given to secure debts justly due, and that the deed was executed in bona fide and absolute payment of a portion of such debts in property which was not worth more than the true amount of the debts paid thereby, the transactions cannot be considered fraudulent, even if the witnesses whose testimony is relied on were persons in control of the several corporations engaged in the dealings in question.

3. Under Code, § 3544, authorizing a creditor without a lien to file a bill in chancery to subject to the payment of his debt any property which has been, or has been attempted to be, fraudulently transferred by his debtor, such creditor must, to be entitled to relief, show that the transfer was fraudulent.

Appeal from chancery court, Etowah county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Action by the O'Conner Mining & Manufacturing Company against the Coosa Furnace Company and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunlap & Dortch, for appellant. Aiken & Martin and Watts & Son, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The bill was filed by the O'Conner Mining & Manufacturing Company as a simple contract creditor of the Coosa Furnace Company, and its principal purpose was to reach and subject to the payment of the debt claimed certain property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by the Coosa Furnace Company,—first, by a mortgage executed on the 7th day of April, 1884; and, again, as to a part of the property, by a deed of absolute conveyance executed on the 18th day of July, 1885. The specified ground of attack upon the conveyances in question is that they were executed for the purpose and with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the complainant, and to prevent it from enforcing collection of its just demands; and that the debts the mortgage was given to secure, and also the considerations recited in the deed, were simulated, and not real. The execution of the two instruments is alleged in the bill, and is admitted in the answer. The instruments must stand, unless the particular infirmities charged against them are shown by the evidence. There are no allegations to support a contention that their formal execution by the corporation was insufficient in any particular. The charge that the considerations recited in the two instruments, respectively, were simulated, and not real, is not sustained by the proof. The defendants proved, without contradiction, that the debts secured by the mortgage were due from the mortgagor, and represented full value received by it; and also that the consideration mentioned in the deed was paid in the discharge of debts which were secured by the mortgage, and that the property conveyed was not at that time worth as much as the amount of the debts in payment of which it was received. We would have to ignore the uncontroverted evidence in the case to arrive at any other conclusion on the subject than that the debts correctly represented money actually advanced to the Coosa Furnace Company and bills contracted by it.

Much stress is laid in the bill and in the argument of counsel for the appellant upon the relations existing between the several defendants during the time covered by the transactions which are sought to be impeached. The dealings in question were between the Coosa Furnace Company, on the one side, and the Wabash Iron Company, the Vigo Iron Company, A. L. Crawford, and his two sons, J. P. Crawford and A. J. Crawford, on the other side. It is true that each of the three corporations mentioned were controlled and dominated by the Crawfords. The great bulk of the stock in each of them was owned and held by members of the Crawford family. The board of directors in each of the corporations was composed of the Crawfords and their adherents. It thus plainly appears that the transactions were between the Coosa Furnace Company and some of its own stockholders and directors, and also two other corporations, having boards of directors composed of the same persons who managed and controlled the first-named company. The directors of a business corporation are its agents. Though they may not be trustees in the technical sense, yet they exercise functions of a fiduciary character. Their position implies that confidence is reposed in them. The duties which a director assumes to the corporation, and to the stockholders thereof, disqualifies him from binding the corporation in a transaction in which he is adversely interested. He cannot at the same time act for himself and for his principal without the full knowledge and free consent of the principal. In Morawetz on Private Corporations (section 528) it is said: "A person who is agent for two parties cannot, in the absence of express authority from each, represent them both in a transaction in which they have contrary interests. This rule is based upon the same reason as the rule which prohibits an agent from representing his principal when his personal interests are opposed to his duty. The principal stipulates for the judgment and skill of his agent, and the latter has no authority to act, when he is not in a position to give the principal the benefit of his best endeavors. It follows, therefore, that the directors, or other agents of a corporation, have no implied authority to bind the company by making a contract with another corporation which they also represent." If the same persons, as directors of two different companies, represent both companies in a transaction in which their interests are opposed, such transaction may be avoided by either company, or, at the instance of a stockholder in either company, without regard to the question of advantage or detriment to either company. Both the corporations are armed with the right to repudiate such a transaction, no matter how fair and open it may be shown to be. Railroad Co. v. Woods, 88 Ala. 630, 641, 7 South. Rep. 108. But the duty which disqualifies the directors from binding the corporation by a transaction in which they have an adverse interest is one owing to the corporation which they represent and to the stockholders thereof. A principal may consent to be bound by a contract made for him by an agent who, at the same time, represented an interest adverse to that of the principal. A cestui que trust may elect to confirm a transaction which he could have repudiated, on the ground that the trustee had an interest in the matter not consistent with his trust relation. In like manner, dealings between corporations, represented by the same persons as directors, may be accepted as binding by each corporation, and the stockholders thereof. The general rule is that such dealings are not absolutely void, but are voidable, at the election of the respective corporations or of the stockholders thereof. They become binding if acquiesced in by the corporations and their stockholders. Kelley v. Railroad, 141 Mass. 496, 6 N. E. Rep. 745; Ashburst's Appeal, 60 Pa. St. 290-314; Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284; Manufacturers' Sav. Bank v. Big Muddy Iron Co., 97 Mo. 38, 10 S. W. Rep. 865; Alexander v. Williams, 14 Mo. App. 13; Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587; Booth v. Robinson, 55 Md. 419; United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 34 Ohio St. 450; Tayl. Corp. (2d Ed.) § 630; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 247. The directors of a corporation, in the transaction of its business and the disposition of its property, do not stand in any such relation to the general creditors of the corporation as they occupy to the corporation itself and to its stockholders. They are not the agents of such creditors, nor can they usually be regarded as trustees acting in their behalf. The creditors are not entitled to disaffirm a transfer of the property of the corporation, made by its directors or other agents, merely because the corporation itself or its stockholders could have done so. When a disposition of the property of a corporation is assailed by its creditors they are not clothed with the right of the corporation or of its stockholders to set aside the transaction, regardless of its fairness or unfairness, on the ground that it was entered into by representatives of the corporation who had put themselves in a relation antagonistic to the interests of their principal. The right of the creditor to impeach the transaction depends upon its fraudulent character. The question in such case is, was the transaction which is complained of entered into with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors,—was the property fraudulently transferred or conveyed or attempted to be fraudulently transferred or conveyed? The mere fact that the corporation, in disposing of its property, dealt with persons who at the same time were charged with the duty of representing its interests does not by itself render the transaction fraudulent. Corrugating Co. v. Thacher, 87 Ala. 458, 6 South. Rep. 366. Where the property of a corporation is transferred to another corporation represented by the same directors, the fact of such relationship is a circumstance well calculated to arouse suspicion, and calls for a rigid and severe scrutiny in the examination of such transaction when it is assailed by a creditor. When such a relationship is shown to exist between the contracting parties, clearer and fuller proof must be given of a valuable and adequate consideration, and of the good faith of the parties, than would be required if the transferee or grantee had been a stranger. When, however, such examination is made and such proof is forthcoming, and the result is that no fraud or unfair dealing is shown, and it appears that the transaction was not vitiated by any infirmity of which a creditor has the right to complain, then the transaction must stand, and it is as valid, as against the creditor, as if the corporation had dealt with a stranger, who was not involved in any way with the corporate representatives.

In the present case, the proof offered by the defendants shows fully and in great detail the circumstances connected with the dealings between the defendants, corporations and individuals. The several witnesses were subjected to rigid cross-examinations. The considerations to support the several debts which figured in the transactions are clearly and distinctly proved. That the mortgage was given to secure debts justly due, and that the deed was executed in bona fide and absolute payment of a portion of such debts, in property which was not worth more than the true amount of the debts paid therewith, are facts clearly shown by testimony which is not contradicted in any way. We do not feel at liberty to discredit and reject the full and consistent versions of the matters in controversy given by several of the witnesses, merely because these witnesses were the persons in control of the several corporations which were engaged in the dealings in question. There is no prohibition against a corporation dealing with its own stockholders or directors in reference to matters in which such stockholders or directors have interests adverse to those of the corporation, or against several corporations, which are controlled by the same persons, dealing with each other. Nor is there anything wrong in a corporation conveying its property as security for, or in absolute satisfaction of, obligations honestly assumed in such dealings, if such transfer involves no fraud upon the rights of other creditors. The evidence in this case fails to show that the conveyances which are assailed were fraudulent as charged. It is alleged in the amendment to the bill that the Coosa Furnace Company was insolvent at the date of the execution of the mortgage, and has been insolvent ever since that time. Even if it could be conceded that the fact of insolvency, if proved, would create such a change in the relations between the directors and the creditors of the corporation as to take from the directors the right to allow one or more creditors to acquire an advantage over the other in the application of the corporate assets to the payment of debts, yet such concession could have no effect upon the result in this case, because the evidence wholly fails to show that the company was insolvent when the mortgage was made. It plainly appears that the company was insolvent 15 months after the date of the mortgage. Its property was then worth very much less than it cost. What it was worth at the time the mortgage was executed is not shown. It appears from the evidence that the value of furnace property is very fluctuating. The value of the company's assets at the date of the mortgage is not proved, nor is it shown that they were then worth less than the amount of the company's liabilities at that time. The inference that the company was insolvent at the date of the mortgage does not follow from the proof of insolvency more than a year afterwards. The insolvency of the company at the date of the deed does not affect the validity of that instrument, for the operation of the deed was merely to transfer, in absolute payment of a debt, property which had been conveyed as security therefor at a date when the corporation is not shown to have been insolvent.

The leasehold interest of the Coosa Furnace Company and the income from the leased property are assets of that insolvent corporation. It is shown that the Gadsden Iron Company has been receiving the output from the mines. It is not alleged or proved that the latter company has paid less for the ore than it was worth, and it is not shown that it is chargeable with fraud in the purchase thereof. The complainant, as a simple contract creditor without a lien, is seeking to reach the output from the mines, and to subject it to the payment of its demands. Its claim in this regard is a legal demand, which may be enforced by proceedings at law. There is no obstacle to hinder the complainant from reaching this property by legal process. The bill cannot be regarded as a creditors' bill, supported by the equitable demand for a settlement of the affairs of an insolvent corporation, as it is filed in behalf of the complainant alone, and not in behalf of itself and of other creditors, and for an administration of the assets and a ratable distribution among the creditors entitled to share therein. The bill is framed under the statute authorizing a creditor without a lien to file a bill in chancery to subject property fraudulently transferred or conveyed, or attempted to be fraudulently transferred or conveyed. Code, § 3544. As, in our opinion, the proof fails to sustain the charge that the transactions which are assailed were fraudulent, the conclusion is that the complainant is not entitled to relief. The decree to that effect must be affirmed.

ROOT v. JOHNSON.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—FORFEITURE—TENDER.

1. Where a land contract provides that the vendee shall pay "$15 cash, and balance, with interest from date, in quarterly installments of $10," the quarterly payments are $10 net, to continue until the entire amount with interest is paid.

2. Where a party to whom money is due on a contract declares that he will not receive it if tendered, actual tender is dispensed with, and tender in the bill for specific performance is sufficient.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; T. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Bill in equity by J. W. Johnson against Isaiah Root for the specific performance of a land contract. Plaintiff had decree, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant, Isaiah E. Root, agreed to sell a lot to the appellee, J. W. Johnson, to be paid for in installments. The agreement was in writing, was attached to the bill of complaint, and is as follows: "Received, April 19/86, of J. W. Johnson, fifteen dollars on a/c of a half-acre lot in Neil tract, next south of Elsie Tarver, and extending to west line of tract, or at right angle to the same, which I agree to sell to him for 100 dollars, payable fifteen dollars cash, and balance, with interest from date, in quarterly installments of 10 dollars each, with the condition that, if any payment agreed to be made is not made in a year from date agreed to be paid, all payments previous shall be forfeited to me for use of land, and I shall have the right to re-enter and take possession of the land, and this obligation shall be null and void. [Signed] ISAIAH E. ROOT."

A. A. Wiley and W. S. Thorington, for appellant. J. F. Holtzclaw, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The bill in this case was filed July 19, 1888. Its object is to enforce specific performance of an executory agreement, whereby Johnson purchased from Root a half-acre lot of ground lying near the city of Montgomery. The written agreement evidencing the sale, as set out in the reporter's statement of facts, bears date April 19, 1886, and was signed by Root, the seller. The price agreed on was $100,—$15 agreed to be paid and actually paid at the date of the contract; and the balance to be paid in quarterly installments of $10, until the whole purchase money, with interest, should be paid. It is contended for appellant that the $10 installments of the purchase money, agreed to be paid quarterly, were to be supplemented at each payment with the then accrued interest on the entire unpaid balance of the purchase money. This would increase the first payment—July 19, 1886—by three months' interest on $85, and require the addition of that interest—$1.70—to the $10 then demandable; and it is claimed this was and is the proper rule until the entire purchase money should be paid. This is not our interpretation of the contract. Its language is: "Fifteen dollars cash, and balance, with interest from date, in quarterly installments of 10 dollars." The "interest from date" refers to and qualifies the "balance" of the purchase money, and not the "10 dollars" installments. We hold that the quarterly payments required under the contract were $10 net, and to continue until the purchase money, with interest, should be paid in full. Under this interpretation, $10 were due at the end of every three months; the first to mature being July 19, 1886. The written agreement of sale contains "the condition that, if any payment agreed to be made is not made in a year from date agreed to be paid, all payments previous shall be forfeited to me for use of land, and I shall have the right to re-enter and take possession of the land." Forfeitures are not favorites in equity, and, unless the penalty is fairly proportionate to the damage suffered by the breach, relief will be granted when the court can give by way of compensation all that could be reasonably expected. 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 449. Johnson, the purchaser, paid $20 in December, 1886. This is admitted by Root. This paid the installments maturing in July and October of 1886, although not on the days they were demandable. It is also admitted that he paid $10 in August, 1887. This was in less than a year after the maturity of the installment of January 19, 1887. The next installment to mature would be April 19, 1887, and if a year after that was permitted to elapse without payment or tender of that installment, then, according to the letter of the contract, Johnson forfeited his purchase. Johnson testified that he tendered to Root $10, January 1, 1888, and that Root refused to receive it, claiming that the contract was forfeited. Meriwether testified that he heard Root admit such tender was made. Root denied that any tender was made, but his testimony and that of other witnesses tend to show he claimed a forfeiture long before the letter of the contract, under our interpretation, authorized such claim. The witnesses McDonald and Loveless tend to strengthen Johnson's version, and to weaken that given by Root. The judge of the city court, chancellor in this cause, reached the conclusion that the $10 were tendered to Root January 1, 1888, and the testimony does not convince us that he erred. This tender, as we have shown, was in time to prevent a forfeiture, under the most technical enforcement of the contract. The law does not exact the observance of a vain ceremony. The purpose of tender, in a case like the present, is to leave the seller without excuse for a non-compliance with his contract, and to cast on him the fault of its breach. When, before tender made, the party to whom money is due declares he will not receive it, or makes any declaration or demand which is equivalent to a refusal to accept the money if tendered, then actual tender is dispensed with. 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 593. It was sufficient in this case to tender payment in the bill. This renders it unnecessary that we should pass on the weight or credibility of the conflicting testimony bearing on the question of the alleged tender made by Johnson of the whole amount due before instituting this suit. Affirmed.

STATE ex rel. VIGNES v. JUDGE CIVIL DISTRICT COURT. (No. 10,933.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

AMENDMENT OF JUDGMENT.

A judgment which has been signed cannot be altered, amended, or revised by the judge who rendered the same, except in the manner provided by law. He cannot, on his own motion, change a judgment which has been so signed, notwithstanding it was signed in error, and was not the judgment orally given.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by Samuel Vignes for a writ of certiorari and prohibition to the judge of the civil district court to arrest a writ of fieri facias. Application granted.

Ker & Duvigneaud, for relator. J. N. Wolfson, for respondent.

MCENERY, J. The relator applies for a writ of certiorari and prohibition to arrest the execution of a writ of fi. fa. issued under a judgment which he alleges was never rendered by the court, in the suit of Legendre v. Vignes, on the docket of the civil district court for the parish of Orleans. In said case the district judge, on the final trial thereof, orally gave judgment for the plaintiff. The minutes showed this fact. The judgment which was signed by the judge in said case is as follows: "The court considering the law and the evidence to be in favor of defendant, and for the reasons orally assigned, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be judgment in favor of the defendant and against plaintiff, with costs." This judgment is not in accordance with the minutes, and is not the judgment orally given. The judge, several days after signing the decree, on his own motion, canceled the same, and signed another judgment or decree in accordance with the minutes of the court. Article 546 of the Code Practice requires the judge to sign all final decrees or judgments. This is absolutely essential to constitute a judgment. The minutes of the court, even if signed by the judge, are not sufficient to make the entries therein of decrees final and definitive. Hartwell v. Jumel, 30 La. Ann. 421. Article 547, Code of Practice, allows the court to make certain amendments, which are enumerated, before the judgment is signed. The judge can ex officio order a new trial to revise the judgment. Article 548 provides that "a judgment, when once rendered, becomes the property of him in whose favor it has been given; and the judge cannot alter same, except in the mode provided by law." The judge a qua was therefore without power to cancel the judgment, ex proprio motu, first signed by him in favor of defendant, and substitute another thereafter in favor of the plaintiff. Balio v. Wilson, 12 Mart. (La.) 360; Flint v. Cuny, 6 La. 69; Whipple v. Hartzberger, 11 La. Ann. 475; Factors' & Traders' Ins. Co. v. New Harbor Protection Co., 39 La. Ann. 583, 2 South. Rep. 407; State v. Banking Co., 7 Rob. (La.) 447. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the relief prayed for by relator be granted, and the rule herein be made absolute.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Von Hoven and husband against Jacob Von Hoven. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Henry P. Dart, for appellant. Benjamin R. Forman, for appellees.

MCENERY, J. This appeal was made returnable on the first Monday of May, 1891. On the 6th day of May a motion was made for an extension of time to file the transcript. Fifteen days were granted. The transcript was not filed until the 23d May. The record not having been filed within the time allowed by the law, nor within the further time granted by the court, the appeal must be considered as having been abandoned. The appellant is not entitled to the three days of grace following the return-day which has been extended. Code Prac. art. 590; Bienvenu v. Insurance Co., 28 La. Ann. 901; Insurance Co. v. BERTRON et al. v. STEWART et al. (No. 10,866.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Dec. 14, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

1. While it is true that, in the absence of any statute authorizing it, the authorities deny any efficacy to an appointment of an executor outside of the territorial jurisdiction within which it was granted; and that, if such executor desires to prosecute a suit in another state, he must first obtain a grant of administration therein in accordance with its laws,—yet exception must be therein taken to such executor's want of capacity, otherwise the court will be presumed to have acted on proper evidence of his capacity, and its judgment will not be annulled for want of jurisdiction of the court to render it.

2. In case the judgment debtor resides in a state different from that in which the decree was rendered, and it becomes necessary to institute proceedings for its revival, it is competent for the court of this state, in which the suit for revival is brought, to appoint a curator ad hoc, upon whom service can be made, and contradictorily with whom a judgment can be rendered. Such a suit is not an action in personam, but one quasi in rem, and the judgment therein pronounced will be binding upon the absentees.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Carroll & Carroll, for appellant W. R. Stewart. H. H. Bryan, curator ad hoc, for appellants. Morse & Titche, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. The object of this suit is to revive and continue the life of an antecedent judgment in which Ottilie Bertron, widow of Samuel R. Bertron, deceased, and William Hughes and Clara Purnell, widow, appear as the co-executors of the last will of the deceased as plaintiffs therein. The judgment sought to be revived is alleged to be one that was rendered in the late sixth district court of the parish of Orleans, and styled and entitled "Samuel R. Bertron v. Wm. R. Stewart and J. R. Powell," numbered 2,605 on the docket thereof. It is averred in the petition that said judgment was therein rendered in plaintiff's favor and against the two defendants in solido for the capital sum of $7,892.07, with 8 per cent. per annum interest thereon from the 7th of March, 1871, said judgment having been signed on the 22d of November, 1871; and that same, in principal and interest, remained unpaid. It is further averred that said suit was transferred to the docket of the civil district court of the parish of Orleans, and it was therein given the number 3,810, and therein said original judgment was duly and legally revived by a decree of revival duly signed on the 27th of March, 1882. It is further averred that plaintiffs are desirous of again having said original judgment revived, and its life prolonged; and, alleging that the two defendants and judgment debtors are citizens, at this time, of the state of Mississippi, they pray for due citation and the appointment of a curator ad hoc to represent said absentees, and for a decree of revival against them. This suit was filed on the 3d of February, 1890, and, on the day following, the defendant William R. Stewart was personally cited and served in the city of New Orleans; and on the 5th of same month an order was obtained appointing a curator ad hoc to represent both of the defendants. One citation was served on the curator ad hoc on the 6th of March, 1890, and another on the 17th of that month. On the last-named date a judgment by default was entered up against the defendant William R. Stewart. On the 28th of same month the curator ad hoc, representing both defendants, appeared, and filed an answer, in which he pleaded a general denial, and the prescription of 10 years, against the original judgment. On the 16th of April, 1890, the court a qua rendered a judgment decreeing the revival of the judgment originally rendered on the 17th of November, 1871, and signed on the 22d of November, 1871; and also the judgment reviving same, rendered on the 14th of March, 1882, and signed on the 27th of March, 1882. This judgment was duly signed on the 22d of April, 1890. Matters remained in statu quo until the 16th of August, 1890, when the plaintiffs sued out a garnishment proceeding against the New Orleans National Bank, accompanied by a fi. fa., whereunder they realised the sum of $485.12 as the property of William R. Stewart. On the 20th of April, 1891,—just within one year after the rendition of said final judgment,—the curator ad hoc applied for and obtained an order of appeal therefrom, and filed a bond of appeal. On the next day the defendant William R. Stewart—who had been personally cited and served, as stated, and against whom a judgment by default had been rendered—appeared by counsel, and moved to set aside said default, and for leave to file an answer; and he was permitted to do so. The averments of the answer of course are impertinent to the issues that are presented on the appeal, and so are those of the reconventional demand which is therein incorporated. In this court, same counsel for Stewart, joined by the curator ad hoc,—who, in the court below, represented both of the defendants, and from the judgment rendered appealed for both of them,—filed an assignment of errors, upon which they jointly demand the reversal of the said judgment of revival as to Stewart. The errors assigned are the following, viz.: First. Because, as to Powell, the plea of prescription should have been maintained. Second. Because, as to Stewart, the said judgment is null and void, same having been rendered contradictorily with a curator ad hoc, notwithstanding he had been theretofore personally served, and a tacit issue had been joined with him on a judgment by default. Third. Because the appointment of a curator ad hoc, service on Stewart through such curator ad hoc, a trial had contradictorily with such curator ad hoc, subsequently to said personal service on Stewart, rendered same, and also the judgment of revival thereon based, absolutely null and void. Thus, as to Powell, the case stands on the plea of 10 years' prescription, which is urged by the curator ad hoc, and in respect to Stewart it stands on the assignment of errors enumerated above.

1. As the plea of prescription turns upon the efficacy of the former judgment of revival, which was rendered and signed on 27th of March, 1882, it will be necessary to examine it first. The record shows that the original judgment was signed on the 22d of November, 1871. The suit for its revival was filed on the 2d of July, 1881, and on the same date an order was granted appointing a curator ad hoc to represent the two defendants, who were alleged to be, at that time, absentees, residing in the state of Mississippi; and service was regularly made upon the curator ad hoc on the 5th of same month and year. On the 14th of December, 1881, the curator ad hoc appeared, and filed an answer, pleading the general issue. All these proceedings appear regular and legal on their face. The suit for revival was filed, and the service regularly made, on the 5th of July, 1881, within the period of 10 years after the signing of the original judgment on the 22d of November, 1871, and thereby the prescription of the statute was interrupted quoad hoc. The present suit having been filed and service thereof made on the 4 h of February, 1890, —within 10 years after the signing of the former judgment of revival on the 27th of March, 1882,—the life of the original judgment was preserved and prolonged for an additional period of 10 years from the 22d of April, 1890. On the face of the papers the curator's plea of prescription was correctly overruled. We quote below article 3547, Civil Code, providing for revival of judgments: "All judgments for money, whether rendered within or without the state, shall be prescribed by the lapse of ten years from the rendition of such judgment: provided, however, that any party interested in any judgment may have the same revived at any time before it is prescribed, by having a citation issued according to law to the defendant or his representative, etc.; and, if such defendant be absent, and not represented, the court may appoint a curator ad hoc to represent him in the proceedings, upon which curator ad hoc the citation shall be served." The suits for revival appear to have been brought in strict conformity with the provisions of that article, and thereby the prescription thereof was interrupted.

2. In the printed argument several different causes of nullity in the two judgments of revival are assigned, which are not embraced in the answer of the curator ad hoc, nor in the assignment of errors. They are as follows, viz.:

First. The absolute nullity of the former judgment of revival, which was signed on the 21st of March, 1882.

(a) The want of capacity of the plaintiff to institute and prosecute that suit, and stand in judgment. The point made in argument under this head is that Ottilie Bertron alone instituted and prosecuted that suit to final judgment, in her capacity of testamentary executrix of the last will of her deceased husband, the judgment creditor of the defendants; that there are two other joint and co-executors of that deceased person; and all three of them had been thus appointed under the will of the deceased, which was duly admitted to probate in the proper court of the state of Mississippi, where the testator resided at date of his death; hence, being a foreign executrix, she was without right or authority to appear in the courts of the state of Louisiana for any purpose, under the authority of Noonan v. Bradley, 9 Wall. 399. Conceding the force and correctness of the views entertained by the supreme court in that case, and which were to the effect that, "in the absence of any statute, * * * all the authorities deny any efficacy to the appointment of an executor outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the state within which it was granted; and, * * * if he desires to prosecute suit in another state, he must first obtain a grant of administration therein, in accordance with its laws,"—and yet we cannot perceive how this doctrine is to avail the defendants at this time. In the court which had jurisdiction in that case, ratione materiæ et personæ, no objection to the plaintiff's capacity was taken then, and objection cannot be entertained now. Had such exception been formally tendered to the court on the hearing of the cause, the plaintiff could, in all likelihood, have exhibited her authority. From all that appears on the face of the record she was authorized, and there is nothing to induce us to doubt the judge's authority to render judgment on the averments of her petition.

(b) The fact that the defendants were not in the case personally served with citation; the court being without jurisdiction to try the cause and render judgment thereon contradictorily with a curator ad hoc, alone. The point made on the argument is that, for the purpose of such suit and judgment, substituted service was not due process of law, and unavailing, in so far as defendants were concerned. The judge, in appointing a curator ad hoc to represent the absentees in that case, acted on the express authority of article 3547 of the Civil Code, above quoted, which declares that, "if such defendant be absent, and not represented, the court may appoint a curator ad hoc to represent him in the proceedings, upon which curator ad hoc the citation shall be served." Reliance is placed on Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, and Laughlin v. Ice Co., 35 La. Ann. 1184. In our opinion this contention is erroneous. In Hammett v. Sprowl, 31 La. Ann. 327, our predecessors held that it was exclusively within the power of the court rendering the judgment "to enforce and to revive it;" and they further held that "a proceeding to revive a judgment [is] not a new suit, but simply a proceeding in the same suit to continue and keep alive a judgment rendered therein, and to furnish proof that it has not been satisfied or extinguished." To the same effect is their opinion in Succession of Patrick, 30 La. Ann. 1071, in which a suit to revive is denominated "the peculiar statutory action" provided for the continuation of judgments beyond their term of 10 years. Vide Lalane v. Payne, 42 La. Ann. 154, 7 South. Rep. 481. We had occasion recently to examine the question here presented, and decided it adversely to the contention of the defendants' counsel. Vide Young v. Upshur, 42 La. Ann. 362, 7 South. Rep. 557. In that case the controversy was in reference to the ownership of an undivided interest or share in a certain judgment rendered by this court on appeal from the parish of Tensas, in this state, the plaintiffs therein being citizens of the District of Columbia, and the case at the time being still pending and undecided in the supreme court on writ of error, and the suit in which the claim of an interest was made having been brought in the parish of Tensas, wherein the plaintiffs in the original suit were cited throug' a curator ad hoc. To that suit the exception was that such service as was made on the curator ad hoc was not due process of law, and failed to confer on the court jurisdiction thereof; but we held that the jurisdiction of this court was complete, and the judgment binding on the absentees, on the ground that the proceeding was not one in personam but one quasi in rem, "its object being to obtain judicial recognition and enforcement of a specific interest in tangible property in the parish of Tensas in this state," etc. In several similar cases we have recently maintained the jurisdiction of district courts as grounded on like service. Notably in Duruty v. Musacchia, 42 La. Ann. 357, 7 South. Rep. 555; McKenzie v. Bacon, 38 La. Ann. 765; and Robbins v. Martin, 43 La. Ann. 488, 9 South. Rep. 108. And one remark that was made in our opinion in the last-cited case—that "if, indeed, a non-resident cannot be brought into a court of this state in such a case, such a cause of complaint as that propounded by the plaintiff, though well grounded in our law, would be practically remediless,"—is strictly applicable to the exception taken in the case at bar. The grounds of nullity assigned are not well taken.

Second. The nullity of the judgment of revival from which the present appeal is prosecuted.

(a) Because of the variance between the party plaintiff in the former suit for revival and the parties plaintiff in the instant suit, and the incapacity of the present plaintiffs to recover judgment. Certainly, if Ottilie Bertron, executrix, was capacitated to institute suit, and stand in judgment in the former revival suit, the three joint co-executors are likewise capacitated so to do. The variance that is suggested is of no consequence whatever. It cannot fatally affect the judgment. What was said of the want of capacity in a foreign executor to bring suits in the courts of this state, in the preceding part of this paragraph, as appertaining to the former revival suit, is strictly applicable to the instant case. Neither objection is good.

(b) Because the judgment by default that was entered up against the defendant Stewart was never subsequently confirmed. That there was a judgment regularly rendered and signed there is no doubt. That the defendant Stewart was personally cited, and that there was also appointed a curator ad hoc to represent him as an absentee on whom service was made, cannot be denied. It is true that the judgment does not formally state that by reason of said default having been made final it was rendered and signed. But it is impossible for us to conceive the ground of defendants' complaint on that account, or to appreciate his objection of absolute nullity of the judgment; for if the judgment by default was, in effect, made final, he is without cause of complaint; and if it was not made final it was evidently abandoned, and judgment was rendered on the issue joined between plaintiff and the curator ad hoc on his answer. This, to our thinking, is the true state of the case. In either event the judgment is, to all appearances, valid.

3. It is not correct to say that the instant suit is one to revive the former judgment of revival. A suit to revive, as said in Hammett v. Sprowl, 31 La. Ann. 325, is not a new suit, but a new proceeding in the original suit. Its sole object is to legally and judicially interrupt prescription. Once the revival suit is brought to a termination by a judgment, its object is accomplished, and a 10-years lease of life is given to the original judgment. At the expiration of this lease a new revival suit must be brought in order to interrupt prescription, and give to the original judgment another 10-years lease of life. These two revival proceedings are separate and independent of each other, though having same object in view. Hence it was matter of no consequence that the former suit was brought in the name of one executrix, and the latter was brought in the name of three joint co-executors. The Code says expressly "that any party interested in any judgment may have the same revived at any time before it is prescribed." Rev. Civil Code, art. 3547. Under the authority of this article this court held in Martinez v. Succession of Vives, 32 La. Ann. 305, that any attorney at law entitled to only a contingent interest in a judgment for the payment of his fees had sufficient interest in it to authorize him to bring suit for its revival, and to revive the whole judgment, and not merely a restricted and limited interest in it. Our conclusion is that it was of no consequence to the defendants that one revival suit was brought by one executor, and the other by three co-executors. After a thorough study of this case, and a full examination of all its details, we are satisfied that the original judgment has been legally and properly revived and kept alive; that the defenses pleaded of prescription and nullity are not well grounded in law; and that the judgment appealed from is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Florida. Dec. 7, 1891.)

INSURANCE — ACTION ON POLICY — PLEADING — CHANGE OF INTEREST—PROOFS—WAIVER.

1. Where a plea to an action brought upon a policy of fire insurance is interposed alleging that no preliminary proofs of loss have been furnished by the assured according to the provisions of the policy requiring such proofs as a condition precedent to the right to sue thereon, a replication to such plea is bad that simply alleges "that proofs of loss were furnished on blank forms furnished to plaintiffs by defendant for that purpose," without alleging that the proofs so furnished were in accordance with the requirements of the policy; and a demurrer to such replication should be sustained.

2. G. and E. were partners in a general banking business, and as such partners were the sole owners of a house and the land upon which it was situated, which house they insured against loss by fire, the policy issued to them containing the following provision: "If the property be sold or transferred, or any change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance, it should render the policy void." After the issuance to them of the policy, but prior to the destruction of the property by fire, G. and E. admitted W. into their firm as a partner, upon a verbal agreement that he was to have no interest in the properties of the former firm, but a fixed interest only in the profits of the firm's business generally. Held, that this did not give to W. any interest in the insured property, nor work such change in the title, ownership, or possession of the property as would avoid the policy under the above-quoted provision therein.

3. Where the insurers, after receipt of proofs of loss, in a correspondence by letter repeatedly call upon the assured for further or more particular information as to the interest or ownership that a party named in the proofs has in the insured property, and in such correspondence and otherwise are silent as to any other defect in the form or substance of such proofs, and fail to call the attention of the assured to any other defect that may exist in the proofs furnished, such silence and failure of the insurers to call the attention of the assured thereto held to be a waiver on their part of any defect in such proofs not discovered by them to the assured; and held that, where the particular matter or information asked for in such correspondence is not requested to be furnished in verified form, such failure to request verification thereof is a waiver of that formality. Held, further, that the information asked for by letter, when supplied by letter, will be treated as supplementary to such proofs upon the particular subject to which they relate. Held, further, that such proofs of loss and letter correspondence supplementary thereto are admissible in evidence at the trial to establish the fact that the requirements of the policy as to the furnishing of preliminary proofs of loss have been complied with before institution of suit.

4. Where the assured inadvertently make an incorrect statement or mistake in the preliminary proofs of loss furnished to the insurers after loss, such statement or mistake may be afterwards corrected and explained by parol testimony at the trial of a suit upon the policy, where the same explanation or correction has been asked for by letter and given in substance by letter prior to the institution of the suit.

5. In the trial of a suit upon a policy of fire insurance an unverified estimate of the cost of replacing the destroyed property made by a party while in life, but at the time of the introduction of such estimate deceased, is inadmissible in evidence for any purpose; and the fact that the party who made such estimate is dead at the time the same is offered in evidence does not render such estimate admissible.

6. Where a policy of fire insurance contains the following provision: "In case differences shall arise touching any loss or damage after the proof thereof has been received in due form, the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to arbitrators indifferently chosen, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the liability of the companies, respectively, under this policy,"—held to be a valid and binding covenant, and that when the parties under its provisions have submitted the finding of the amount of such loss to such arbitration, they are mutually bound as to the "amount" of the loss by the award of the arbitrators, unless such award, under proper pleadings, is avoided for fraud or other matter legally recognizable as vitiative thereof, and that, unless so avoided, the assured are limited in their right of recovery to the amount so awarded.

7. The arbitration provided for under such provision in a policy of insurance does not undertake to oust the courts of their jurisdiction, and is not obnoxious to law. Neither is it necessary that such arbitration should be conducted in accordance with the statute. McClel. Dig. p. 105 et seq. Neither is it necessary, to make such award available, that the same should be accepted or acted upon in any way by the parties. Neither is it necessary, to render such award available as a defense in limitation of the amount of recovery, that the amount of such award should be paid or tendered. Such an award, when specially pleaded in limitation of the recovery sought for, is admissible in evidence upon the trial of a suit upon the policy.

8. It is error for the trial court in a charge to the jury to supply any fact from other facts adduced in evidence, but should leave every fact, and its establishment or non-establishment, to the determination of the jury alone.

9. Where a policy of insurance provides that the amount of the loss insured shall be due and payable 60 days after the furnishing by the assured of proofs of loss as provided by the policy, the assured are entitled to interest upon the amount of their recovery from a date 60 days after the furnishing by them of such proofs of loss.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Leon county.

Action by George Lewis, Edward Lewis, and William C. Lewis against the Hanover Fire Insurance Company to recover on a policy of insurance. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Motion for a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial directed.

W. A. Blount and Fred T. Myers, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Williams, for defendants in error.

TAYLOR, J. On the 15th of August, 1885, George Lewis, Edward Lewis, and William C. Lewis, styling themselves as partners under the firm name of B. C. Lewis & Sons, instituted their action in assumpsit in the circuit court of Leon county against the Hanover Fire Insurance Company, a corporation of the state of New York, having an agency at Tallahassee, in Leon county, for the recovery of one-half of the amount of a policy of insurance for $5,000, issued to them on April 18, 1882, by the Germania Fire Insurance Company and the Hanover Fire Insurance Company, as underwriters, wherein each of said companies, severally, each for itself, and not one for the other, became the insurers, for one-half the amount of said policy, for a term of three years; the said policy containing a covenant that in the event the assured had to resort to judicial proceedings to enforce their claims under said policy, it should not be necessary to proceed against each of the insurers, but that such action might be brought against either of said companies, and that the other should be bound and concluded by the result of such action in the same manner and to the same effect as if it had been prosecuted against each of them separately with the like result.

To the declaration in the cause the defendant company interposed five pleas, as follows: (1) Non assumpsit; (2) nil debet; (3) that the plaintiffs did not, before the institution of their suit, make and furnish to defendant proofs of their alleged loss in accordance with the requirements of the policy of insurance sued upon; (4) that subsequent to the issuance of the said policy of insurance, and before the occurrence of the said fire, there took place a change in the title and possession of the said property described in the said policy of insurance, in that the plaintiff William C. Lewis, who had no interest therein when the said policy was issued, became in part an owner thereof with the plaintiffs George Lewis and Edward Lewis, and entered into possession thereof with them before the said fire; (5) that if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendant, they are entitled to recover only the sum of $2,086.37½, with interest thereon, because the said plaintiffs and defendant, on the 10th day of April, A. D. 1885, submitted to an arbitration consisting of B. F. Langley and T. J. Rawls, together with a third person to be chosen by the said arbitrators, if necessary, the appraisal and estimate, at the then cash value, of the damage by the said fire to said property, which appraisal and estimate by them, or any two of them, in writing was to be binding on both parties as to the actual cash value of or damage to the said property, but without reference to any other question or matters of difference within the terms and conditions of the insurance, a copy of which said submission to arbitrators is hereto annexed marked "A," and made a part of this plea. And thereupon, to-wit, on the 11th day of April, A. D. 1885, the said Langley and J. M. Wilson, the third party chosen by the said arbitrators to determine with them the said question, did make, write, and deliver to the said plaintiffs and the defendant their award and appraisal in the premises, and by such award and appraisal did appraise and arbitrate the damage done by the said fire at the sum of $4,172.75.

To the first and second of these pleas the plaintiffs joined issue. To the third and fifth pleas the plaintiff demurred, which demurrer, upon subsequent argument, was overruled.

To the defendant's fourth plea the plaintiffs interposed a replication in avoidance of the defense of a change of title in the property insured anterior to the fire that is set up in the defendant's fourth plea. After the overruling of their demurrer to the third and fifth pleas of the defendant, the plaintiffs replied to the said pleas, as follows: "The plaintiffs, as to the third plea, say that they did make and furnish to defendant proofs of their loss on blank forms furnished to plaintiffs by defendant for that purpose, and were not, therefore, required to furnish other. The plaintiffs, as to the fifth plea, say that the so-called 'arbitration' was not in accordance with the statutes of this state in such cases made and provided, nor in accordance with the terms of the policy of assurance between plaintiffs and defendant, nor with the 'special agreement' for submission to two builders; that said two builders, nor either one of same, with a properly constituted umpire, have made 'no' award in accordance with said agreements; that the so-called 'award' has not been accepted, nor acted upon by either party, but was promptly repudiated by plaintiffs, and defendants so advised; that said agreement of submission was in no sense legal, just, or equitable, and had no binding force, in that its effect was to bind one party only to the prospective award; that one arbitrator was committed in favor of one party, and the umpire relied wholly upon the statements of the arbitrator or arbitrators, without personal knowledge and without testimony."

To this replication to the third plea the defendant demurred, and at the same time moved to strike out the replication to the fifth plea. Upon subsequent argument the demurrer to the replication to the third plea was overruled; but the motion to strike out the replication was granted.

At this stage of the proceeding, by leave of the court, the plaintiffs amended their declaration by striking out the name of William C. Lewis, as a party plaintiff, and by styling their suit "George Lewis and Edward Lewis, formerly partners under the firm name of B. C. Lewis & Sons," as plaintiffs. Upon this amendment of the declaration the defendant withdrew its first plea of non assumpsit, and pleaded the others over to the declaration as amended. The plaintiffs then filed a replication to the defendant's third plea, substantially the same that they before interposed to same, which replication was demurred to again by the defendant, and the demurrer again overruled, which ruling was erroneous. The demurrer of the defendant to the replication to defendant's third plea should have been sustained, for the obvious reason that the replication demurred to does not allege that proper proofs of loss were made by the plaintiffs and furnished to the defendant, or that proofs were thus made and furnished in compliance with the provisions for such proofs in the policy contained as one of the covenants therein, but simply alleges that "proofs of their loss were furnished to defendant by plaintiffs of blank form furnished to plaintiffs by defendant for that purpose," when the pith of the third plea, to which it was intended as a reply, was that no proofs "in accordance with the requirements of the policy sued upon" had been furnished. The replication does not dispute or take issue upon this assertion in the plea, but undertakes to side track the defense tendered by the plea, by substituting proofs made on a blank form for the proofs called for by the provisions of the policy. The proofs furnished as alleged in this replication, though filling up the blanks in a dozen set forms, may still have fallen far short of filling the requirements of the policy sued upon.

Upon defendant's fourth plea the plaintiffs joined issue. To the fifth plea the plaintiffs interposed a replication containing 26 numbered grounds of objection. Upon the filing of this replication the defendant moved the court to require the plaintiffs to elect the ground therein upon which they would rely, and to strike out the others. This motion seems, from the record, to have been "granted," and then by a subsequent order of the court it was specifically ordered that the ground of the replication "contending for a tender of the amount of the award set up in the fifth plea" should be stricken out. Afterwards the plaintiffs seemed to have abandoned their replication to the fifth plea, and filed a general joinder of issue thereon. This disposes of the pleadings in the case.

On the 20th of January, 1888, the cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $3,000. Motion for new trial was made and denied, and judgment for $3,000 entered against the defendant company, and from this judgment the case is brought here upon writ of error.

The errors assigned are as follows: (1) The overruling of defendant's demurrer to plaintiffs' replication to third plea; (2) the admission in evidence of the papers denied to be proofs of loss; (3) the admission of the testimony of Edward Lewis as to William C. Lewis' interest in the property insured; (4) the admission in evidence of the letters between plaintiffs and defendant; (5) the admission of the testimony of Edward Lewis as to whereabouts of T. J. Rawls; (6) the refusing to admit in evidence the arbitration and award between plaintiffs and defendant; (7) the giving of each and every of the special charges asked by the plaintiffs; (8) the refusing of each and every of the special charges asked by the defendant; (9) the refusing of defendant's motion for a new trial. These assignments will be considered in the order in which they come.

The first assignment has already been disposed of, and held to be error.

The 2d, 3d, and 4th assignments will be discussed together, as they raise the same or closely kindred questions. It seems that when the policy of insurance sued upon was issued, George Lewis and Edward Lewis alone composed the firm of B. C. Lewis & Sons, to whom the policy was issued, and that they alone, as such partners, at the time of the issuance of the policy, owned and held the legal title to the property covered by the policy. As testified to by Edward Lewis, subsequent to the issuance of the policy, but prior to the loss by fire, William C. Lewis was taken into the firm as a member thereof to share in the profits alone to a certain limited extent. It is contended for the plaintiff in error that this worked a change in the title, possession, interest, and ownership in the assured property, giving to the new partner, William C. Lewis, an interest therein to such an extent as to avoid the policy under the following covenant therein: "If the property be sold or transferred, or any change take place in title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance," it should render the policy void. In that clause of the policy providing for the furnishing of proofs in case of loss it is further stipulated, as follows: "If the interest of the assured be other than the entire and sole ownership, the names of the respective owners shall be set forth with their respective interests therein certified to by them." In the proofs of loss that were furnished to the defendant company after the fire, and that were subsequently, at the trial of the cause, admitted in evidence over the defendant's objection, we find the following statement sworn to by Edward Lewis and William C. Lewis: "The property insured belonged, at the time of the fire, to B. C. Lewis & Sons, a firm composed of George, Edward, and William C. Lewis, and at the time of effecting the insurance it belonged to B. C. Lewis & Sons, a firm composed of George and Edward Lewis." After the receipt of this proof of loss by the defendant company a correspondence, by letter, of considerable length was had between the insurers and assured, which letters were subsequently admitted in evidence over the defendant's objection. In the first of these letters, dated May 22, 1885, from the defendant to the plaintiffs, in which the receipt of the proofs of loss is acknowledged, no objection is raised to the form or sufficiency of the proofs furnished except that the plaintiffs are asked therein for information as to the "nature and extent of William C. Lewis' interest in the present firm of B. C. Lewis & Sons." To this the plaintiffs replied, under date of May 26, 1885: "W. C. Lewis, as stated in proof of loss, is a partner in our firm, having been admitted January 1, 1883, with a fixed share of profits." This did not seem to satisfy the defendant company, as they again wrote on May 29, 1885, to the plaintiffs, asking them to "state what share of the 'Glenwood' property was owned by William C. Lewis, as a member of the firm, at the time of the fire." To this the plaintiffs replied on June 2d: "W. C. Lewis had no interest in the Glenwood property, except as stated in our letter of 26th May." In none of this correspondence is the objection urged that the explanation of W. C. Lewis' connection with the property should be under oath; and in none of this correspondence is there any other objection or question raised with reference to the proofs of loss, either as to their form or substance. The plaintiffs, in reply to the inquiries of the defendant in relation to this matter, state distinctly that W. C. Lewis had no interest in the property, but was limited to a fixed interest in the profits of the firm's business. What further information could have been reasonably desired or given on the subject it is difficult for us to see. To have demanded more presents the appearance on the part of the defendant of a desire to quibble at straws. It was an error very natural to be made by men not expert in the nice distinctions growing out of the ownership of partnership properties to state, as was done in these proofs of loss, that the incoming partner, William C. Lewis, owned an interest in the insured property; but when the matter is drawn pointedly to their attention the true explanation is at once made, showing that he in reality has no interest in the property of the firm as originally composed, but only a fixed interest in the profits of the business generally. In the light of the explanation given by Edward Lewis in his testimony, as to the terms upon which William C. Lewis was admitted into the firm, we are of the opinion that he did not acquire any such interest in the property as would avoid the obligation of the defendant to pay the loss. In this case, according to the evidence of Edward Lewis, (and it is nowhere contradicted,) no written contract of partnership was gone into when William C. Lewis entered the firm. Nothing was done except to admit him to membership by a verbal agreement that he was to have a fixed interest only in the profits of the general business. With this testimony we are of the opinion that he did not acquire any such interest in this property as would defeat the right of George and Edward Lewis to recover upon this policy. In Lindley on Partnership (volume 1, p. 329) it is said that "the only true method of determining, as between the partners themselves, what belongs to the firm and what not, is to ascertain what agreement has been come to upon the subject. If there is no express agreement, attention must be paid to the source whence the property was obtained, the purpose for which it was acquired, and the mode in which it has been dealt with." To the same effect is Pars. Partn. § 366. Applying this test by getting from Edward Lewis, on the stand, the agreement between the partners here, the result is that William C. Lewis, on entering the firm, acquired no interest in its properties, but a prospective interest only in the profits of the business generally. Stumph v. Bauer, 76 Ind. 157. We do not think there was any error in admitting in evidence the proofs of loss furnished to the defendant, nor in admitting the correspondence that passed in reference thereto between the defendant and the plaintiffs, nor in permitting Edward Lewis, on the stand, to testify fully as to the status of William C. Lewis in the firm. The correspondence was directly pertinent to and explanatory of the only point in the proofs of loss to which the defendant excepted, and, not being demanded under oath, we think the requisite of being verified by oath must be held to have been waived. Marthinson v. Insurance Co., 64 Mich. 372, 31 N. W. Rep. 291; Insurance Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421; West v. Insurance Co., 27 Ohio St. 1; Ayres v. Insurance Co., 17 Iowa, 176. The part of Edward Lewis' evidence objected to was directly pertinent to the same point, and we think was clearly admissible. It amplified and explained fully William C. Lewis' status towards the insured property, the only apparent subject of contention between the parties as to the sufficiency of the proofs of loss; which explanation and correction of the proofs of loss, we think, was proper at the trial, and in accordance with law. Insurance Co. v. Huckberger, 52 Ill. 464; Insurance Co. v. Stevens, 48 Ill. 31; McMaster v. President, etc., 55 N. Y. 222; Hubbard v. Insurance Co., 33 Iowa, 325; Insurance Co. v. Schwenk, 94 U. S. 593; Maher v. Insurance Co., 67 N. Y. 283; Mosley v. Insurance Co., 55 Vt. 142; Willis v. Insurance Cos., 79 N. C. 285; May, Ins. § 465; 2 Pars. Cont. p. 461. The cases cited by the defendant's counsel in support of their contention all involved personal property, where the incoming partner was admitted to full partnership in the assets of the former firm, where those assets consisted entirely of personalty, and have no applicability to the question here.

The fifth assignment of error, we think, is well taken. The whereabouts of T. J. Rawls, or the question as to whether he was alive or dead, could not have any relevancy to any issue in this case; and we are at a loss to understand the object of the inquiry as to his whereabouts, unless it be, as is contended by defendant's counsel, an effort to make admissible as evidence at the trial an estimate of the items and cost of replacing the destroyed property, purporting to have been made by T. J. Rawls, deceased. Even for this purpose we do not think the inquiry as to his whereabouts was pertinent or proper, as the fact of his decease did not render any estimate on the subject made by him admissible evidence. Had he been alive, his estimate, to be proper evidence, would have to be verified by his oath; and the fact of his decease did not render his unverified estimate, made while in life, any more competent as evidence than if the same had been offered during his life-time.

The sixth assignment of error is well taken, and is fatal to the verdict and judgment in this cause. Incorporated in the policy sued upon, as one of the covenants therein, is the following provision: "In case differences shall arise touching any loss or damage, after proof thereof has been received in due form, the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to arbitrators, indifferently chosen, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the liability of the companies, respectively, under this policy." In pursuance of this provision, the insurers and insured, after the loss, entered into the following agreement in writing for submission of the sole question of "amount" of loss to two builders or arbitrators:

"New York Underwriters' Agency, composed of the Germania and Hanover Fire Insurance Companies, of New York. Special agreement for submission to two builders. It is hereby agreed by B. C. Lewis & Sons, of the first part, and the Germania and Hanover Fire Insurance Companies, of the city of New York, of the second part, (each acting for itself,) that B. F. Langley and T. J. Rawls, together with a third party to be chosen by them, if necessary, shall appraise and estimate at the true cash value the damage by fire on the 2d day of January, 1885, to the property belonging to B. C. Lewis & Sons, as specified below, which appraisement and estimate by them, or any two of them, in writing, as to the amount of such loss or damage, shall be binding on both parties; it being understood that this appointment is without reference to any other question or matters of difference within the terms and conditions of the insurance, and is of binding effect only so far as regards the actual cash value of or damage to such property covered by policy No. 20,195 of said companies, issued at the Tallahassee, Fla., agency. The property on which damage is to be estimated and appraised is the 2½-story frame building, with shingle roof, situate about seven miles north-east from Tallahassee, known as the 'Glenwood Property.' And it is expressly understood and agreed that said builders are to take into consideration the age, condition, and location of said premises previous to the fire, and also the value of the walls, material, or any portion of said building, saved; and after making an estimate of the cost of replacing said building a proper deduction shall be made by them for the difference (if any) between the value of a new or replaced building and the one insured. Said builders are hereby directed to exclude from the amount of damage any sum for previous depreciation from age, location, ordinary use, or any cause whatever, and simply to arrive at the damage actually caused by said fire. Witness our hands at Tallahassee, Fla., this 10th day of April, 1885.

[Signed] "B. C. LEWIS & SONS.
["] "GERMANIA & HANOVER FIRE INS. COS.,
"Per CHAS. C. FLEMING, Spl. Agt."

Then follows the oath of the said two builders, as follows:

"Declaration of Builders. State of Florida, county of Leon—ss.: We, the undersigned, do solemnly swear that we will act with strict impartiality in making an appraisement and estimate of the actual damage to the property of B. C. Lewis & Sons, insured by the Germania & Hanover Fire Insurance Companies, of New York, agreeable to the foregoing appointment, and that we will return to said company a true, just, and conscientious appraisement and estimate of damage on the same, according to the best of our knowledge, skill, and judgment. Witness our hands this 10th day of April, A. D. 1885.

[Signed] "B. F. LANGLEY,
["] "T. J. RAWLS.

"Subscribed and sworn before me this 11th day of April, A. D. 1885.

[Signed] "W. C. LEWIS,
"Notary Public."

Then follow the findings or award, signed by one of said builders and an umpire alleged to have been selected by them, to-wit:

"Award of Builders. To the Germania and Hanover Fire Insurance Companies, of New York: Having carefully estimated and appraised the damage by fire to the property of B. C. Lewis & Sons, agreeably to the foregoing appointment, we hereby report that, after having taken into consideration the age, condition, and location of the premises previous to the fire, and making proper deductions for the walls, materials, and portions of building saved, we have appraised and determined the damage to be four thousand one hundred and seventy-two 75-100 dollars, ($4,172.75.) Witness our hands this 11th day of April, 1885.

[Signed] "B. F. LANGLEY.
["] "J. M. WILSON."

This submission to arbitration and the award that followed were specifically set up as a special defense by the fifth plea of the defendant. This plea was demurred to by the plaintiffs, and the demurrer was overruled by the court, and the plea sustained as a valid defense; yet, afterwards, on the trial, when the defendant sought to substantiate its plea by introducing the agreement of submission and the award in evidence, its admission was refused by the court, unless it should also offer to introduce evidence that the amount awarded had been paid or tendered by the defendant to the plaintiffs, and this, too, after a replication to this plea had been held by the court to be bad, that contended for payment or tender of the amount awarded before the award could be available as a defense.

Ever since the decision in 1853 in the house of lords, by COLERIDGE, J., of Avery v. Scott, 8 Exch. 499, it has been uniformly held in England and in this country that provisions like this in a policy of insurance for the ascertainment and settlement of the amount of loss or damage by submission to arbitrators are proper, legal, and binding on the parties, and do not fall within that class of arbitraments that undertake to oust the courts of their jurisdiction, and that are therefore obnoxious to the law. Wolf v. Insurance Co., 50 N. J. Law, 453, 14 Atl. Rep. 561; Gauche v. Insurance Co., 4 Woods, 102, 10 Fed. Rep. 347; Adams v. Insurance Co., 70 Cal. 198, 11 Pac. Rep. 627; Trott v. Insurance Co., 1 Cliff. 439; Zallee v. Insurance Co., 44 Mo. 530,—in which it is held that such a submission is not, in the accepted legal sense of the term, a submission to arbitration, but merely an appraisal, and that it was not necessary to have the appraisers sworn. Elliott v. Assurance Co., L. R. 2 Exch. 237; Howard v. Railroad Co., 24 Fla. 560, 5 South. Rep. 356. The parties in this case, in pursuance of this valid and binding provision in the policy here sued on, entered into a solemn written compact submitting the matter of the "amount" of the loss or damage to two arbitrators or appraisers of their own choosing, with power in them to choose a third as umpire in case of their failure to agree. The appraisers thus chosen have awarded or fixed the amount of the loss at $4,172.75. Why the assured are not bound by their agreement of submission and this award that followed we cannot comprehend from anything exhibited in the record. It is true that promptly after the rendition of the award they notified the insurers of their determination not to abide the same; but parties cannot thus arbitrarily rid themselves of the binding force and effect of their solemn contracts. By this award they were bound, and to the amount awarded were they limited in their right to recover, unless they could have shown under proper pleading such fraud or other matter as would in law have avoided the same. Burchell v. Marsh, 17 How. 344. In the record here there is not one scintilla of evidence even tending or attempting to show either irregularity, unfairness, or fraud in the procurement of this submission or in its conduct or result, and we must, consequently, hold that, in the absence of any such circumstances to avoid it, it is bind ing as to the extent of the loss on the assured as well as upon the insurers. Such submission does not come within the catalogue of arbitraments provided for in our statute, (McCle. Dig. p. 105 et seq.,) and need not have been conducted in accordance with the statute. Neither was it necessary that the award of the appraisers, touching such special question submitted to them, should have been accepted or acted upon in any way by the respective parties; neither was the agreement to submit such special question to arbitration a unilateral undertaking binding only on one of the parties thereto; because, upon the face of that covenant, in the policy sued upon that makes provisions for the appraisement of the amount of the loss, and also in the subsequent agreement submitting said special question to two builders, it is expressly stipulated that the findings of such arbitrators as to the amount of the damage should be binding on both parties. Hence, if, after such ascertainment of the amount of the loss, it should be found that the insurers were legally liable for such loss, they at once became bound for the "amount" ascertained and awarded by such arbitrators. The fact that the amount thus fixed by the arbitrators was not paid or tendered has nothing to do with the question whatever. Both in the policy and in the subsequent submission to the appraisers the liability of the insurers was expressly excepted and reserved from the consideration of said arbitrators. The naked question submitted to them was: What is the amount of the damage here? Whether the insurers were legally liable, or obligated to pay that loss, was not submitted to them, and did not enter into their sphere of inquiry, nor into their award, and depended upon the settlement of divers other independent circumstances and conditions growing out of the contract between the parties. As before stated, the refusal of the court below to admit in evidence this agreement for submission to arbitration and the resultant award, under the objection apparently urged, was fatally erroneous. By that award, until avoided in some legally recognized way, each one of the underwriting companies, in the event of their legal liability for the loss, was obligated for one-half part of the amount thereof, $4,172.75. But one of the companies is sued here, and the verdict against it is for $3,000, which we find to be considerably in excess of one-half part of the amount of the award, by which the parties were bound, and to which they were limited in a recovery.

The seventh assignment of error is the giving of each and every of the instructions given by the court to the jury of the court's own motion, and those requested by the plaintiffs, but in the briefs of counsel this assignment seems to have been abandoned, except as to the instruction lettered "E," which is as follows: "The letter of the defendant acknowledges receipt of proofs of loss as of May 20, 1885. The interest, then, in the event of your finding for the plaintiffs, begins to run from July 20, 1885." This instruction, we think, was erroneous. It dealt too strongly with the facts, and supplied in reality a fact itself; that is, the exact date from which interest began to accumulate in the event of a recovery by the plaintiffs. The jury are the sole judges of facts, and they alone determine the establishment or non-establishment of every material fact in a cause. Had this instruction directed them that the plaintiffs were entitled to interest, in the event of their recovering, upon the amount of the recovery from a date 60 days after the furnishing of proofs of loss, and left it to the jury to determine whether proofs of loss had been furnished or not, and when, it would have been a proper charge. But, in view of the absence of any conflict of evidence as to the time when the defendant received the proofs of loss, we do not think the giving of this charge could be held to be reversible error. The other instructions given and excepted to counsel have ignored in their briefs, and consequently we will treat them as abandoned.

The eighth assignment of error is the refusal of the court to give nine instructions requested by the defendant. After what has been said upon the various questions arising in this case we do not deem it necessary to discuss this assignment further than to say that the court below, upon another trial, can conform its rulings upon the questions raised by said refused instructions to the views and opinions herein expressed.

The ninth assignment of error, the refusal to grant a new trial, it follows from what has been said, must be sustained. A new trial should have been granted.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, with instructions that a new trial be awarded.

REYNOLDS v. REYNOLDS et al. (No. 10,863.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Nov. 16, 1891. 43 La. Ann.)

PARTITION—RIGHT TO DEMAND—APPEAL—WAIVER.

1. The right of co-owners of property to demand a partition thereof is absolute, and, where the co-ownership is admitted, appeal does not lie from a simple decree of partition.

2. When, besides admitting co-ownership, the parties have consented to the method and terms of partition fixed in the decree, they had nothing left subject to appeal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Suit by Mary Reynolds against William Reynolds and others for partition. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Dismissed.

A. L. Tissot and E. J. Meral, for appellants. Joseph Brewer, Gilbert L. Hall, and Farrar, Jones & Kruttschnitt, for appellee.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

FENNER, J. The motion is based on two grounds, viz.: (1) That the judgments are interlocutory, and not in their nature appealable; (2) that they were rendered by consent of appellants. The record discloses a simple suit for partition, by one owner against her co-owners, of certain designated property held in common between them. The answers of defendants admit the fact of co-ownership, and, two of them being minors, their tutor prayed that, in case of a decree for partition by licitation or sale, the right be reserved to a family meeting on behalf of his wards to advise as to terms and conditions of sale. A decree of partition by licitation was rendered, reserving the fixing of the terms and conditions until after the convocation of a family meeting in behalf of the minors. After the rendition of this decree the minors were duly emancipated, and thereupon a rule was taken on defendants to show cause why the terms of sale should not be fixed by the court. On this rule judgment was rendered, which recites that it was made "upon the consent of all parties given ore tenus in open court," and which orders that the sale "be made for cash to the highest bidder, and the judgment on this rule do stand as supplementary to the said judgment and decree of March 19, 1891. From the two judgments the defendants appeal. What standing have they in this court? Plaintiff's co-ownership being admitted, her right to demand a partition was absolute. Civil Code, art. 1289. It was long since held that appeal did not lie from a simple decree of partition between co-owners. Stokes v. Stokes, 6 Mart. (N. S.) 350. If the case involved a controversy as to the fact of co-ownership, or as to the mode of partition, possibly, under some circumstances, appeal might lie. But where, as in this case, the co-ownership is admitted, and when the method and terms are settled by consent of all, it seems very clear there can be no room for appeal. The appellants have favored us with no defense of their position, and we see none. Appeal dismissed.

Succession of ALLEN. (No. 10,822.)

RIGHT TO APPEAL—REMAND.

In appeals by third persons, not parties to the judgment in the court below, when the facts on which the right of appeal is based have not been established, and are denied by appellee, the case will be remanded to the lower court to try that issue.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Special Judge.

Kernan & Laycock and Fergus Kernan, for appellants. Henry C. Miller, for appellee Mrs. Nora K. Allen.

FENNER, J. The appellants claim to be heirs of the decedent, Allen, and appeal, as third persons, from a judgment rendered in the court a qua recognizing his widow as sole heir, and putting her in possession of the estate, to which judgment the appellants were not parties. Their interest in the proceeding and their right to appeal are based on their allegation of heirship, which is based on no proof save the ex parte affidavit of one of them attached to the petition of appeal in the lower court, and verifying the facts therein alleged. The appellee has filed a formal answer to the appeal in this court, in which she denies that appellants are relations or heirs of the deceased, or have any interest whatever to maintain an appeal. The jurisprudence of this court settles, beyond dispute, the course to be pursued in such a case. If a third person appeal, and the facts on which his right of appeal is based be denied, the case will be remanded to try that issue. Hermann v. Smith, 6 Mart. (N. S.) 161; Oakley v. Philips, Id. 306; Taylor v. Jeffries, 10 La. 438; Désormes v. Désormes, 15 La. 15; Succession of Henderson, 2 Rob. (La.) 391; Succession of Lauve, 6 La. Ann. 529; Succession of Bailey, 24 La. Ann. 486. These authorities are not controverted or overruled by those cited by appellant, viz.: Payne v. Ferguson, 23 La. Ann. 581, and Cooley v. Cooley, 38 La. Ann. 197. In the first, the allegation that appellant was a creditor was sustained by an authentic copy of his judgment annexed to his petition. In Cooley's Case there was no denial that appellant was a creditor, but merely a denial of his right of appeal as a legal consequence of his being a creditor. We find some difficulty in understanding the object of this appeal, or how the judgment appealed from practically aggrieves appellants, since they were not parties thereto, and it cannot operate as res judicata against them. Sue v. Viola, 2 La. Ann. 996; Williams v. Trepagnier, 4 Mart. (N. S.) 343; Young v. Cenas, 1 Mart. (N. S.) 308. If, however, they are heirs, and desire to annul this judgment by appeal, we cannot controvert their right to appeal. But they must first establish their right and interest. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that this cause be remanded to the lower court, with direction to the judge to hear testimony as to the heirship of appellants and their right to appeal.

GIBSON v. J. SNOW HARDWARE CO.

EVIDENCE OF AGENCY — SALE TO PRINCIPAL—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—ESTOPPEL.

1. In an action for materials furnished defendant for her building, plaintiff company adduced evidence that for some time it had sold goods to defendant's son, and that defendant had paid for the same; that the son prepared the specifications for the building, and superintended its erection; that the son directed plaintiff to let the contractor have whatever was needed, stating that defendant would pay therefor; that the goods were charged to the defendant; that a statement of a part of the account was presented to defendant, and paid by her; that afterwards plaintiff presented two accounts against defendant,—one for the building, and one individual of $20,—and defendant paid $100, with direction to satisfy the individual debt, and apply the balance to the building account; that during its construction defendant was much about the building, and knew that plaintiff was supplying the material. Held, that the evidence was admissible to establish the son's agency.

2. There being evidence before the jury that the son was defendant's agent, it was competent to prove all his acts in the transaction, including his declaration that he was defendant's general agent.

3. As the question before the jury was whether the son was acting as defendant's agent, it was competent for plaintiff to show that it acted in strict compliance with the son's orders, since, if the jury found no agency, such evidence would impose no obligation on defendant.

4. The fact that some of the material was delivered to a workman under the contractor is no defense, since, if the agency was established, and pursuant to his instructions the contractor selected the material, the delivery to the workman to be carried to the building had no different effect on the account than a delivery to the contractor.

5. It was immaterial that defendant had paid the contractor for the material, since, if the son was authorized to bind defendant for the same, her payment to another could not affect plaintiff.

6. One who by his conduct had justified the belief of a third party that the person assuming to be his agent was authorized to do what was done, is estopped from denying such authority.

7. Where the evidence was conflicting on every material point, it was proper to refuse to instruct the jury: "If the jury believe the evidence, you must find for defendant."

8. A request to charge which singles out the evidence of a certain witness, and demands a verdict if the jury believe such witness, was properly refused. Evans v. Railway Co.; 78 Ala. 341, followed.

9. In an action for the price of a bill of hardware sold defendant for use in a certain building, it was error to admit evidence of the amount of such material necessary for the construction of such building.

Appeal from circuit court, Tuscaloosa county; J. C. SPRATT, Judge.

Action by the J. Snow Hardware Company against F. L. B. Gibson for the price of a bill of hardware. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

All the facts, as well as the rulings of the court upon the evidence, to which exception was taken and assigned as error in this court, are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The plaintiff requested the court to give the following written charges: (1) "It is not true that one who deals with a general agent is bound to know the extent of his authority; but if the plaintiffs show that John Brady was Mrs. Gibson's general agent in building the opera-house, they would have a right to deal with him in regard to matters connected with the opera-house, without inquiring the exact extent of his authority." (2) "When one without objection suffers another to do acts which proceed upon the ground of authority from him, or by his conduct adopts and sanctions such acts after they are done, he will be bound thereby, although no previous authority exists. If he has justified the belief of a third party that the person assuming to be his agent was authorized to do what was done, he is estopped from denying it." The court gave each of these charges, and the defendant separately excepted thereto. The defendant then requested the court to give the following written charges, and separately excepted to the court's refusal to give each of them as asked: (1) "If the jury believe the evidence, they must find for the defendant." (2) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to establish the general agency of John G. Brady for the defendant." (3) "The court charges the jury that there is no evidence in this case that John G. Brady was the general agent of Mrs. Gibson." (4) "The court charges the jury that, if they believe the evidence, Mrs. Gibson, the defendant, cannot be made to pay for the goods ordered by G. W. Allen from the J. Snow Hardware Co." There was judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings this appeal, and assigns the various rulings of the court as error.

Tipton Bradford and Foster & Oliver, for appellant. Foster & Jones, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. This action is prosecuted by the J. Snow Hardware Company against Mrs. Gibson for the price or value of materials alleged to have been supplied to her to be used, and which were used, in the construction of an opera-house in the city of Tuscaloosa. Several witnesses testified that the items of the account were all used in the erection of the house, while one witness for the defendant, John Brady, who was the architect, and superintended the erection, deposed that "the account [sued on] is not correct, as there are several overcharges and charges for material that never went into the construction of the opera-house," etc.; going on to specify certain material and articles charged on the account which were not received for or used in the building. We have nothing to do with the weight of the evidence on the respective sides of this issue. Suffice it for us that there was some evidence upon either hand, thus making the question one for the jury. Going to this issue, the plaintiff was allowed to prove the size of the house, the value or amount of material necessary to its construction, and the value of the labor put upon it, against defendant's objection. This evidence would probably tend to induce the mind of a layman to the conclusion that all the material charged for was supplied, since that amount of material, or even more, was needed in the building. Hence we cannot affirm that, if the ruling of the court was erroneous, it involved no injury to the defendant. That it was erroneous is, we think, clear. We are unable to see how the fact that more material than plaintiff claims to have sold could have been used in the construction of the opera-house can have any legitimate tendency to prove that all the material charged for and specified in the account sued on was in truth sold and delivered to the defendant, and used in the building. This would be to prove a sale by evidence of the vendee's necessities, or his ability to utilize the thing alleged to have been sold. The testimony ought to have been excluded.

2. The inquiry of final importance in the case appears to be whether, in legal contemplation, John Brady was the agent of the defendant in the purchase of the materials which went into the building of the opera-house. There is no direct evidence that he was, since his own declaration to that effect cannot, standing alone, be looked to. But the evidence on the part of the plaintiff goes to show that it had been selling goods to Brady for his mother, Mrs. Gibson, "ever since it had been in business, and that she had always paid for goods so sold." It was in evidence also that Brady had prepared the plans and specifications for the opera-house; that he was superintending its erection, seeing that the plans were executed, and the specifications complied with, and in some instances changing the same; and that he was constantly about the building supervising the work, etc. It also appeared upon one aspect of the testimony that at the commencement of the building, before, indeed, the work had been begun, he directed the plaintiff to let Allen, the contractor, have whatever was needed in the erection of the opera-house, and told the company's officers that his mother would pay for material so furnished; and that upon this direction and assurance the company, beginning about December 1, 1888, supplied between that time and March 18, 1889, the goods set out in the account sued on; that all these goods were charged to Mrs. Gibson; that on January 1, 1889, when the account amounted to about $375, a statement of it, showing that the credit was given to her, and the charge made against her, was presented to Mrs. Gibson for payment, paid by her without objection, and the statement kept by her, and produced on the trial. It further appears from plaintiff's evidence that on March 4, 1889, Mrs. Gibson had two accounts on its books, one known as the "opera-house account," and the other as her "individual account," the latter being for less than $20; and that on that date she paid plaintiff the sum of $100, with direction to satisfy the individual indebtedness, and apply the balance to the payment of the opera-house account. Then, too, it appeared that she was much about the opera-house during the time plaintiff was delivering the material there, and had in consequence abundant opportunity to know that the company was supplying such material, and that she received the benefit of the material in the erection of the opera-house. Now, these facts—the previous dealings by her with the plaintiff through Brady as her agent, Brady's connection with the building of the opera-house, her frequent presence there during these transactions, the payments by her on plaintiff's account for the materials furnished, with full knowledge that that account was made out against her, and without, at least in the first and main instance, any objection—were all proper to go to the jury as evidence of the agency of Brady; that the goods and wares, so supplied, went into the construction of her house and to her benefit; and, unexplained or unqualified, it cannot be doubted they were amply sufficient to authorize the jury to find the existence of the agency and hold her liable accordingly. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 437, 438; Scott v. Railroad Co., 4 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 114; Herring v. Skaggs, 73 Ala. 446; Bearce v. Bowker, 115 Mass. 129; Tabler v. Sheffield Land, Iron & Coal Co., 87 Ala. 305, 6 South. Rep. 196; Railroad, etc., Co. v. Cheatham, 85 Ala. 292, 4 South. Rep. 828; Manufacturing Co. v. Belgart, 84 Ala. 519, 4 South. Rep. 400.

8. All those facts being properly before the jury, it was, of course, open to the defendant to overcome the evidence tending to establish them, either by evidence in flat contradiction and denial, or by way of explanation and qualification, going to rebut the inferences apparently afforded by the testimony in chief that Brady was her agent. Whether the evidence thus offered by the defendant in denial of her knowledge that plaintiff was furnishing the material and charging it to her, and in denial of Brady's authority to bind her, and in explanation of the payments made by her, so as to deprive her acts in that regard of any probative force in establishing a ratification by her, was sufficient to overcome the case made by the plaintiff, was manifestly a question for the jury. Upon the issue thus presented the triers of fact were at liberty to reach either of the two possible conclusions,—that Brady was or that he was not the agent of Mrs. Gibson in and about the erection of the opera-house and the purchase of materials therefor. The jury having before them the evidence upon which it was competent to find the fact of such agency, it was, of course, not only proper, but essential, that evidence of Brady's direction to plaintiff to supply the material and assurance that his mother would pay for it should go to them to be looked to, in the event they found that Brady was her agent, for the purpose of ascertaining, declaring, and enforcing the obligation Mrs. Gibson took upon herself through him. Nay, more, there being evidence before the jury tending to prove the agency or to make out a prima facie case thereof, it was then competent to prove all the acts and declarations of Brady in and about the business,—and, among the rest, his declaration that he was defendant's general agent,—and submit it all to the jury. Mechem, Ag. § 107; Reynolds v. Collins, 78 Ala. 94; Martin v. Brown, 75 Ala. 442.

4. We conceive of no plausible ground for defendant's objection to the testimony of the officers and employes of the plaintiff corporation that, acting upon the order of Brady and in strict consonance with it, they sold the material needed in the construction of the opera-house on the credit of Mrs. Gibson, and charged it to her account. If the jury found that Brady was her agent, this was necessary to fix her liability; and, if they found that Brady was not her agent, these facts would not tend to impose any obligation upon her.

5. The objections to charges and evidence which proceed on the idea that, assuming Brady's agency, defendant is liable for goods delivered into the hands of McLester and other employes of Allen at the opera-house are equally without merit. Brady's order was for the delivery to Allen of such material as should be needed in the erection of the house, on the credit of Mrs. Gibson. This was, of course, on the assumption that Brady was her agent, as if Mrs. Gibson in person had directed the furnishing of such supplies as Allen should need for the purpose in hand, thus lodging the discretion of selection in Allen. Nothing to the contrary appearing, it is to be taken that the wares were to be supplied at the market prices. The price thus being determined upon, and the selection of articles being made by Allen, his employes were not agents at all; no discretion was lodged in them; no confidence was involved in the service they performed in merely fetching to the opera-house articles selected by their master, and to be charged to Mrs. Gibson at prices before in effect agreed upon. They were mere servants performing manual service; and the goods delivered to them to be carried to the opera-house, and so carried, stand in no different aspect in this account than had they been carried by Allen's own hand. Mechem, Ag. § 2.

6. Nor was there error in excluding the testimony of Mrs. Gibson to the effect that she had paid Allen for the material charged in the account sued on. That fact could exert no influence on this case in any aspect. If Brady was her agent, and had authority to bind her to the payment of the account to the J. Snow Hardware Company, palpably payment by her to Allen or anybody else would not avoid her liability to plaintiff; and, if Brady was not her agent, she would not be liable to plaintiff, whether she had paid to Allen or not. The inquiry was foreign to the case, and properly eliminated from it. Agencies are of three classes,—universal, general, and special. "A universal agent is one authorized to transact all of the business of his principal of every kind; a general agent is one who is employed to transact all of the business of his principal of a particular kind or in a particular place; a special agent is one authorized to act only in a specific transaction." Mechem, Ag. § 6; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 348 et seq. "A special agency properly exists when there is a delegation of authority to do a special act." Story, Ag. § 17. "A special agent is one authorized to do one or two special things." 1 Ross, Cont. 41. "A special agent is appointed only for a particular purpose, and is invested with limited powers." Chit. Cont. 285. In the case at bar there was not only the declaration of Brady that he was Mrs. Gibson's general agent, but other evidence from which the jury might have inferred that he represented her generally in making purchases, or, at least, that he was her agent for all purposes in respect of the opera-house, including the making of the contract with Allen, the purchasing of material, the supervision of the work, changing of plans and specifications, etc. This would, in our opinion, constitute him her general agent with respect to that enterprise, if the jury found the facts in line with these tendencies of the evidence, having authority to do not "one or two special things," not "a single act" merely, but all acts necessary to the consummation of the enterprise in hand. And the court's charge to the jury at plaintiff's instance, that "one who deals with a general agent is not bound to inquire as to the extent of his authority with respect to the matter of the agency, and that, if the plaintiffs show that John Brady was Mrs. Gibson's general agent in building the opera-house, they [it] would have a right to deal with him in regard to matters connected with the opera-house, without inquiring the exact extent of his authority," was pertinent to the evidence adduced, and a correct exposition of the law applicable to it. Coffin Co. v. Stokes, 78 Ala. 372; Mechem, Ag. §§ 283–287.

9. It is an elementary principle, correctly stated in the second charge given for plaintiff, that one who by his conduct has justified the belief of a third party "that the person assuming to be his agent was authorized to do what was done, is estopped from denying" such authority. Mechem, Ag. §§ 83, 84.

10. What we have said will suffice to determine defendant's exceptions to the refusals of the court to give the first, second, and third charges asked by her against the appellant. The evidence was in conflict on every material point in the case, and hence charge 1 was properly refused. There was evidence that Brady was Mrs. Gibson's general agent in respect of the building of the opera-house, and hence charge 3 was bad. Whether this evidence was sufficient to establish the fact was a question for the jury, and not for the court, and therefore charge 2 was properly refused.

11. Charge 4 asked by defendant singles out the evidence of a named witness, and demands a verdict if the jury believe her. Instructions of this character have been expressly condemned by this court, as giving undue prominence to the testimony of the particular witness. Evans v. Railway Co., 78 Ala. 341. For the error committed in allowing evidence of the size, etc., of the opera-house to go to the jury, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WEEDON et al. v. CLARK.

CERTIORARI TO JUSTICE COURT—EXECUTION AGAINST SURETIES—CLAIMS BY THIRD PARTIES.

1. The issuance of execution against sureties on a forfeited claim-bond by a justice of the peace does not operate as a judgment; and under Code, § 3405, providing that cases brought to the circuit court by certiorari from judgments of justices of the peace must be tried de novo, such action of the justice was properly ignored.

2. The claimant of a mule levied upon under execution testified that he told his son to take it in payment of a debt; that he replied he would do so; that the mule was not delivered at the time, nor taken off the farm, where his son was employed; and that nothing more was said about it until after a levy on the mule as the property of a third party, when he delivered the mule to his son, and charged him with it. Others testified that claimant said before the levy that the mule was not his, but his son's, but this claimant denied. Held, that it was improper to instruct the jury that claimant's offer and the son's acceptance of the mule divested claimant of property therein, since there was evidence from which the jury might have found that there had been no delivery.

Appeal from circuit court, Henry county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

William F. Clark made a claim-bond for a mule levied upon under execution issued on a judgment recovered by Weedon & Dent against Warren G. Clark, and a trial of the right of property was had before a justice of the peace on the 24th day of October, 1888. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs and against claimant, condemning the property as the property of the defendant and liable to the execution. An appeal was taken by claimant to a jury; whereupon a jury was impaneled, and a trial had, and they also rendered judgment for plaintiffs and against claimant, condemning the property as liable to the execution. No appeal was taken after the expiration of 10 days, and, the claimant having failed to deliver the property to the constable, he indorsed the claim-bond "Forfeited," and returned same to the justice. Thereupon, on November 24, 1888, the justice entered up the summary judgment on the forfeited claim-bond, and issued execution thereon against the claimant and the other obligors on the claim-bond. This execution was stayed by a writ of supersedeas issued by the probate judge of Henry county. A writ of certiorari was issued at the same time, removing the proceedings to the circuit court for review, both writs being issued on the petition of William F. Clark. The circuit court refused to grant plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the supersedeas, and affirm the summary judgment, and give judgment accordingly; but, against plaintiffs' objection and protest, proceeded to a trial de novo of the original claim suit, ignoring the summary judgment on the forfeited claim-bond upon which the superseded execution had issued. Proceeding, then, to the trial de novo of claim suit, plaintiffs proved that Warren G. Clark, the defendant in execution, bought the mule Kate in Eufaula in the early part of 1887, and owned her and made a crop with her for 1888. Thereupon the claimant, William F. Clark, testifying in his own behalf, stated that he was the father of Warren G. Clark, the defendant in execution; that, several weeks before the execution was levied on the mule Kate, he had purchased her from Warren G. Clark by taking her in full satisfaction of a debt due him from said Warren G. Clark; that the amount paid for her was $130; that soon thereafter, and before the levy of the execution, he owed another son, Morgan Clark, $130 for services rendered; that he told Morgan that, if he wished, he could take the mule in satisfaction of that debt; that Morgan replied, "All right, he would do so;" that at the time the mule was in his (the claimant's) lot, and was not taken therefrom by Morgan, or delivered to him; that Morgan at the time was in his employ, acting as overseer and general manager of the farm, and lived with him on the farm; that nothing more was said about it until the end of the year, and after the levy of the execution, at which time he and Morgan had a settlement, and in the settlement Morgan was charged with the mule, $130, and it was delivered to him at that time; and that after he was cast in the claim suit in the justice's court Morgan put in a claim to the mule Kate, and he went on Morgan's claim-bond as security. At the time of the levy of the execution the mule was in claimant's possession. Plaintiffs then introduced one J. F. Phillips, who testified that before the execution was levied he heard claimant say the mule was Morgan's property; also one T. W. Malone, who testified that after the levy and trial in the justice's court he heard claimant declare the mule Kate was not his property, but was Morgan Clark's. But claimant, testifying again for himself, denied having made either the Phillips or Malone statement. The court refused plaintiffs' requests for the following written charges: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that, prior to the time at which the claimant put in his claim to the property, he owed Morgan Clark a debt, and told him (Morgan) that he could take the mule for said debt, and Morgan said he would, then the property is not the claimant's, and the plaintiffs ought to recover." (2) "If the jury believe the evidence in this case, they must find for the plaintiffs in execution, and against the claimant." From a judgment for the claimant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jackson E. Long, for appellants. P. A. McDaniel, Jr., for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. There appears to have been a judgment rendered by the justice of the peace against the claimant on October 24, 1888, an appeal to and trial by jury on the same day, and a verdict rendered against claimant as to the property now involved, and in his favor as to other items condemned by the justice to the satisfaction of the execution, but no judgment was pronounced or entered on this verdict. The verdict itself, however, was recorded on the justice's docket; and under our statute, which provides that, on appeal or certiorari to the circuit court, the case must be tried "de novo, and according to equity and justice, without regard to any defect in the summons, or other process or proceedings before the justice," the verdict may, for the purposes of that appeal and this, stand for the judgment of the justice's court. That was the only judgment in the case. It is an error to suppose that the issuance of executions against the sureties on the claim-bond upon its return forfeited, under section 3368 of the Code, is a judgment, summary or otherwise, and that the certiorari brought that action of the justice under review. The writ which was invoked here was that provided by statute, and its effect was to require a new trial in the circuit court without any reference to the action of the justice's court. Code, §§ 3400, 3405; Abraham v. Alford, 64 Ala. 281; Harsh v. Heflin, 76 Ala. 499.

The general charge requested for the plaintiffs was properly refused. It proceeded on the theory that the claimant had sold the property to his son. The evidence cannot be said, as matter of law, to establish that theory. It bore a tendency, in one aspect, to show that there had been no sale by the claimant to his son, in that there had been no delivery essential to constitute a sale. At least, the jury might have so found, and the charge would have deprived them of the right to so find. The other charge requested for plaintiffs is bad upon like considerations. The facts that claimant told his son he might take the mule in payment of a debt which claimant owed him, and that the son "said he would," manifestly do not of themselves constitute a sale of the property. Affirmed.

REEVES v. SKIPPER.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — RELATIONSHIP — KNOWLEDGE OF VENDEE—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a sale of personal property has been attacked on the ground of fraud, the vendee being a brother of the vendor, the law requires clearer and more convincing proof of the bona fides than where the transaction had been between persons not related. COLEMAN and MCCLELLAN, JJ., dissenting.

2. Where the sale was made with intent to defraud creditors, and the vendee knew of such intent, the transaction was fraudulent, though the vendee actually paid a cash consideration for the property.

3. A sheriff levied an attachment on goods which the vendee claimed to have purchased from defendants in the attachment suit before the levy. In an action against the sheriff for the wrongful levy, issue was joined on his plea that the vendee had no means by which he could make the purchase, and proof was made that the vendee had stated before the sale that he had no such means. Held, that it was not error to charge that unless the vendee had shown that he had the means to purchase the goods, or some source from which he could obtain the means, the verdict should be for the sheriff.

4. Where the vendee, after testifying that the receipt for the payment of the goods was lost, was allowed to testify as to its contents, his motion for a new trial on the ground that the receipt had been found was properly denied, as it did not come within Code, § 2871, which provides that when one has a release in writing of a claim on which judgment has been rendered against him, which was lost at the trial, and which he was unable to prove by secondary evidence, but has since found, he is entitled to new trial.

Appeal from circuit court, Henry county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Action by I. L. Reeves against A. B. Skipper, as sheriff, to recover damages for the wrongful levy on a stock of merchandise. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Motion for new trial denied. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant, together with his other pleas, filed a special plea, alleging that at the time of the alleged sale the plaintiff did not have the means to make the purchase, nor any source from which he could obtain same, and in support of this plea proved by the witness Holland that a short time prior to the sale the plaintiff, in conversation with him, (Holland,) told him "that Sims & Reeves were embarrassed, and wanted to sell out, and that he would buy, but did not have the money, nor any source from which he could get the same." The plaintiff was allowed, after having testified that the receipt for the payment of the stock of goods was lost, to testify that it recited the payment of $1,427 19 for the stock of goods which was afterwards attached by the defendant, and which is the subject-matter of the present suit. The portion of the general charge of the court to which the plaintiff excepted is copied in the opinion. The court at the request of the defendant gave the following written charges, and plaintiff separately excepted to the giving of each of them: "(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that Sims & Reeves were insolvent, and sold their stock of goods and merchandise to I. L. Reeves with the intention to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, and that the plaintiff had notice of such intention, then the burden is on plaintiff to reasonably satisfy them that he actually paid a real, adequate consideration for said goods, and there should be clear proof of his (plaintiff's) means to make said purchase, or some source from which he could have obtained said means. (2) The court charges the jury that, unless the plaintiff has shown to their reasonable satisfaction that he had the means by which he could have purchased the goods in question, or some source from which he could have obtained said means, then their verdict should be for the defendant." There was verdict for the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the grounds that the charge which was given by the court of its own motion was erroneous, and that the receipt which was thought to have been lost during the trial had been found.

J. G. Cowan and J. W. Foster, for appellant. S. H. Dent, Jr., for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The action was in trespass to recover damages for the alleged wrongful levy of an attachment upon a stock of goods claimed to be the property of plaintiff. The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendants. The attachment was sued out by creditors of Sims & Reeves upon debts existing at the time of the sale of the goods and merchandise to plaintiff. The evidence showed that plaintiff was a brother of the Reeves of the firm of Sims & Reeves, the vendors. The court, of its own motion, charged the jury, among other things, "that the law requires clearer and more convincing proof of its bona fides when the transaction is between relatives than when it is between persons who are not related to each other." An exception was reserved by the plaintiff to the giving of this charge. In the following authorities—and there are others not cited—it has been stated that "fuller and more convincing proof is required in cases where the transaction is between relatives than would be required if the parties were strangers:" Calhoun v. Hannan, 87 Ala. 285, 6 South. Rep. 291; Pollak v. Searcy, 84 Ala. 263, 4 South. Rep. 137; Gordon v. McIlwain, 82 Ala. 247, 2 South. Rep. 671; Moog v. Farley, 79 Ala. 252; Lipscomb v. McClellan, 72 Ala. 159; Marx v. Strauss, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 818. Under the influence of this principle, the majority of the court hold that the charge was properly given. A minority of the court are of opinion that when the principle is thus formulated into a charge to the jury it gives to the "fact" of relationship a legal weight not consistent with the purposes intended by permitting proof of the fact of relationship, and such a charge is also a clear invasion of the right of the jury to determine what weight shall be given to any proven fact, and their exclusive right to draw all legal inferences from proven facts. The earlier cases held that relationship was a badge of fraud, but experience demonstrated that the rule was too harsh, and in many instances destroyed the validity of contracts which were free from fraud. Still it was recognized that it was an easy matter for parties related to each other "to feign a consideration for the transfer of property, or to fabricate evidence of its payment;" and to prevent the success of fraudulent conveyances it was held proper to admit evidence of the fact of the relationship of the parties, not that this fact was to be considered as a badge of fraud, or was available to shift the burden of proof, or imposed any additional burdens upon the parties. It was a circumstance in the case, to be considered by the jury in weighing the evidence, "dependent, more or less, for its value upon the degree of relationship, and its connection with other circumstances which throw light upon and give color to the transaction." The writer thinks this is the legitimate operation of the "fact of relationship," and in accord with the rule stated in the following cases: Young v. Dumas, 39 Ala. 60; Barnard v. Davis, 54 Ala. 565; Hubbard v. Allen, 59 Ala. 297; Moog v. Farley, 79 Ala. 251; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 56; Harrell v. Mitchell, 61 Ala. 279. The juries are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence. The court pronounces the conclusions of law upon proven facts. When the court, therefore, instructs the jury that, if the fact of relationship be proven, the law requires clearer and more conclusive proof than if this fact had not been proven, this is a conclusion of law, fixed and determined as to the weight to be given to this fact, and it no longer remains a fact to be weighed by the jury like other facts, and accorded such weight as they see proper to give it. It no longer is dependent for its value upon its connection with other facts, but in and of itself raises a presumption in law, which cannot be overcome except by clear and more convincing proof than if the fact had not been proven. What more would be required if such fact was held to be a badge of fraud? As was said in Stix v. Keith, 85 Ala. 471, 5 South. Rep. 184, the law declares rules for aiding juries in weighing, but never weighs, parol testimony; citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 10, note a, and 1 Whart. Ev. (2d Ed.) § 417. The correctness of the rule of law as declared in 85 Ala. and 5 South. Rep., supra, is conceded by the court. Now, if the jury are the exclusive judges of the weight to be given to the evidence, a charge which substantially instructs them that, although the evidence may reasonably satisfy them of the bona fides of the transaction, yet, if relationship is proven as a fact, then as a matter of law they must not permit the evidence to produce this degree of conviction in their minds, unless it is clearer and more convincing than would be necessary if the facts of relationship had not been proven, giving to the fact of relationship undue prominence and a controlling influence upon the other facts of the case. Such an instruction fetters the free judgment of the jury, and infringes upon their peculiar and exclusive province. See 1 Whart. Ev. § 417, supra. If such an instruction was applied to any other fact introduced in evidence, the charge would be condemned, and, if not condemned when applied to the fact of relationship, it must be, because this fact is not to be weighed by the jury like other facts, but comes to the jury weighed by the law. It seems to me that a charge would be confused, inconsistent, and calculated to bewilder a jury which instructed them in effect that, if relationship be proven, the law requires clearer and more convincing proof than if this fact had not been proven, yet, being the exclusive judge of the weight to be given to the facts in evidence, the jury is at liberty, if it was proper, to disregard this rule of law, and attach to this fact no importance. I cannot see how the two propositions can stand together, or how a jury would construe such a charge. Cases might arise in which the rule should have no weight,—as where the relationship is very distant, or where the proof shows that, although related, the parties did not know it, or that there had been no previous social or business intercourse with each other, or they were in fact at variance with each other at the time of the transaction. Is the jury to be instructed, as a rule of law, under such circumstances, that, relationship having been proven, the law requires that clear and more convincing proof of the bona fides of the transaction be made than if relationship had not been proven? Is not the better and true rule that declared in those authorities which held that relationship is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in weighing the whole evidence of the case, and which is dependent for its value upon the degree of relationship, and its connection with other circumstances which throw light upon and give color to the transaction? Since the courts have repudiated the doctrine that relationship is a badge of fraud, and hold that no presumptions of unfairness arise from this fact, this is the legitimate and full purpose intended by permitting the fact of relationship to be proven as evidence.

The first charge given for the defendant is objectionable, but the objection is not available to appellant, as it is too favorable to him. If the jury were satisfied that Sims & Reeves sold their stock of goods to I. L. Reeves with the actual intent to defraud their creditors, and I. L. Reeves knew of this intent, and with this knowledge bought the goods for a present cash consideration, the transaction was fraudulent, and would not be relieved in law of its vitiating character by any proof that I. L. Reeves might offer as to his ability to make the purchase, or the source from whence he obtained the money. The charge asserted, in effect, that, although the transaction was fraudulent, if the purchaser clearly showed he was able to make the purchase, that proof would relieve the transaction of its fraudulent character.

The second charge given at the request of the defendant asserts an incorrect proposition of law, but in giving it the court was not in error, for the reason hereafter given. If the jury was otherwise satisfied that plaintiff paid for the goods with his own money, he was not required to further satisfy the jury of the source from which he obtained the means. It is not a canon or rule of law that, when creditors attack the bona fides of a sale of goods by the debtor, the purchaser, in addition to the fact of payment, must also reasonably satisfy the jury as to his means or source of means to make the purchase. The rule is that, if the payment or its bona fides is questioned, a matter controverted, the inability of the purchaser to show that he had the means, or any source from whence he could obtain the means, tends to discredit the evidence offered to show the payment of an actual and adequate consideration and the bona fides of the transaction. If, however, the jury are satisfied that payment in good faith was actually made, it is not incumbent on the purchaser to go further, and also satisfy them as to his means and resources. The statement in the case of Harrell v. Mitchell, 61 Ala. 276, embodied in this charge, was used by the court in argument upon the facts, and the inability of the purchaser in that case to show that he had means with which to make the purchase was stated as a reason why the court should not credit other testimony in the case tending to show the payment of an adequate consideration. In criticising charge 2 we have not overlooked the fact that the charge is based upon a plea upon which issue was joined. Issue having been joined upon the plea, although demurrable, the defendant had the right to introduce evidence in support of his plea, and to ask for an instruction upon the evidence adduced in support of it. There was no error in giving the charge.

If the suit in this case had been by the vendor against the purchaser to recover the purchase money for the goods, the fact that the receipt was lost or mislaid at the time of the trial would have furnished grounds for a new trial, under section 2871[1] of the Code, but in a suit by the creditors of the vendor, attacking the bona fides of the conveyance, the case is not covered by the statute. The court permitted parol proof of the contents of the receipt. If the receipt had been produced in court, and it had specified in terms that the money was paid for goods, it would have been permissible to have shown by parol that in fact and in truth notes and accounts entered into the consideration. We cannot see from anything in the record that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. It is the opinion of the court that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

McCLELLAN, J., concurs with the writer.

[1] Section 2871 provides that where one has a release in writing of a claim on which judgment has been rendered against him, which was lost or mislaid at the trial, and which he was unable to prove by secondary evidence, but has since found, he is entitled to new trial.

DUNDEE MORTGAGE, TRUST & INV. CO. v. NIXON et al.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—LOANING MONEY—PLACE OF BUSINESS—VOLUNTARY NONSUIT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. In an action on a note, plaintiff in its complaint styled itself a corporation of Great Britain. The only evidence as to where the note was executed was the note itself, which was headed and dated as executed at a place in Alabama. There was no other evidence, except that it was proven that plaintiff had not complied with Const. art. 14, § 4, and Act Feb. 28, 1887, which require that foreign corporations shall have a known place of business and an authorized agent in the state before doing business therein. Defendants had filed a plea alleging that plaintiff had not complied with these provisions, and no sufficient demurrer was interposed. Held, that a verdict was properly directed for defendants.

2. A nonsuit taken in consequence of adverse rulings on a pleading is voluntary, and does not fall within the statute authorizing a plaintiff suffering a nonsuit to reserve, by bill of exceptions, rulings of the court for review on appeal.

Appeal from circuit court, Marengo county; WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Assumpsit by the Dundee Mortgage, Trust & Investment Company against W. G. Nixon and others on a note under seal, executed by Nixon as principal, and the other defendants as sureties. There was judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in its complaint styled itself as a corporation under the laws of Great Britain. The defendants interposed as pleas: First, the general issue; second, payment; third, that the note upon which the action was founded was usurious; fourth, want of consideration; fifth, sixth, and seventh, that the plaintiff is a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the statutory and constitutional provisions which warranted it in doing business in this state at the time of the execution of the note sued on. There were demurrers interposed by the plaintiff to these several pleas of the defendants. Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced in evidence the note sued on, and then rested. The defendants proved, which was not controverted, that at the time of the execution of the note the plaintiff had failed to comply with the act of the general assembly of Alabama, approved February 28, 1887, which was entitled "An act to give force and effect to section 4, art. 14, of the constitution of the state of Alabama." This was all the evidence in the case; whereupon the court, at the request of the defendants, gave the general charge in their behalf; to the giving of which the plaintiff duly excepted.

G. B. Johnston, for appellant. John C. Henderson and Watts & Son, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Facts which are averred in a complaint need not be pleaded in defense, or if set up in a plea, as a general rule, need not be proven by the plaintiff. So far as the rights of the plaintiff are concerned, the defendant has the right to consider facts averred in the complaint to be true. The complaint in this case sufficiently shows that plaintiff is a foreign corporation. The plaintiff offered in evidence a promissory note, headed and dated Uniontown, Ala. Prima facie Alabama was the place of its execution, and, no other evidence being offered on this question, the law presumes the contract was made at Uniontown, Ala. Farrior v. Security Co., 88 Ala. 275, 7 South. Rep. 200; Mortgage Co. v. Sewell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 143. It was proven without dispute that plaintiff had not complied with the constitution of the state, and the statutory provision which requires that foreign corporations shall have a known place of business and an authorized agent before doing business in this state. It has been frequently decided that, however immaterial, defective, or demurrable a plea may be, if issue be joined upon the plea, and the evidence sustains it, the defendant has the right to have the court charge the jury upon such plea. The record shows that plaintiff filed several demurrers to the pleas of the defendants. After this was done, the defendants by leave of the court, withdrew their pleas, and demurred to the complaint. The court overruled the demurrer to the complaint, and by leave of the court the defendants refiled their former pleas. The record does not inform us that plaintiff refiled its former demurrer to the pleas of defendants. After the defendants' pleas were refiled, as shown in the judgment of the court, the only entry is that "plaintiff, by its attorney, demurs to said pleas." The demurrer or assignments for cause of demurrer upon which the court ruled being nowhere stated in the record, we must presume, in favor of the correct ruling of the court, that the demurrer was general or insufficient, even though the plea might have been held defective as against a demurrer properly framed. Masterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56. We must consider the pleading as if issue had been joined upon all the pleas except the fourth, without the interposition of a sufficient demurrer. The seventh plea of defendants, not to mention others, was fully sustained by evidence which was not controverted.

The bill of exceptions states that, in consequence of the charge given by the court to the jury, the plaintiff "took a nonsuit, and reserved the point for the determination of the supreme court by bill of exception." The record of the judgment shows that "plaintiff in open court excepts to the ruling of the court overruling its demurrer to the pleas Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 7, and also excepts to the charge of the court to the jury, and by consent of the court takes a nonsuit, with a bill of exceptions." A nonsuit taken in consequence of adverse rulings on the pleading is voluntary, and does not fall within the statute which authorizes a plaintiff suffering a nonsuit to reserve by bill of exceptions rulings of the court for review on appeal to this court. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 678, § 5, and authorities cited. A nonsuit was taken in consequence of the charge given by the court to the jury. The correctness of the charge is properly before us for review. In view of the pleading and the evidence, there was no error in the charge given. It is not every act done by a foreign corporation in this state to which the constitution and statute applies, which requires that it shall have a known place of business and an authorized agent. Shoe Co. v. Ware, 92 Ala. 145, 9 South. Rep. 137. The statute does apply to the loaning of money. Nelms v. Mortgage Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 141. The application of the foregoing principles leads to an affirmance of the case. Affirmed.

HIGGINS v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

PUBLIC LANDS—GRANTS—RIGHTS OF OCCUPANTS.

Under Act Cong. April 23, 1884, granting lands to the state of Alabama for the state university, and, by section 8, declaring that the provisions of the act shall not apply to any land to which the right of homestead entry shall have attached in favor of any person who is entitled to such homestead entry, and who is occupying and claiming the land at the time when such selections are approved by the secretary of the interior, and, in cases where it is found that such claims are superior to the rights granted the state, it may select other lands in lieu thereof, and, by section 4, providing that when such selections are made and approved the title shall vest in the state, one who has occupied government land with the intention of obtaining it as a homestead, but who has filed no affidavit, and made no payment, and performed none of the other conditions precedent on which his rights under the homestead laws are made to depend, loses all right to obtain the land by failing to contest the state's selection before approval.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Suit by Elias M. Higgins against the Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama, to have certain lands held by respondents declared to be held by them as trustees for complainant, and to have a conveyance thereof made to complainant. Demurrers to the bill were sustained, and the bill dismissed. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Brown & Crems, for appellant. A. E. Hargrove and I. E. Webb, for appellees.

MCCLELLAN, J. We will concede, for the purposes of this appeal, that the complainant, appellant here, had made entry on the land in controversy as a homesteader prior to the approval of its selection by agents of the state of Alabama, under the act of congress of April 23, 1884, "to increase the endowment of the university of Alabama from the public lands in said state," and that he had cleared and put improvements upon it prior to, and was cultivating and occupying it as a home at the time of, the approval of such selection by the secretary of the interior, on May 19, 1885. It is not clear from the averments of the bill that the land was subject to homestead entry, but, pretermitting a discussion of that point, the further concession will be made that the land was subject to such entry. There is no pretense advanced by the bill that complainant did aught else at any time towards perfecting a homestead entry than to enter upon, improve, clear, live on, and cultivate the land with the intention of making it his homestead. No declaration was ever made or filed. No payments required by the statutes of the United States to perfect entry and entitle the entryman to a patent have ever been made. Occupation for the length of time, and cultivation and improvements of the character, required by the homestead laws are the facts, linked to an intention to make the premises his home, and the sole facts, upon which the demand advanced by complainant's bill is made to rest. That demand is that the legal title to the land, which has vested in the trustees of the university of Alabama by approval and certification by the secretary of the interior of the list containing this, among many other parcels, to the state of Alabama, and by an act of the legislature of Alabama, shall be divested out of said trustees, and vested in the complainant. This title is of the absolute fee, without limitations or restrictions upon the uses to which the grantees may devote the land, or upon their power of disposition, or with respect to the charges that may be made upon it by them, or which the law may impose by way of enforcing liabilities incurred by them, further than is implied in the general purposes of the grant to provide suitable buildings and appliances and an endowment fund for the university of Alabama. This title, if passed into the complainant as prayed in his bill, would, of course, be of the absolute fee, discharged not only of the trusts with which it is charged in the hands of its present holders, but also free from all limitations of the homestead laws of the United States. The land, for instance, would be chargeable for indebtedness of the complainant contracted prior to the vesting of the title in him, which is specially provided against in respect of homesteads. Rev. St. U. S. § 2296. In other words, the effectuation of the prayer of complainant's bill involves, not his investiture of a homestead title, but of an ordinary title in fee-simple to the land in question; and he would become not the homestead owner only, but the owner, without restriction, of 80 acres of land, which might be taken from him immediately by the enforcement of an antecedent liability. Not only would he thus acquire an estate to which he was not entitled from the government on the facts upon which his claims rested, and which, in contravention of the policy of federal legislation respecting homesteads, might at once be taken away from him, but that estate would be acquired without the performance by him of the conditions precedent upon which his rights, under homestead laws, are made to depend. It is just as essential to the issuance of a patent to a homestead, or to the perfect right to demand a patent, that the affidavit required by Rev. St. U. S. § 2290, should at some time be made, and that the sum of money prescribed by that section should be paid, as that the would be entryman should comply with statutory requirements as to occupation, cultivation, and the like. Conceding that, under the act of May 14, 1880. (21 St. at Large, 140,) an entry may be initiated by settlement alone, and that the declaratory affidavit above referred to need not be made in limine, it by no means follows that the necessity for such affidavit is obviated. On the contrary, we are clear to the conclusion that the sworn declaration must in all cases be filed before the inchoate entry can ripen into such right as draws to it title, or the right to demand the issuance of a patent. And so with the money necessary to perfect a homestead entry. Whether the entry be initiated by formal filings and possession taken, or only by settlement, the fees must be paid before it can be perfected, and before a patent can be issued or demanded. As we have seen, no declaration has ever been made, or fees paid, by the complainant. He cannot now file such affidavit, and make such payment. To do so would not entitle him to a patent from the United States, because the government has no title to the land. The defendants' attitude and rights respecting the property manifestly could not be affected by any declaration or payments made to them, such as the statute requires to be made to government officials. The time for these things to be done by the complainant, if there has been any such time, has forever passed. No offer to do them is, or could with propriety have been, embodied in the bill. Yet the complainant, without having complied with these conditions precedent to the right to demand a patent for a homestead estate in the land, without having put himself in a position to require a conveyance of such estate from the United States, having, in short, no right to the relief prayed as against the grantor of the defendants, would, if the theory of his bill be a sound one, not only effectuate a non-existing and never existing right as between him and the United States against the latter's grantees, but, in doing so, would acquire a larger estate in the land than he would have been entitled to had he fully complied with all the requirements of the homestead laws. A theory upon which such results may be worked out cannot be tolerated. The true doctrine is that, until the complainant had complied with all the statutory requisitions,—had filed his declaration and paid the sum of money required, as well as occupied, cultivated, and improved the land, as provided in the statute,—he had no vested rights in the premises,—no rights which might not be cut off and defeated by a grant by the United States to a third party,—and hence no right which, at least in the absence of fraud or gross mistake, he could assert against such third party. This appears to be the understanding of congress in all cases like the present one. Statutes like that involved here uniformly, it is believed, contain a saving clause for the protection of settlers or homesteaders whose entries are inchoate. The necessity for such clause is uniformly recognized, and this recognition must be rested on the consideration that such inchoate entries vest no estate or interest in the entryman, since, if he had vested rights, they would be saved to him under organic guaranties, in the absence of any such provision in the statute. And, in all reason, it must be the law that mere settlers on the public domain, with whatever intention and to what extent soever they cultivate and improve the land, acquire no vested rights in the premises,—no rights which can be supported against a grantee of the government. It is an anomaly too flagrant to receive the sanction of any court that the United States, against which statutes of limitations do not run, and as to which the doctrines of adverse possession and laches have no application, should be deprived of the title to land by the mere possession and use of it by others, unaccompanied by those further acts on the part of the settler which the statute prescribes as conditions precedent to the vesting of his rights, and which are intended to advise the officials charged in that regard of the claim desired to be effectuated. If this could be done, no grant of public lands could ever be made until the government had made inquisition in respect of every legal subdivision, and ascertained that no settlement had been made upon it; and, if the position of complainant be correct, whenever such inquiry disclosed settlement, no grant could ever be made; and this, notwithstanding the settler might never comply with the statutes as to payments, declaratory affidavits, and proof of occupation and cultivation. That this is not the law is clear, we think, logically, and upon authority. Newkirk v. Marshall, 35 Kan. 77, 10 Pac. Rep. 571; Thrift v. Delaney, 69 Cal. 188, 10 Pac. Rep. 475; Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. 187, 189.

It is very true that the policy of the general government towards persons who have settled upon and reclaimed public land ought to be and is a liberal one. Congress has always been careful to conserve their welfare, and to secure to them the fruits of their labor by which such land is made productive; but, no vested rights adverse to the United States being involved, it lies in the unfettered election of congress to say to what extent such conservation is to be carried, and to prescribe the terms, conditions, and methods under which it is to be effectuated. Pursuing that broad and liberal policy which has always obtained in these matters, congress has provided, in the third and fifth sections of the act granting lands to Alabama for the state university, the manner in which land selected by the state upon which settlements have been made may be reserved out of the grant and saved to settlers. Section 3 is as follows: "That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any legal subdivision of land to which the right of homestead entry or pre-emption shall have attached in favor of any person who is entitled to such homestead and pre-emption entries, and who is occupying and claiming such subdivision of the public lands in Alabama at the time when such selections are approved by the secretary of the interior; and in cases where it is found that such claims are superior to the rights of the state of Alabama, herein granted, the said state may select other lands in lieu thereof, and in like quantity, elsewhere in said state, from the public land of the United States, so as to make up, as nearly as may be, the total number of acres of land granted in this act to said state." Section 5 provides "that the secretary of the interior is empowered to make all needful and proper regulations and rules for carrying this act into effect, and for the decision of all questions that may arise as to the right of the state of Alabama to any lands that may be claimed under the provisions of this act;" and by section 4 of the act it is provided "that when the selections of said lands are so made, (i. e., by the agents of the state whose duty it is to report lists of selections to the commissioner of the general land-office,) and are approved by the secretary of the interior, the title to the same shall vest in the state of Alabama," for the benefit of the university, as prescribed in the act. These provisions came before Acting Secretary of the Interior Joslyn in January, 1885, for consideration and interpretation in respect of the rights of settlers upon lands so selected, and the time and manner of their assertion. The precise question involved was whether the rights of one claiming entry initiated by occupation only were foreclosed and forever barred by the approval of the selection of the particular subdivisions by the secretary; and the conclusion reached was that the statute contemplated and provided for a contest of the selection only before such approval; that the onus of instituting and prosecuting the contest was upon the settler; that, if no contest was instituted in a given instance prior to the secretary's final action on the selection, "the selection took the land," and it was his duty to approve the same, and that thereby the absolute title, freed from the unpropounded claims of the settler, at once vested in the state of Alabama. The secretary, referring in his opinion to section 3 above set out, said: "I construe this to mean that the selection is entitled to be admitted and reported, subject to the inchoate claim which has been or may be filed within the time required by law, although subsequently to the date of selection; and that, if such claim is not perfected, or prosecuted in good faith by the observance of legal requirements, up to the date of approval of the selection, the latter will prevail, and take the land; for the act goes on to provide that, 'in cases where it is found that such claims are superior to the rights of the state of Alabama herein granted, the said state may select other lands in lieu thereof, and in like quantity,' etc. This provision evidently contemplates an adjudication of the claim of the settler upon selected lands, and an award as to superiority; with the privilege to the state, if the issue be against her right, to select lieu lands to make up the quantity so stricken from her lists. Now a lieu selection is not made because of original refusal to admit to record, but in place of one admitted, and afterwards stricken therefrom. If this be so, it is evident that the onus is upon the settler to prefer his claim, show his compliance, and receive his award, at least in so far as to give legal notice of its existence by proper filing, without requiring [as had been done by the commissioner of the general land-office, whose action in that behalf was being revised by the secretary] advertisement of the lists, or preliminary affidavit as to non-settlement upon the lands as matter of fact." We are not aware that this construction of the statute by the department charged with its execution has ever been departed from. Many decisions of the interior department have been referred to in argument, and cited on the briefs of counsel, but they involve only the rights of the settler as against the United States in the absence of a grant by the government to a third party, and hence in the absence of an adverse claimant. Such was the Case of Newman, 8 Dec. Dep. Int. 448. We have, in the outset of this opinion, conceded the proposition advanced by this case, the gist of which, when applied to the relations existing between the complainant and the government, is that, if the title to the land in controversy were still in the United States, he would be entitled, by complying with the homestead laws in respect of filing the declaratory affidavit, making payment, and proving settlement, etc., to have a patent issued to him. But that is not to say that he may do these things after the land has been granted to another, and have a patent from the government, or that, without doing these things, he may now have the grantees of the government convey the land to him. On the contrary, one of the factors in the conclusion reached in the Newman Case was the fact that no adverse claim to the land existed. Even if decisions of the interior department have been made at variance with the construction put on this act by Acting Secretary Joslyn, we would feel in no degree constrained to follow them. We regard that construction as eminently sound. The approval of selections by the secretary of the interior is, from the clear intendment of the statute, a judicial act. Congress, having plenary power in the premises, has said to the settler that his moral right is recognized; that he should have an opportunity to bring forward his claim; that he was entitled to his day in court, so to speak; and that, if he fail to avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded, as a matter of favor and grace, to propound his claim, and have the court, the secretary of the interior, to adjudge the saving clause of the statute, it shall, in effect, be adjudged whether he is within or not, that he is not, and that "the selection," and not he, "takes the land." This is the meaning of the act construed by the acting secretary, and as we construe it. The result reached by this construction,—the vesting of title in the state, notwithstanding a settlement, if the settler fail to contest the state's selection before approval,—is not only supported by the terms of section 3 of the act, but is further reinforced by the explicit provision of section 4, that such approval vests the title in the state. The title referred to is the unincumbered fee in the United States, against which the settler has no vested rights, as we have seen, but only the right given him as a matter of grace by this statute to defeat the state's selection by seasonably propounding his claim before the officer who is required to approve the selection.

As was pointed out in the opinion of the judge of the city court, some very anomalous consequences would ensue from a construction which would admit of the approval of the secretary of the interior being contested and defeated. In the first place, such approval is the end of the law. It is the final act by which title passes into the state, and by which the purpose of congress is completely effectuated. That done, the state is invested with title to 46,080 acres of land, the quantity granted by the act, and every term of the act is filled. Thereafter no authority exists in the estate to make other selections, and none in the secretary of the interior to approve other selections if made. To allow settlers who have failed to assert their claim upon the reasonable opportunity afforded them by the act prior to approval to bring them forward, and have them effectuated subsequently thereto, would be to reduce the grant made to the state to that extent. It was stated, in argument, that there are many settlers on lands selected and approved, whose claims are identical with complainant's, and who are awaiting the decision of this case. If the position of complainant be correct, the state would get very much less than the 46,080 acres granted by congress, since there is no authority in the act for the selection of lieu lands to make up for land thus taken from the state. Such a construction violates the letter and spirit of the statute, and cannot be tolerated. Another anomalous result is well stated by the city judge. He says: "After the title has so passed, [by the approval of selection,] and in a suit to which the United States is not a party, it could not be bound by the decree of any court so as to require, or even to authorize, its officers to approve other selections in lieu of lands divested out of the state by such decree. Otherwise, it would be within the power of the state's agents to select other lands in the same condition, and the settler may go into a court, and by its decree clothe himself with the title, and like proceedings could be continued until every such settler in the state has been invested with the title to the land occupied by him without any further compliance with the laws and regulations of the United States;" and this process might be continued ad infinitum, or until the public domain of the state had been exhausted and passed into individual proprietorship, without any semblance of compliance on the part of the individual with provisions of the homestead laws which are essential conditions precedent to the acquisition of any estate under them. These considerations serve to illustrate the absurd possibilities of the construction contended for by the appellant, and to demonstrate the soundness of the contrary view, which we have elaborated. Adopting that view, we hold that whatever right or claim the complainant had, conceding that he had any, was cut off by the judicial ascertainment of the secretary of the interior, evidenced by his approval of the selections, that the land in question was subject to the selection of the state; that the state took an absolute title in fee, unincumbered and unaffected by the fact of complainant's prior settlement on the land, and that, this title having passed to the defendants, the trustees of the university of Alabama, they are beneficially, as well as nominally, the owners of the property, against the complainant and all the world.

The decree of the city court dismissing the bill is accordingly affirmed.

SCARBROUGH v. ALABAMA MIDLAND RY. CO.

INJURY TO EMPLOYE — NEGLIGENCE OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

In an action for personal injuries, it appeared that B. & Co. were subcontractors of A. T. & I. Co. in constructing defendant's railroad; that plaintiff was injured while a passenger on a pass issued by B. & Co. over a portion of the road yet in their possession and under their control, on a train furnished by defendant to B. & Co. and A. T. & I. Co., as a construction train, through the negligence of an engineer employed by and under control of the latter company. Held, that defendant was not liable.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Simon Scarbrough against the Alabama Midland Railway Company. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sayre & Pearson, for appellant. A. A. Wiley, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff had been employed by J. M. Brown & Co. as a laborer in the construction of the Alabama Midland Railway up to the time when he received from them a pass from Ramer, where he had been in camp, to Bainbridge, Ga. He got on the train on which the pass was to be used, and received personal injuries in a collision between that and another train. The portion of the railway on which the collision occurred was, at that time, still in process of construction, and was in the possession, exclusive control, and management of Brown & Co., who, as independent contractors, were engaged in building the railway from Sprague Junction, Ala., to Bainbridge, Ga. The contract of Brown & Co. was with the defendant and the Alabama Terminal & Improvement Company. Prior to the date of the plaintiff's injury, the portion of the railroad from Bainbridge, Ga., to Ozark, Ala., had been completed and turned over by Brown & Co. to the Alabama Terminal & Improvement Company, and that company, as a construction company, was then operating this completed portion of the line. The collision occurred between Ozark and Sprague Junction. The contractors had laid the track over this last-named portion of the line, and they were running construction trains over it, but this part of the railway was still uncompleted, and had not been turned over to the construction company or to the defendant railway company. A clause of the contract with Brown & Co. was in these words: "The railway company to furnish engines and cars, with train supplies, with engineer and fireman, and such other force as may be required to handle said train, free of charge, for the transportation of men and material in the construction of the road, such trains to be subject to the order of the contractor during construction." The bill of exceptions states that the two construction trains which collided were furnished to Brown & Co. under and in accordance with, and in the manner prescribed by, the contract. It appears, however, without contradiction, that the engineers of the two construction trains which collided were employed and paid, not by the defendant, but by the Alabama Terminal & Improvement Company, and that that company alone had the power to discharge them. The evidence tended to show that the collision was attributable to the negligence of the engineer in charge of the train upon which the plaintiff was riding. That the defendant was authorized to commit the work of building its road to independent contractors is not questioned; and that J. M. Brown & Co. occupied the position of independent contractors, in reference to the work in which they were engaged, is clear beyond dispute. For their negligence, or for the negligence of their employes, in doing the work contracted for, the defendant is not liable. Railroad Co. v. Chasteen, 88 Ala. 591, 7 South. Rep. 94. The plaintiff accepted the pass from them, and was looking to them for his carriage. There is nothing to indicate that he understood that the defendant had anything to do with his transportation. The claim that the injury complained of is attributable to the negligence of the employes of the defendant is not supported by any tendency of the evidence. The statement in the bill of exceptions to the effect that the train on which the plaintiff was riding was furnished to Brown & Co. in accordance with the terms of the contract with them cannot be construed to involve the assertion that the engineer in charge of that train was employed by the defendant or was subject to its orders; for the proof shows clearly and distinctly that the engineer was not an employe of the defendant at all, and was not subject to its orders. He was the servant or employe of another party. The defendant did not select him, or have the right to discharge him or to control his work, and he was engaged in doing the work of an independent contractor. The result of applying the tests for determining whether one person is to be regarded as the servant of another is that that relation is not shown to have existed between the defendant and the negligent engineer. The fact that the engine and train belonged to the defendant is not, by itself, sufficient to charge the defendant for their negligent operation in the work of constructing the road. There is a class of cases in which the negligence of the driver or manager of a vehicle is held to be chargeable, not to the hirer thereof, who, at the time, was getting the benefit of its use, and, in a limited sense, directing its movements, but to the owner or proprietor who had intrusted the general management and control of the vehicle to his own servant. In such cases the owner or proprietor is held responsible because the driver or manager was really his agent, and was acting in his service; and the hirer of the vehicle cannot be regarded as the master of the driver or manager, or as controlling the conduct of the latter in the matter wherein he was negligent. Land Co. v. Mingea, 89 Ala. 521, 7 South. Rep. 666; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Railroad Co. v. Norwood, 62 Miss. 565. When, however, the person in charge of a vehicle is not in fact the employe of the owner thereof, and is not subject to his orders or control, and the vehicle is really operated by the hirer or bailee thereof in the lawful exercise of a complete and exclusive dominion over it, then one who is injured in consequence of the negligent management of the vehicle cannot hold the owner responsible therefor, because the negligence is not that of the owner or his agent or servant. The train on which the plaintiff was riding was subject to the orders of the contractors while it was used as a construction train. They controlled its operation. It was doing service for them alone. It was operated as an agency to execute their will and to do their work. It was engaged in an employment over which J. M. Brown & Co., as independent contractors, had the general control, with the right to direct what should be done, and the manner of doing it. As a general rule, the owner of property may surrender to another the control thereof, and of the employe who is intrusted with the management of it. There are special cases in which the law does not permit such a surrender of control, or holds the owner responsible for the management of the property, though it is actually controlled by another; as where the law charges the owner with the duy of performing the service in which the property is used, or where the work in which the property is to be used, under a contract with the owner, is necessarily or intrinsically dangerous. Mayor, etc., v. McCary, 84 Ala. 469, 4 South. Rep. 630. Unless the owner is held to responsibility upon some such consideration, the rule which is sustained by the weight of the authorities is that, though the property of one person which is used in a special service for another is at the time managed or operated by an employe of the owner or proprietor, yet if such employe, in regard to the particular matter in which he is engaged, is under the control, not of his general master, but of the person for whom the special service is rendered, who, in reference to the details of that work, had the management thereof as an independent contractor, then such property is to be regarded as used in the service of the independent contractor, and, as to that particular service, the employe is to be regarded as the servant, not of his general master, but of the independent contractor whose work he is doing. In such case the contractor has the actual management, in details, of the property while it is used in his business, and the person in direct charge of the property is identified with him as his servant as to that special service. In applying the rule just stated, several courts have held that a railroad company is not liable for damages resulting from the negligent management of one of its trains used and controlled by construction contractors for construction purposes on a portion of its road built under construction contract, and not yet turned over to the railroad company, though the train employes are hired and paid by the railroad company. Powell v. Construction Co., 88 Tenn. 692, 13 S. W. Rep. 691; Cunningham v. Railroad Co., 51 Tex. 503; Miller v. Railroad Co., 76 Iowa, 655, 39 N. W. Rep. 188; Hitte v. Railroad Co., 19 Neb. 620, 28 N. W. Rep. 284; 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 838. The present case does not call for the application of the rule stated in the authorities just cited, for the person who, on the evidence, was guilty of negligence of which the plaintiff complains was not in any sense the servant of the defendant; and, in the circumstances disclosed, it is plain that the defendant cannot be charged with responsibility merely because the train on which the plaintiff was riding was the property of the defendant. The defendant did not have any such control of the trains as to render it chargeable with their negligent management. There was no error in the charge given by the circuit court at the request of the defendant. Affirmed.

GARNISHMENT — SERVICE OF WRIT — PLEADING — ISSUES — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

1. Under Code, § 2945, which provides that attachments may be executed by summoning any person indebted to defendant, or having in his possession any money or effects belonging to defendant, the issue of the attachment, and its possession by the officer, are essential prerequisites to a valid execution by service of garnishment.

2. Where service of garnishment process is void for the non-existence of an attachment, such defect may be pleaded in abatement.

3. Leave to file a replication to a plea in abatement, after the expiration of the time allowed by rule, rests in the discretion of the court, and its exercise is not reviewable on appeal.

4. An affidavit of plaintiff denying the truth of a garnishee's disclosure, which alleges that on a certain day, several months prior to the service of the garnishment, the garnishee had money in his hands belonging to defendant, is insufficient as a basis for an issue under Code, § 2981, which provides that plaintiff shall make oath in what respect the answer is untrue.

5. Where a garnishee made disclosure, alleging ownership of the property sought to be reached in a third party, and plaintiff declined to controvert the truth of such disclosure by a sufficient answer thereto, pursuant to Code, § 2981, or to proceed against the third party by notice, pursuant to section 2984, the garnishee was properly discharged.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

Action in attachment by Donald Bros. & Co. against James Nelson & Sons, defendants, and W. H. Lienkauff & Sons, garnishees. From an order sustaining the garnishees' pleas in abatement, and overruling plaintiffs' demurrer to such pleas, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Faith & Ervine, for appellants. Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellees.

CLOPTON, J. Appellants having made before the clerk of the circuit court the requisite affidavit and bond to obtain an attachment against the estate of James Nelson & Sons, the clerk, without issuing an attachment writ, issued a garnishment process, directed to and commanding the sheriff to summon W. H. Lienkauff & Sons as garnishees. The process having been served, the garnishees appeared and filed pleas in abatement, setting up that no attachment was issued, and that the sheriff was without authority to serve the summons of garnishment. Plaintiffs first moved to strike out the pleas, and then demurred. Both the motion and the demurrer were overruled. On a subsequent day the garnishees were, on their motion, discharged upon their pleas in abatement, no replication thereto having been filed, nor issue taken thereon, within the time required by the rules and practice of the court. During the hearing of this motion, plaintiffs asked leave to file a replication, which was refused. The exceptions to these several rulings constitute the first four assignments of error.

Section 2945 of the Code provides that attachments may be levied on the real estate or personal property of the defendant, or may be executed by summoning any person indebted to him, or liable to him on a contract of either of the kinds specified, or having in his possession or under his control any money or effects belonging to the defendant. Under the statute, garnishment is a mode of levying an original attachment. The sheriff cannot make a valid levy on real or personal property, or by garnishment, without having in his possession the attachment authorizing it. His power and duty arise when the attachment is placed in his hands. Until then he has no authority to act, and becomes a trespasser if he seizes the property of the defendant. The issue of the attachment and possession by the sheriff are essential prerequisites to a valid execution by service of garnishment. Wales v. Clark, 43 Conn. 183; Drake, Attachm. § 183*a*. The attachment must be levied by the officer to whom the writ is directed; and, when executed by garnishment, the officer levying must officially sign, as well as serve, the summons requiring the garnishee to appear within the time, and answer as to the matters prescribed in section 2946, and indorse such service on the attachment writ. Garnishment is a statutory proceeding, and can be issued only in the cases and by the officer authorized by statute. The clerk has authority to issue a garnishment when in aid of a pending suit, or on a judgment, or in cases in which the process is merely auxiliary; but such authority is not conferred when it is resorted to as a mode of levying an original attachment. The clerk is as much without authority to direct or command the sheriff to execute the attachment by summoning any particular person as garnishee as he is to direct or command on what property the sheriff shall levy. His authority ceases with the issue of the attachment. He is not authorized to do any act thereafter in reference to, or involving, the levy. It follows that the garnishment process issued by the clerk, and the service thereof, are nullities.

A garnishee cannot avail himself of irregularities in the attachment proceedings; but when the writ is void, or the garnishment process is issued by an officer without authority, or the service is invalid because of the non-existence of an attachment, the objection is available to the garnishee, and any available defects in the process may be taken advantage of by plea in abatement. Flash v. Paul, 29 Ala. 141; Curry v. Woodward, 50 Ala. 258. Leave to file a replication to a plea in abatement, after the expiration of the time allowed by the rules of practice, rests in the discretion of the court, the exercise of which is not revisable.

During the foregoing proceedings, after the filing of the pleas in abatement, and before the discharge of the garnishees, plaintiffs obtained, under an order of the court, the issue of an attachment, based on the original affidavit and bond, which was executed December 15, 1890, by the service of another summons of garnishment on Lienkauff & Sons. The garnishees answered in writing, denying indebtedness, and on subsequent oral examination in court, required by plaintiffs, stated that on February 5, 1890, the captain of the steamer Spindrift, of which James Nelson was agent, deposited with them $5,580 in lieu of a bond which they had made at the custom-house for the steamer, and that they were informed that the Highland Scot Steam-Ship Company claimed the money. Thereupon plaintiffs filed an affidavit for the purpose of contesting the answer. The affidavit and the issues were stricken out, on motion of the garnishees, on the ground of their insufficiency; and, plaintiffs declining to proceed further, the garnishees were discharged. The affidavit states that, in the belief of affiants, the answer of the garnishees is untrue, in this: that they were indebted, on the 14th of June, 1890, when the first garnishment was served on them, to James Nelson & Sons, and that the money deposited with them was the money of the defendants in attachment. Section 2981 of the Code provides the mode by which a contest of the answer may be initiated: "The plaintiff, his agent or attorney, may controvert the answer of the garnishee by making oath, at the term the answer is made, that he believes it to be untrue; and thereupon an issue must be made up, under the direction of the court, in which the plaintiff must allege in what respect the answer is untrue." Had the affidavit stated generally that the affiants believe the answer of the garnishees to be untrue, without more, it would have been sufficient, under the statute, to inaugurate a contest. But it does not stop here. It proceeds to allege the particular respect in which the answer is untrue,—that is, that the garnishees were indebted on June 14, 1890, to James Nelson & Sons; thus presenting an immaterial issue. The garnishees were required to answer only as to indebtedness at the time of the service of the garnishment, or at the time of making their answer, or at any intervening time. Code, § 2946. The garnishees may have been indebted several months prior to service of the gar-nishment, and yet not have been indebted at the time of the service. Whether or not there was a prior indebtedness is not the issue to be found on such contest; though evidence thereof may be admissible, in connection with proof of its continuance, on a proper issue. In this respect the affidavit was insufficient.

When a third person claims the debt or demand, or the money or effects, which by his answer the garnishee admits to be due or in his possession, and he so informs the court by his answer, it becomes the duty of the court to suspend proceedings against the garnishee, and cause a notice to issue to such person to appear at the next term, and contest with the plaintiff the right to such debt, money, or effects. Code, § 2984. Prior to the enactment of 1840, which is substantially incorporated in section 2984 of the Code, the only mode by which the plaintiff could contest the validity of the transfer of the debt or effects was by controverting the answer of the garnishee, and, if the issue was found in favor of the plaintiff, judgment was rendered against the garnishee. As the judgment was not conclusive on the claimant, not being a party to the contest, the garnishee was exposed to a double liability. To remedy this evil, the act of 1840 was enacted. Since its enactment the garnishee may protect himself against a double liability by informing the court by his answer, or at any time before final judgment against him, that he has been notified that another person claims the debt, money, or effects. In such case judgment cannot be rendered against the garnishee on his answer until notice is served on the claimant, and the issue found in favor of the plaintiff on a contest with the claimant, or unless he is in default, or, if a resident, two notices are returned, "Not found." Sections 2985, 2987. The plaintiff cannot compel the garnishee to contest the validity of the claim of such third person by controverting his answer. The garnishees having informed the court by their answer that a third person claimed the money deposited with them by the captain of the steamer, no judgment could be rendered against them on their answer at that time. Moore v. Jones, 18 Ala. 296; Ex parte Opdyke, 62 Ala. 68; Fowler v. Williamson, 52 Ala. 16. The court having properly stricken out the affidavit as being insufficient, and the plaintiffs having declined to proceed further, and to contest with the claimant the right to the money, the garnishees were entitled to a discharge. Affirmed.

ACCOUNTING BY GUARDIAN—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—PARTIES.

1. Where the guardian of a minor loaned money belonging to her, and the note and mortgage taken therefor ran to himself as such guardian, and he afterwards settled his accounts with and paid her in full, such note and mortgage became his property.

2. Though such guardian died intestate and no administration of his estate was had, yet where his wife and children were living, and none of the children were under the disability of minority, and his debts were paid, such wife and children could sue in their own names to foreclose such mortgage.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; T. M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Suit by Mary E. Robinson and others against John D. Wright to foreclose a real-estate mortgage. Decree for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moore & Finlay, for appellant. Watts & Son, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. N. D. Wright died intestate in October, 1883, leaving a widow and four children surviving him, all of whom are still living. He had been guardian of one Caroline Wright, and had lent $800 to J. D. Wright, taking, as security for its repayment, a mortgage on real estate. The note evidencing the debt, and the mortgage to secure its payment, express in each that they are made to "N D. Wright, guardian of Caroline Wright." This note and the mortgage were found among N. D. Wright's papers after his death. N. D. Wright in his life-time, and shortly before his death, had made a final settlement of his guardianship of Caroline Wright, and had accounted for the $800 previously loaned to J. D. Wright. He paid her in full. There was never any administration on the estate of N. D. Wright, but Robinson and Eubanks, husbands of two of the daughters, under authority from the widow and adult children, proceeded to collect the assets and pay the debts of the estate. The present bill was filed in May, 1890, near seven years after the death of N. D. Wright. The widow and the four children are made complainants, and the object of the bill is to foreclose said mortgage for a balance alleged to be due. The bill in its averments sets forth the facts stated above. It also avers that all the complainants were adults save one,—the youngest daughter,—and that she had been relieved of the disabilities of minority. It avers further that all the debts of N. D. Wright, the intestate, had been paid. There was a demurrer to the bill, the main ground being that the suit was brought in the names of others than the personal representative of N. D. Wright's estate.

Questions almost identical with the one raised by the demurrer have been very often before this court. We have uniformly held that, where nothing remains to be done except the reduction of the assets to possession, and their distribution among the next of kin, administration may be dispensed with. Bethea v. McColl, 5 Ala. 308; Miller v. Eatman, 11 Ala. 614; Vanzant v. Morris, 25 Ala. 285; Marshall v. Crow, 29 Ala. 278; Carter v. Owens, 41 Ala. 219; Fretwell v. McLemore, 52 Ala. 124; Sullivan v. Lawler, 72 Ala. 68, 72; Cooper v. Davison, 86 Ala. 367, 5 South. Rep. 650. The demurrer was rightly overruled.

The averred facts show that, when N. D. Wright paid his ward in full, the note and mortgage became his property. Tomkies v. Reynolds, 17 Ala. 109. Producing the note and mortgage from the proper custody, proof that N. D. Wright settled with his ward and paid her off, and the testimony of Robinson, make a very strong showing in favor of complainants. Rejecting as illegal all testimony given by J. D. Wright of transactions alleged to have been had with the deceased, and the defense is left without material evidence in its support. There is no testimony to overturn the presumptions raised by the papers. Complainants have fully made out their case. Affirmed.

IRWIN v. EVERSON.

APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

In a suit to settle a partnership, where the defendant, in possession of property which was claimed to constitute its assets, denied the existence of a partnership, and showed that he was entirely solvent, and able to respond to any measure of relief which might be decreed plaintiff, it was error to appoint a receiver of such property.

Appeal from chancery court, Elmore county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Suit by Georve V. Everson against Robert L. Irwin, for the settlement of a partnership. From an order appointing a receiver, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. T. Holtzclaw, H. C. Bullock, and A. A. Wiley, for appellant. W. S. Thorington and J. M. Chilton, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. This appeal is prosecuted from an interlocutory order appointing a receiver of the partnership alleged to exist between Everson, the complainant, and the defendant, Irwin. The fact of partnership, alleged in the bill, is denied by the answer; and, on the application of complainant for the appointment of a receiver, affidavits were submitted on both sides of the issue thus made. Moreover it is manifest, indeed is admitted, that the contemplated copartnership was never consummated as to that part of its subject-matter which consisted of realty, for the want of articles in writing signed by the parties; and it may be that the alleged contract, even conceding one to have been entered into by parol, will have to be taken as an entirety in such sort that it cannot be upheld as to the personalty, and avoided as to the realty. It is not necessary for us, however, to decide either the issue of fact as to the existence of any contract of copartnership, or the question of law as to the effect of the failure of the alleged arrangement as to the land upon that part of the transaction which related to personal property. Not only so, but we apprehend that it would be affirmatively improper to decide, at this stage of the litigation, and upon the ex parte showings found in this record, whether or not any partnership has ever existed between the parties. Suffice it, for all the purposes of this appeal, that there is a bona fide dispute between the parties as to the existence of the partnership averred in the bill, and a substantial doubt enveloping that issue; and that it clearly appears, the contrary not even being alleged, that Irwin, who denies the partnership, and has possession of the property claimed to constitute its assets in part, is entirely solvent, amply able to respond fully to any measure of relief which can possibly be decreed to the complainant on the facts set forth in his bill. In such case the chancery court should not intervene by its receiver. To do so, thus, without any concession of the existence of a partnership, but, on the contrary, in the face of a bona fide denial of the fact, and in advance of any final determination that the alleged relation does exist, might well be to take from the defendant property in which the complainant has no interest, and subject it to an expensive and exhausting administration on the joint account of parties, one of whom is, in fact, without any right in the premises, only to the end of ultimately adjudging it to be the defendant's property, and making restitution to him of such of its proceeds as have not been expended under the receivership; and all this when, even from the point of view of the complainant, his rights could be fully conserved by a mere accounting between the parties, and the enforcement of the decree for any balance in his favor against the property of the defendant. Peacock v. Peacock, 16 Ves. 49; Fairburn v. Pearson, 2 Macn. & G. 144; Goulding v. Bain, 4 Sandf. 716; Hobart v. Ballard, 31 Iowa, 521; Williamson v. Monroe, 3 Cal. 383; Popper v. Scheider, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 56; High, Rec. §§ 476-478.

The chancellor, in our opinion, erred in appointing the receiver; and his order in that behalf is reversed, and it is here ordered that the receiver be discharged. Reversed and rendered.

TORREY v. FORBES et al.

EJECTMENT—DISCLAIMER—PLEADING—NONSUIT—DISMISSAL—WAIVER—PROOF OF DEEDS.

1. Code, § 2699, provides that the defendant in ejectment may disclaim possession of the premises sued for, in whole or in part, and, upon such disclaimer, the plaintiff may, if he so elect, take issue. Held, that a plea of not guilty and a disclaimer could not be entered together, since the former admits, and the latter denies, possession.

2. Where defendant in ejectment pleads not guilty as to the whole tract in dispute, and enters a disclaimer as to a part of the land, plaintiff may, if he so elect, take issue on the plea of disclaimer; otherwise, he should take judgment for want of plea as to the lands disclaimed, and join issue on the plea of not guilty as to the balance.

3. Under section 2737, providing that nonsuits must be taken before the jury retire, and section 2759, providing that when, from any decision of the court on the trial of a cause, it may become necessary for the plaintiff to suffer a nonsuit, the facts, point, or decision may be reserved for the decision of the supreme court by bill of exceptions, a nonsuit cannot be taken in ejectment after the cause has been discontinued by order of the court on defendant's motion.

4. Although section 2710 provides that when in actions for the recovery of land, there are more defendants than one, the jury may assess the damages arising from the detention of the land, and the injury thereto, in severalty, against each defendant for distinct damages, yet the discontinuance by plaintiff of a suit in ejectment as to one defendant is a discontinuance as to all.

5. Where, after a discontinuance as to one defendant, the other defendant does not object to the introduction of evidence or final argument by both parties, he waives his right to a discontinuance.

6. Where defendant in ejectment has taken possession of land under a deed purporting to convey it to him, the deed, though void as a conveyance, is admissible to show color of title.

7. Code 1867, § 1546, provides that acknowledgments may be made within the United States, and beyond the state of Alabama, by judges of any "court of record" in any state. Held that, though a certificate of acknowledgment purporting to be taken by a judge of a superior court of North Carolina failed to show that such court was a court of record, yet the signature was valid as the attestation of a witness.

Appeal from circuit court, Baldwin county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

Ejectment by Charles Torrey, as executor of John Bowen, against Elisha Forbes and another. Nonsuit granted. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The plaintiff's testator derived title from Grist, Hughes & Co., and, in order to prove the chain of title, he introduced, among other proceedings and deeds, the deed of Annie M. Hughes to Zophar Mills, and also the deed of Isaac W. Hughes to Zophar Mills, and also introduced in evidence the depositions of William J. Clark and Annie M. Hughes, taken in North Carolina, who testified that the signatures to the deeds were respectively those of Annie M. Hughes and Isaac W. Hughes and William J. Clark, and that Isaac W. Hughes and William J. Clark had been dead for some years. The defendant moved to exclude the deed of Isaac W. Hughes—First, because the acknowledgment was defective; second, because the said deed had never been recorded; third, there was no witness thereto; fourth, the judge making the certificate was not shown to have been a judge of a court of record. The court sustained the defendant's objection to exclude the said deed, to which the plaintiff duly excepted. The substance of the certificate of said deed is stated in the opinion. The plaintiff then introduced in evidence the deed of Zophar Mills to his testator, John Bowen, and also introduced evidence tending to show that the defendants did not enter upon said lands until the spring of 1882. The defendants, to sustain their contention, introduced a deed of Sallie A. Forbes to James A. Bishop, and also a deed from Sarah A. Grist to Sallie A. Forbes, purporting to convey the lands involved in this controversy; and the defendant testified that he bought the lands described in said deed as lands owned by Sarah A. Grist. The plaintiff thereupon moved to exclude said deed of Sarah A. Grist to Sallie A. Forbes—First, because there was no witness thereto; second, that said deed was void; third, that it was not acknowledged by Benjamin Grist, the husband of the grantor. The court overruled the plaintiff's motion, and admitted the deed in evidence as a color of title, and plaintiff excepted.

Fredk. G. Bromberg, for appellant. Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Plaintiff brought suit in ejectment against James A. Bishop and Elisha Forbes. Both defendants entered a joint plea of not guilty. On the same day, the defendant Forbes filed a disclaimer as to all the lands sued for, except 160 acres. The plea of not guilty and a disclaimer cannot be pleaded together. They are inconsistent with each other. The plea of not guilty is a conclusive admission of possession, and puts in issue the title. A disclaimer is an admission of plaintiff's title, but denies the possession. McQueen v. Lampley, 74 Ala. 408; Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582. The plaintiff may, if he elects, take issue upon the plea of disclaimer; but upon such issue the question involved is not one of title. Code, § 2699.[1] If the plaintiff does not wish to contest the plea of disclaimer, his proper course would be to take judgment for the lands disclaimed as to the party disclaiming for want of plea, but without damages or cost, (74 Ala., supra,) and join issue upon the plea of not guilty as to the balance of the lands. The judgment entry recites as follows: "That during the trial of the cause plaintiff dismissed the suit as to the defendant Bishop, and the defendant Elisha Forbes asked and was granted leave to disclaim as to all the lands except those described in his disclaimer. The defendant Forbes moved to abate the suit upon the ground that the dismissal of the suit as to Bishop operated a discontinuance of the suit, and the court granted the motion; whereupon the plaintiff asked leave to take a nonsuit, with bill of exceptions," etc. We do not think the cause was in a condition to authorize the taking of a nonsuit after, by the order of the court granting the motion, the cause had been discontinued. The statute (section 2737, Code) provides that nonsuits must be taken before the jury retire; and section 2759 of the Code provides when, from the decision of the court on the trial of a cause, it may become necessary for the plaintiff to suffer a nonsuit, the facts, point, or decision may be reserved for the decision of the supreme court by bill of exceptions as in other cases. The rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, or in a charge to the jury, or upon other points, may be such as to render it necessary for the plaintiff to suffer a nonsuit; and he is permitted by statute to do this at any time before the jury retire. The statute contemplates that the nonsuit shall be taken during the trial, not after it is ended by an order discontinuing the entire suit. It is contended that the rule as to discontinuance does not apply in cases of tort. We think it applies in all cases. A legal chasm discontinues a cause, whether it occurs in a criminal or civil action. Ex parte Hall, 47 Ala. 675; Drinkard's Case, 20 Ala. 9.

It is well settled that a discontinuance without sufficient cause shown, as to one of several defendants, who has been served with process, is a discontinuance of the entire action. Kendall v. Lassiter, 68 Ala. 182. The exception obtains where one of the defendants, by plea such as coverture, infancy, the statute of limitations, or the like, can successfully interpose a defense personal to himself; or, where the proof shows that plaintiff has no just cause of action as against such defendant, an amendment by dismissing as to him, or by striking his name out of the complaint, will not operate to discontinue the cause. Jones v. Engelhardt, 78 Ala. 506; Reynolds v. Simpkins, 67 Ala. 380; Mock v. Walker, 42 Ala. 670; Givens v. Robbins, 5 Ala. 676. The fact that a plaintiff may sue jointly several tenants, and recover of each the portion of land held and occupied by him separately, or that tenants in possession of distinct parts may protect themselves from a joint judgment for damages, as held in Rowland v. Ladiga, 21 Ala. 33, and as provided for in the Code, § 2710,[1] does not prevent the rule in regard to discontinuances from applying to suits in ejectment. There may be an unlawful joint withholding of the land by several tenants. The same principle applies as in suits to recover damages for a joint trespass to property. Slade v. Street, 77 Ala. 576.

[1] Code, § 2699, provides that "the defendant may, in an action of ejectment, or in an action in the nature of ejectment, disclaim possession of the premises sued for, in whole or in part, and, upon such disclaimer, the plaintiff may, if he elects, take issue," etc.

A discontinuance may be waived by the defendant. The rule recognized by the authorities is that, if an order or judgment is entered which operates a chasm in the proceedings, the advantage must be claimed by the party who desires to avail himself of it at the earliest period; and any subsequent pleading or prosecution of the defense on the part of the defendant will be held a waiver by him of the irregularity. Walker v. Cuthbert, 10 Ala. 219; Hair v. Moody, 9 Ala. 399; Shorter v. Urquhart, 28 Ala. 365. According to the judgment entry, the defendant Forbes filed his disclaimer after the suit was dismissed as to Bishop, and the bill of exceptions shows that, after the dismissal of the suit as to Bishop, both parties introduced and closed their evidence; and not until after the opening argument by plaintiff, and the reply thereto by the defendant, was concluded, was the motion made that the cause be discontinued as to the defendant Forbes. We think the motion came too late. The order should have been asked for immediately upon the dismissal of the suit as to Bishop; at least, before other proceedings were had by the defendant upon the merits in defense of the action.

Where parties go into possession of land under a purchase, evidenced by a written instrument purporting to convey it, and claim the land under such purchase, the instrument, though void as a legal conveyance, is admissible to show color of title and the extent of the possession of the property described in the instrument. Black v. Iron Co., (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 537; Cooper v. Watson, 73 Ala. 252; Stovall v. Fowler, 72 Ala. 77; Riggs v. Fuller, 54 Ala. 144. The plaintiff moved to exclude the deed from Grist to Forbes. The motion was overruled, and the deed admitted to show color of title. There was no error in this ruling of the court. We presume the deed from Sallie Forbes to Bishop was introduced before the suit was dismissed as to him. The record does not show. If such was the case, under the rule we have announced it was competent as color of title to Bishop. If offered in evidence after the suit as to Bishop was dismissed, we cannot see its relevancy, as this instrument purported to convey away the lands to Bishop for which the defendant Forbes was being sued.

The court sustained an objection to the introduction of the deed of Hughes to Mills. The certificate of acknowledgment was taken in North Carolina, and is dated 3d day of May, 1875, and signed, "Wm. J. Clark. [Seal] J. S. C." The body of the certificate states that he was a judge of the superior court. The governor of the state, under the great seal of the state, certifies that he was judge of the superior court of the third judicial circuit. Section 1546 of the Code of 1867 provides that acknowledgments may be taken within the United States, and beyond the state of Alabama, by judges and clerks of any federal court, judges of any court of record in any state, notaries public, etc. Neither the certificate of the judge nor that of the governor certifies that the superior court is a court of record. The act of congress provides that "the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 504. It is unnecessary, however, to determine whether the certificates in this case are sufficient to show that William J. Clark was a judge of a court of record in the state of North Carolina, and authorized by the law of this state to take acknowledgments of deeds. The acknowledgment and certificate is defective in form and substance, and, although recorded within 12 months, was not admissible in evidence without further proof. The question is whether the defective acknowledgment and certificate will operate as the attestation of William J. Clark as a witness to the conveyance. In the case of Merritt v. Phenix, 48 Ala. 90, it was held that an insufficient acknowledgment was equivalent to the attest of one witness, and, though not sufficiently authenticated to be received in evidence, it was entirely competent to supply the deficiency by proof of its due execution. In the case of Sharpe v. Orme, 61 Ala. 268, the deed was not recorded in time to authorize its being read in evidence without further proof. The court declared: "The acknowledgment and certificate in this case is merely a substitute for an attestation by a witness. If it had been attested, no more than the signature of the witness would have been necessary; no affirmation by him of his knowledge of the parties, or of their identity, or of their acknowledgment that, with knowledge of its contents, they vol-

[1] Code, § 2710, relative to actions for the recovery of land, provides: "When there are more defendants than one, the jury may assess the damages arising from the detention of the land, and the injury thereto, in severalty, against each defendant for distinct damages."
